

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

22 / 3 /
HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

THIRD SERIES,
COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF
WILLIAM IV.

23^o VICTORIÆ, 1860.

VOL. CLVIII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM
THE TWENTY-FOURTH DAY OF APRIL, 1860,
TO
THE SIXTH DAY OF JUNE, 1860.

Third Volume of the Session.

LONDON:
PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,
AT THE OFFICE FOR HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,
23 PATERNOSTER ROW [E.C.]

AND BY
LONGMAN AND CO.; J. RIDGWAY; HATCHARD AND SON; J. BOOTH; C. DOLMAN; J. BAIN; W. DALTON; SMITH, ELDER, AND CO; RICHARDSON, BROTHERS;
UPHAM AND BEET; AND J. ALLEN AND CO.

1860.

LONDON : CORNELIUS BUCK, PRINTER, 23, PATERNOSTER ROW.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CLVIII.

THIRD SERIES.

- I. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.
 II. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
 III. NEW MEMBERS SWORN.
-

I. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 24.				Page
Law and Equity Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	1
THURSDAY, APRIL 26.
Union of Benefices Bill—Bill read 2 ^a	108
Divorce Court Bill—House in Committee	126
Law of Divorce (Ireland) Bill— Presentation of a Bill by Lord Chelmsford—Bill read 1 ^a	134
FRIDAY, APRIL 27.
Church Property— Presentation of Petitions by Viscount Dungannon	207
Charitable Uses Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Amendment of Lord Abinger, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment agreed to —Bill to be read 2 ^a this Day Six Months	212
Militia (Ireland)—Question of the Marquess of Clanricarde	215
Divorce Court Bill—Report brought up	217
MONDAY, APRIL 30.
Smithfield Market—Motion of Lord Ebury for an Address—Motion withdrawn	305
National Education (Ireland)—Motion of the Earl of Clancarty for Returns—Motion agreed to	311
Annexation of Savoy to France—Question of the Marquess of Clanricarde	332
TUESDAY, MAY 1.
The Naval Reserve—Observations of Lord Lyndhurst	423

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
THURSDAY, MAY 3.
Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill—Order of the Day for the House to be put in Committee read—Amendment of the Earl of St. Germans, that the Bill be committed this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 30—House in Committee—Division List ...	541
Salmon Fisheries (Scotland)—Motion of the Duke of Newcastle, that a Select Committee be appointed—Motion agreed to —Committee appointed ...	559
Removal of Irish Poor— Presentation of Petition by the Earl of Donoughmore	560
FRIDAY, MAY 4.
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election—A Conference ...	653
Organization of the Infantry—Observations of the Earl of Lucan ...	653
MONDAY, MAY 7.
Statute Criminal Law Consolidation Bills—Report of Select Committee brought up by the Lord Chancellor ...	746
Savoy—The Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde postponed ...	747
India—Recent Disturbances—Motion of the Marquess of Clanricarde for Papers postponed till Tuesday , the 15th instant ...	747
Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill—House in Committee ...	748
TUESDAY, MAY 8.
Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment Bill—Bill read 2 ^a ...	834
Canons and Book of Common Prayer—The Resolution of Lord Ebury negatived	836
THURSDAY, MAY 10.
Indian Finance—Observations of the Marquess of Clanricarde ...	998
Statute Criminal Law Consolidation Bills—Offences against the Person Bill—House in Committee ...	998
Customs Bill—Bill read 2 ^a ...	1001
Lunatic Asylum, County Donegal—Motion for Order in Council ...	1005
FRIDAY, MAY 11.
Central America—Question of the Earl of Malmesbury ...	1062
Religious Liberty—(Ottoman Empire)— Presentation of Petition by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe ...	1065
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Amendment of the Bishop of Exeter, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^a ...	1074
MONDAY, MAY 14.
Italy—Expedition against Naples—Motion of the Marquess of Normanby for Copies—Motion agreed to ...	1178
Contract Gunboats—Motion of the Earl of Hardwicke for Returns—Motion agreed to —Returns ordered ...	1179
Road through Hyde Park— Presentation of Petition by the Earl of Ducie ...	1189
Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill—House in Committee ...	1192
Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment Bill—House in Committee—Division List	1199
Statute Criminal Law Consolidation Bills—Offences against the Person Bill—Bills read 3 ^a —PROTEST of the Marquess of Westmeath against the passing of the Offences against the Person Bill ...	1200
TUESDAY, MAY 15.
India— Presentation of Petitions—Motion for Returns by the Marquess of Clanricarde—Petitions to lie on the Table—Motion for Returns agreed to ...	1263

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
FRIDAY, MAY 21.
The Expedition to China—Question of Earl Grey ...	1439
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read— Amendment of Lord Monteagle that the Bill be read a Second time this day Six Months—Amendment of Lord Monteagle agreed to by a Majority of 89— Division List ...	1439
Public Improvements Bill—Order of the Day for the Third Reading read—Re- solved in the negative by a Majority of 2—Division List ...	1547
TUESDAY, MAY 22.
Adulteration of Food or Drink Bill—Bill read 2 ^a ...	1587
St. George's-in-the East—Motion of Viscount Dungannon—Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn ...	1590
Ceylon Railway—Question of the Earl of Carnarvon ...	1605
THURSDAY, MAY 24.
Treaty of Turin—Question of the Earl of Carnarvon ...	1633
Union of Benefices Bill—House in Committee ...	1634
The Lord Lieutenancy of the County of Londonderry—Observations of the Earl of Belmore ...	1641
MONDAY, JUNE 4.
Bank of Ireland Bill—Order of the Day for the Second Reading read—Bill read 2 ^a ...	1947
TUESDAY, JUNE 5.
Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Bill—Bill read 2 ^a ...	2039
Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill—Order of the Day for the Third reading read—Amendment of Lord Teynham that the Bill be read a Third Time this Day Three Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 11— Bill read 3 ^a —(After Debate) Bill Passed and Sent to the Commons—Division List ...	2040
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—Order for Second Reading read— Bill read 2 ^a ...	2049

II. SUBJECTS OF DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 24.
Franchise Statistics—Question of Mr. Howes ...	21
Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	22
Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill—Question of the O'Donoghue ...	23
Professorship of Modern History, Cambridge—Question of Mr. Steuart ...	23
The Reform Bills—Question of Mr. Baillie Cochrane ...	23
Armstrong Batteries for China—Question of Mr. Papillon ...	24
Foreshores—Motion of Mr. Augustus Smith for a Select Committee—Motion negatived by a Majority of 17 ...	25
Royal Proclamation (Piety and Virtue, &c.)—Her Majesty's Answer brought up by the Comptroller of the Household ...	37
British Museum—Motion of Mr. Gregory for a Select Committee—Motion agreed to —Select Committee appointed ...	37

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
TUESDAY, APRIL 24—continued.
Innkeeper's Liability Bill—Motion of Colonel Smyth for leave to bring in a Bill —Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o ...	53
Dockyards—Motion of Mr. Jackson for an Address to Her Majesty that She will be graciously Pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the Control and Management of the Dockyards, Shipbuilding, &c.—Motion agreed to ...	53
London Corporation Bill—Bill read 2 ^o and Debate on the Commitment of the Bill Adjourned till Tuesday 8th May ...	69
Census (England) Bill—Bill read 2 ^o ...	91
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Order for Third Reading read—Debate adjourned till Thursday ...	93
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25.
Law of Property Bill—House in Committee ...	93
THURSDAY, APRIL 26.
Assessment of House Property—Question of Mr. Perry Watlington ...	134
Protection of British Persons and Property in Naples and Sicily—Question of Mr. H. B. Sheridan ...	135
Military Surgeons—Question of Mr. Deedes ...	136
Representation of the People Bill—Second Reading — Adjourned Debate— Fourth Night—Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March],—That the Bill be now read a Second Time—Debate resumed —Debate further adjourned till Monday next ...	137
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow ...	206
Customs Bill—House in Committee ...	206
FRIDAY, APRIL 27.
Office of Coroner—Question of Mr. Cobbett ...	218
Metropolitan Toll Gates—Question of Mr. Ingram ...	218
Slave Trade in Coolies—Question of Mr. Buxton ...	219
Disturbances in Bengal—Question of Mr. Kinnaird ...	219
Oude Crown Jewels—Question of Sir Minto Farquhar ...	220
Reported Disaster in the Peiho—Question of Mr. Dalglish ...	220
Conduct of the Indian Cadets in Egypt—Question of Mr. Mildmay ...	221
Sale of Gas Act—Question of Mr. Byng ...	222
French Silk Duties—Observations of Mr. Newdegate ...	223
The Rate-Paying Returns—The Reform Bill—Question of Sir Minto Farquhar ...	225
Unreported Criminal Prosecutions—Question of Mr. Mackie ...	239
The Reform Bill—The New Voters—Question of Mr. Edwin James ...	239
Militia Officers (Ireland)—Observations of Colonel Dickson ...	244
The Crimean Colonels—Question of Colonel Lindsay ...	246
The 67th Regiment—Question of Colonel North ...	248
Indian Cadets in Egypt—Reply of Sir Charles Wood ...	249
The Neutralized Provinces of Savoy—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith ...	250
The English Graves at Sebastopol—Question of Captain Annesley ...	253
Deportation of Irish Paupers—Observations of Mr. Pollard-Urquhart ...	258
Church Rates Abolition Bill—Third Reading — Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th April] That the Bill be now read the Third Time—Debate resumed —Amendment of Mr. Whiteside, " That the Bill be read a Third Time this day Six Months— Amendment negatived by a Majority of 9—Bill read 3 ^o ...	259
Stock Jobbing Bill—Motion of Mr. Bovill for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o ...	301
Parliamentary Boroughs—(Assessed Taxes, &c.)—Motion of Mr. Macaulay for Returns—Motion agreed to ...	302
Jews Act Amendment Bill—Bill read 3 ^o ...	305

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

MONDAY, APRIL 30.		Page
Business of the House—Observations of Viscount Palmerston	333
The Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Bill—Observations of Mr. Sotheron Estcourt	334
Dockyards—The Queen's Answer to the Address brought up by the Comptroller of the Household	334
Railway Companies—Question of Mr. Thompson	335
The New Bronze Coinage—Question of Mr. Hopwood	336
Boats in the Parks—Question of Mr. Alcock	336
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote	336
The Great Bell of Westminster—Question of Mr. Hardy	336
Representation of the People Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Fifth Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March]
“That the Bill be now read a Second Time—Debate resumed —Debate further adjourned till To-morrow	336
Customs Bill—Bill considered	422

TUESDAY, MAY 1.
Court of Chancery in Ireland—Question of Sir Edward Grogan	454
The Stade Dues—Question of Mr. Fenwick	454
The Late Outrage in Egypt—Question of Mr. H. Baillie	455
The Post Office—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote	455
Mr. Ogilvie and the Tariff—Question of Mr. Hennessy	456
The Wine Licences Bill—Question of Mr. Sotheron Estcourt	456
Savoy—The Conference—Question of Mr. Seymour FitzGerald	456
Manning the Navy—Motion of Sir Charles Napier for an Address—Motion by leave withdrawn	457
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election—Motion of Mr. Peel for an Address—Motion agreed to	485
Census (Ireland) Bill—Motion of Mr. Cardwell for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o	512
Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, and Certificated Conveyancers Bill—House in Committee	513
Representation of the People Bill—Observations of Viscount Palmerston	519

WEDNESDAY, MAY 2.
Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Clive that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 24—Bill read 2 ^o	519
Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment Bill—Bill read 2 ^o	536
Fisheries (Scotland) Bill—House in Committee	536
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Second Reading deferred till Tuesday , 15th May	539
Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Second reading deferred till To-morrow	539

THURSDAY, MAY 3.
The Gunboats—Question of Mr. Long	561
The Wakefield Election Commission—Question of Mr. Edwin James	562
North America—The Island of San Juan—Question of Mr. Seymour FitzGerald	563
Charges on Operations in Warehouses—Question of Mr. Cave	564
Representation of the People Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Sixth Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March]
“That the Bill be now read a Second time”—Debate resumed —Question put, and agreed to —Bill committed for Monday , 4th June	564
The Irish Reform Bill—Question of Mr. O'Brien	652

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
FRIDAY, MAY 4.
Canal Companies—Question of Mr. Beamish ...	673
Our Relations with Japan—Question of Mr. Baillie Cochrane ...	673
Berwick-upon-Tweed Election—Conference—Committee appointed ...	678
Our Relations with Brazil—Question of Sir Hugh Cairns ...	679
The Roman Government—Question of Sir John Acton ...	679
Diplomatic Position of Mr. Cobden—Question of Mr. Palk ...	681
Expedition to China—Question of Mr. Baillie ...	682
Italian Affairs—Case of Mr. Ogilvie—Question of Mr. Hennessy ...	682
Italy—The Papal States—Question of Mr. Bowyer ...	684
Roman Catholic Charities—Question of Mr. Newdegate ...	685
Military Regulations—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	691
Irish Fisheries—Question of Mr. Conolly ...	692
Classification and Education of Inmates in Union Workhouses—Question of Mr. W. Ewart ...	693
The Indigo Riots in Bengal—Question of Mr. Kinnaird ...	695
Organization of the Indian Army—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	699
Lighthouses on the Irish Coast—Question of Mr. H. A. Herbert ...	702
Final Reduction of the Wine Duties—Question of Lord Henry Thynne ...	703
Ventilation of the National Gallery—Question of Lord William Graham ...	704
Purification of the Serpentine—Question of Mr. Joseph Locke ...	706
Fire Insurances—Motion of Mr. H. B. Sheridan for leave to bring in a Bill— Motion negatived by a Majority of 24 ...	714
Embankment of the Thames—Motion of Sir Joseph Paxton for a Select Committee—Amendment of Mr. Blackburn, that these Words be added, “and how these Funds are to be provided from the District benefited”—Amendment negatived —Original Question put, and agreed to ...	736
MONDAY, MAY 7.
Volunteer Officers—Question of Mr. Bowyer ...	749
Business of the House—Question of Mr. Disraeli ...	749
Order of the Bath—Question of Sir Henry Stracey ...	750
Irish Ecclesiastical Commission—Question of Mr. Vance ...	750
Roman Catholic Charities—Question of Mr. Newdegate ...	750
Commercial Relations with Turkey—Question of Mr. Hadfield ...	751
Trade Marks—Question of Mr. Crum-Ewing ...	752
Troops for China—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote ...	753
Business of the House—Question of Mr. Disraeli ...	754
Law of Rating—Question of Sir William Miles ...	755
Temporary Clerks in the War Office—Question of Mr. Scholefield ...	756
The Lost Turkish Medals—Question of Major Stuart ...	756
Mr. Walter and Mr. Horsman—Personal Explanation ...	757
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [2nd April] proposed to Question, “That the Bill be now read a Second Time,” and which Amendment was to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this Day Six Months”—Debate resumed —Amendment negatived by a Majority of 74—Bill read 2 ^o ...	775
Census (Ireland) Bill—Bill read 2 ^o ...	833
TUESDAY, MAY 8.
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Bill—Question of Mr. Edwin James ...	880
The Houses of Parliament—Question of Sir FitzRoy Kelly ...	881
Disturbances at Taranaki—Question of Lord Alfred Churchill ...	881
Income Tax upon Indian Securities—Question of Lord Robert Cecil ...	882
Removal of Brigadier Innes—Question of Mr. Torrens ...	883
The Graves in the Crimea—Question of Lord Burghley ...	883

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
TUESDAY, MAY 8—continued.
Registration of Births, &c. (Ireland) Bill—Motion of Lord Naas for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o ...	883
Portpatrick and Donaghadee Harbours—Motion of General Upton for a Select Committee—Motion negatived ...	888
British Museum, &c.—Motion of Mr. Dillwyn—Return ordered ...	891
Examinations for Factory Boy Appointments—(Portsmouth)—Motion of Mr. Bentinck for Papers—Motion negatived by a Majority of 30 ...	892
Locomotive Bill—Motion of Mr. Garnett for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given—Bill read 1 ^o ...	907
India (Budget)—Motion of Colonel Sykes for Papers—Motion, by leave, withdrawn ...	907
Stock Jobbing Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Collier, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment agreed to —Second Reading put off for Six Months ...	913
Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Third Reading—Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th April], “That the Bill be now read a Third Time”—Debate resumed —Motion agreed to by a Majority of 9—Bill read 3 ^o —Division List ...	920
WEDNESDAY, MAY 9.
Moy River Navigation Bill—Report brought up , and read ...	971
Piers and Harbours Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Second Night—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [6th March], “That the Bill be now read a Second Time”—Debate resumed —Amendment of Mr. Lindsay, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 19—Bill read 2 ^o ...	971
Bleaching and Dyeing Works Bill—Order for Committee read—Amendment of Mr. Bazley, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 37—House in Committee ...	978
THURSDAY, MAY 10.
The Irish and Scotch Reform Bills—Question of Mr. Baxter ...	1010
Road across Hyde Park—Question of Sir Morton Peto ...	1011
The Poor Law Board—Question of Sir Morton Peto ...	1011
Marines in China—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	1012
The Abstracted Army Examination Papers—Question of Major Sibthorp ...	1012
The Garrisons of Hong Kong and Canton—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	1012
The Army Estimates—Question of Sir Stafford Northcote ...	1013
The National Defences—Question of Mr. Palk ...	1013
General Garibaldi's Expedition—Question of Sir De Lacy Evans ...	1013
States of the Church—The Papal Government—Question of Mr. Hennessey ...	1013
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—Question of Mr. Ayrton ...	1014
Ways and Means—House in Committee ...	1015
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—Order for Committee read—Amendment of Mr. Palk, that the Bill be committed this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived —House in Committee ...	1033
Fisheries (Scotland) Bill—Order for Consideration read—Bill to be read 3 ^o To-morrow ...	1062
FRIDAY, MAY 11.
The Indigo Disturbances, Bengal—Question of Mr. Kinnaird ...	1085
The Madras Irrigation Company—Question of Mr. Smollett ...	1085
Forgery of Trade Marks—Question of Mr. Bass ...	1086
Lunatics in Scotland—Question of Mr. E. Ellice (St. Andrews) ...	1086
Course of Public Business—Question of Mr. Disraeli ...	1087
Captain Grant's Military Cooking Inventions—Observations of Colonel Lindsay ...	1087
Harbours of Refuge—Question of Mr. Lindsay ...	1090
Medical Officers of the Navy—Question of Sir Edward Grogan ...	1092

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

FRIDAY, MAY 11— continued .		Page
Mortar Vessels and Gunboats—Question of Mr. W. Ewart	...	1092
Costs of Prosecutions—Observations of Mr. Howes	...	1102
Mortar Vessels and Gunboats—Observations of Sir Frederic Smith	...	1103
The Foreign Office—Question of Sir John Shelley	...	1105
Collisions at Sea—Observations of Mr. Digby Seymour	...	1107
French Fortifications at St. Pierre—Observations of Mr. Haliburton	...	1109
Case of Mr. Spitz-Goldstein—Observations of Mr. Roebuck	...	1113
Forage Contracts in Ireland—Observations of Mr. Pollard-Urquhart	...	1114
The Reform Bill—Question of Mr. Edwin James	...	1115
Chablais and Faucigny—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	...	1116
The Irish Reform Bill—Question of Mr. Vincent Scully	...	1117
Measurement of Gas—Question of Mr. H. B. Sheridan	...	1125
Insurrection in Sicily—Question of Mr. Grant Duff	...	1128
Recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan—Question of Mr. Dauby Seymour	...	1130
Practice of the House—Report of Resolutions from Committees of Ways and Means—Observations of Mr. Bouverie	1161
Army—(Pensions for Wounds)—Motion of Colonel North for an Address—Motion agreed to	1169
Thames Embankment—Committee appointed	1176

MONDAY, MAY 14.
The Queen's Birthday—Question of Sir Frederick Smith	...	1204
Portpatrick and Donaghadee Harbours—Question of General Upton	...	1204
Newspapers Conveyance, &c., Bill—Question of Mr. Baines—Second Reading read and discharged —Bill withdrawn	1205
Foreign Enlistment—Question of Mr. Steuart	...	1206
Fairs and Markets in Ireland—Question of Sir Hugh Cairns	...	1206
Order of Business—Question of Mr. Disraeli	...	1206
The New Bronze Coinage—Question of Mr. Black	...	1207
Savings Banks Bill—Question of Sir Henry Willoughby	...	1208
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—Question of Mr. E. P. Bouverie	...	1208
Practice of the House—Report of Resolutions from Committees of Ways and Means—The Wine Licences Bill—Irregularity, and Orders thereon	1208
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—House in Committee	...	1213
Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention Bill—House in Committee	...	1258
Mr. Drought and the Post Office—Order [19th April] for Returns relative thereto, read—Motion of Mr. Laing that the Order be discharged—Debate adjourned till To-morrow	1261

TUESDAY, MAY 15.
Parochial Constables—Question of Mr. Deedes	...	1283
Conveyance of Voters Bill—Question of Mr. Hunt	...	1284
Wine Licences—Question of Mr. Dutton	...	1284
The Quays of Dublin—Question of Sir Edward Grogan	...	1284
Italy and France—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	...	1284
Russia and Turkey—Question of Mr. John Locke	...	1285
Inland Bonding Warehouses—Question of Mr. Hadfield	...	1286
Order of Business—Question of Mr. Disraeli	...	1286
The Derby Day—Question of Mr. Edwin James	...	1286
Recreation Grounds—Resolutions of Mr. Slaney, put and negatived	...	1287
Life Models in Schools of Art—Motion of Lord Haddo negatived by a Majority of 115	1293
Highways (South Wales)—Motion of Viscount Emlyn for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given	1298
Turnpike Roads and Bridges—Motion of Mr. Alcock for an Address—Motion negatived by a Majority of 66...	1299
East India (Army) Order of the Bath—Motion of Sir Henry Stracey for Papers—Motion negatived	1304

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
TUESDAY, MAY 15—continued.
Navy (Gun and Mortar Boats)—Motion of Sir Charles Napier for Returns— Motion by leave withdrawn ...	1308
The Late Prize Fight—South Eastern Railway—Motion of Lord Lovaine for Papers—Motion agreed to ...	1319
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Sir John Walsh that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Debate adjourned till Thursday ...	1325
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill—Bill read 2 ^o ...	1346
Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill—Second Reading deferred till Thursday ...	1348
WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh) Bill—Order for Second Reading read— Amendment of Mr. Hadfield that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment, by leave, withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^o ...	1348
THURSDAY, MAY 17.
The Whitsuntide Holidays—Adjournment of the House till Monday next ...	1364
The Paper Duty—Question of Mr. Stansfeld ...	1364
Yeomanry Horse Duty—Question of Mr. Peacocke ...	1365
Italy—Insurrection in Sicily—Subscriptions for Garibaldi—Observations of Mr. Hennessy ...	1367
Army (Pensions for Wounds) Her Majesty's Reply to Address brought up by Lord Proby, (Comptroller of the Household) ...	1388
The Reformatory System in Ireland—Question of Lord Claud Hamilton ...	1388
Italy—Insurrection in Sicily—Subscriptions for Garibaldi—Observations of Mr. G. W. Hope ...	1393
The Defective Gunboats—Question of Sir Frederic Smith ...	1413
Civil Service Estimates—Question of Mr. Augustus Smith ...	1421
Chinese Customs—Question of Mr. Wyld ...	1423
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—House in Committee ...	1423
Roman Catholic Charities Bill—House in Committee ...	1437
Innkeepers' Liability Bill—House in Committee ...	1438
MONDAY, MAY 21.
Civil Service (India)—Question of Mr. Alderman Copeland ...	1548
Naval Freight Money—Question of Sir George Pechell ...	1549
Protection under the British Flag—Question of Mr. Dalglish ...	1549
The Indian Army—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	1550
County Rates Expenditure Bill—Question of Sir John Trelawny ...	1551
The Sicilian Insurrection—Question of Mr. A. W. Kinglake ...	1552
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—House in Committee ...	1552
Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Salaries) Bill—House in Committee ...	1560
Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—House in Committee ...	1564
Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts—House in Committee ...	1586
TUESDAY, MAY 22.
Tax Bills—Excise Duty on Paper—Notice of Motion by Viscount Palmerston ...	1608
Court of Probate—Question of Sir John Shelley ...	1608
The Convict Establishment at Bermuda—Observations of Lord Naas ...	1611
Tax Bills—Excise Duty on Paper—Question of Mr. Whalley ...	1614
Public Business—Motion of Viscount Palmerston—Motion agreed to ...	1616
Yerk Assizes—Question of Mr. Deedes ...	1617
Regium Donum—Grant to Non-conforming Ministers in Ireland ...	1618
Coroners' Bill (No. 3)—Motion of Mr. Cobbett for leave to bring in a Bill— Leave given ...	1631
Gunboats and Mortar Vessels—Motion of Sir Frederic Smith for the Appoint- ment of a Select Committee—House Counted out ...	1632

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

THURSDAY, MAY 24.		Page
Indian Tariff—Question of Mr. Gregson	...	1652
Tax Bills—The Paper Duty Bill—Motion of Viscount Palmerston, that a Committee be appointed—Motion agreed to —Committee appointed	...	1653
Slave Trade Papers—Question of Mr. Buxton	...	1653
Sicily—Neapolitan Refugees—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith	...	1653
Savings Banks—Question of Captain O'Connell	...	1654
Tax Bills—The Paper Duty Bill—Report brought up by Viscount Palmerston	...	1654
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill—House in Committee	...	1655
Supply—Civil Service Estimates—(After Debate) House in Committee	...	1662
The Neutrality of Savoy—Question of Mr. Kinglake	...	1677
Lord Clarence Paget and the Messrs. Green—Question and Explanation	...	1677
Ways and Means—House in Committee	...	1693
Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal Bill—Second Reading—Adjourned Debate—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th April], "That the Bill be now read a Second Time"—Debate resumed —Amendment of Mr. Bentinck, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment negatived by a Majority of 123—Bill read 2 ^o	...	1696
Excise and Assessed Taxes Act—Committee—Adjourned Debate—House in Committee	...	1709
Piers and Harbours Bill—Order for Committee read, and discharged , and Bill referred to a Select Committee	...	1711
Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Bill—Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [15th May] "That the Bill be now read a Second Time—Debate resumed —Amendment of Mr. John Locke, that the Bill be read a Second Time this Day Six Months—Amendment, by leave, withdrawn —Bill read 2 ^o	...	1712
FRIDAY, MAY 25.
Sitting of Convocation—Question of Mr. Kinnaird	...	1714
Government Land at Portsmouth—Question of Lord William Graham	...	1715
Indian Mutiny—Question of Mr. H. B. Sheridan	...	1716
Indian Promissory Notes—Question of Mr. H. B. Sheridan	...	1716
Tax Bills—The Excise Duty on Paper—Committee moved for...	...	1717
Gloucester and Wakefield—Question of Mr. T. S. Duncombe	...	1742
The Census—Question of Mr. Dillwyn	...	1762
Italy—Foreign Enlistment—The Papal Army—Circular of the Irish Government—Observations of The O'Donoghue	...	1766
Italy—The Neapolitan States—Observations of Mr. Bowyer	...	1773
Fortifications—Question of Colonel Dunne	...	1782
Case of William and Martha Brightman—Motion of Sir John Trollope for Papers—Motion, by leave, withdrawn	...	1782
Innkeepers' Liability Bill—House in Committee...	...	1787
Supply—Report brought up by Mr. Massey	...	1789
THURSDAY, MAY 31.
The Yeomanry Cavalry—Question of Major Edwards	...	1791
The Guards and the Line—Observations of Sir John Trelawny	...	1795
Land Transport Corps—Observations of Mr. John Locke	...	1803
Army Promotion—Warrant, October, 1858—Observations of Colonel Lindsay...	...	1806
Colonial Military Expenditure—Observations of Mr. Childers	...	1810
The Ordnance Corps—Observations of Captain Jervis	...	1812
Rights of Fishery (Ireland)—Observations of Mr. Conolly	...	1814
General Sir Charles Grey's Appointment—Observations of Sir De Lacy Evans...	...	1816
Military Defence of the Colonies—Observations of Mr. Adderley	...	1826
Pensions—Question of General Upton	...	1841
Our Military Expenditure—Observations of Mr. W. Williams	...	1841
Supply—Army Estimates—House in Committee	...	1862

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
FRIDAY, JUNE 1.
Road through St. James's Park—Question of Mr. Kiunaird ...	1869
Tax Bills—Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Observations of Lord Fermoy ...	1873
Relations with Persia—Return of Sir Henry Rawlinson—Question of Mr. Danby Seymour ...	1883
English Artisans in French Dockyards—Observations of Mr. H. B. Johnstone	1888
Captain Saunders and the Barque Chin-Chin —Question of Mr. Wyld ...	1888
Italy—Torture in Sicily—Question of Mr. Dudley Fortescue ...	1889
Relations with Persia—Return of Sir Henry Rawlinson—Observations of Mr. B. Osborne ...	1892
British Trade in China—Observations of Mr. Buchanan ...	1893
The Christians in Turkey—Question of Mr. Seymour FitzGerald ...	1895
Trade Combinations—Question of Mr. Hubbard ...	1906
The Chinese War—Question of Sir Henry Willoughby ...	1909
The Guards—Question of Major Stuart Knox ...	1910
The Warrant of 1858—Question of Colonel Sykes ...	1910
System of Enlistment—Observations of Mr. H. B. Sheridan ...	1911
Supply—Army Estimates—House in Committee ...	1916
MONDAY, JUNE 4.
The Reform Bill—Question of Mr. Steuart ...	1949
The Westminster Palace Clock—Question of Mr. Bowyer ...	1949
The Chinese War—Question of Sir James Elphinstone ...	1950
Representation of the People Bill—Committee—First Night—Order for Committee read—Debate adjourned till Thursday ...	1951
Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill—Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill—Second Reading deferred to Thursday ...	2038
Morning Sittings—Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill—Order of the Day for going into Committee read—Motion of the Lord Advocate, that this House will upon Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee—Motion agreed to by a Majority of 13 ...	2038
Thames Embankment—Committee—Motion of Mr. Hennessy, that the Select Committee on the Thames Embankment do consist of Seventeen Members, and that Lord Fermoy and Mr. Joseph Locke be added to the Committee—Motion negatived by a Majority of 28 ...	2039
TUESDAY, JUNE 5.
Cavalry Commissions—Question of Captain D. O'Connell ...	2050
Clerk of the Privy Council—Question of Mr. Darby Griffith ...	2050
Telegraphic Communication with the United States—Question of Mr. Wyld ...	2051
Transport Service—Motion of Mr. Lindsay for a Select Committee—Motion as amended agreed to —Select Committee appointed ...	2051
Civil Service Examinations—Motion of Mr. Baillie Cochrane, That for the future the Civil Service Commissioners shall publish, with their Annual Report, all the Examination Papers submitted to Candidates, &c. — Motion put and negatived ...	2061
Felony and Misdemeanour—Motion of Mr. Denman for leave to bring in a Bill—Leave given ...	2085
Wakefield Election—Resolution—House Counted out ...	2086
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6.
Ecclesiastical Commission, &c., Bill—Order for Second Reading read—Amendment of Mr. Selwyn, That the Bill be read a Second Time this day Six Months—Debate adjourned till Wednesday 20th June ...	2087

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

III. NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

THURSDAY, APRIL 26.

Harwich.—Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Richard Thomas Rowley, v. The Hon. William Frederick Campbell, now Lord Stratheden.

THURSDAY, MAY 3.

Berkshire.—Richard Benyon, Esq., v. Leicester Viney Vernon, Esq.—Deceased.

FRIDAY, MAY 25.

Lymington.—Lord George Charles Gordon Lennox, v. Sir John Rivett Carnac, Bart., Manor of Hempholme.

HANSARD'S

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND,
APPOINTED TO MEET 31 MAY, 1859, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 24 JANUARY, 1860, IN THE TWENTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

THIRD VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, April 24, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Law and Equity;
Marriages (England and Ireland).

LAW AND EQUITY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that he was well aware how distasteful such a subject must be to the majority of their Lordships, but he felt it his duty earnestly to implore them to give their attention to the arguments he had to offer in support of his Motion. It appeared to him that we had arrived at a crisis in law reform, and the question now was, whether there should be any further fusion of law and equity. Her Majesty in the Speech delivered from the Throne at the commencement of the Session recommended the subject to the careful consideration of Parliament, and invited their Lordships and the other House of Parliament to resume their labours in the cause of law reform, and to consider whether it was not practicable to effect a further fusion of law and equity, so as to enable the Courts, whether of Common Law or Equity, finally to determine in a satisfactory manner any case which might be duly brought before them. There prevailed in this country what he believed was unknown in any other civilized State—a distinction between the law administered in one tribunal and the law administered in another. This had arisen from what he must call the narrow-minded and technical decisions of the common law Judges in former times. Justice having been denied to the subject in the Courts of common law it became necessary to seek for some other tribunal. Another tribunal was therefore constituted, from which the most important advantages had been derived by the country; he meant the Court of Chancery. The great men who had presided in that Court had constructed a most beautiful system of jurisprudence, which was the admiration of the whole world. But in many respects it differed from the system which prevailed in the Courts of common law, and there had for several generations been a conflict going on between the Courts on the one side and the Courts on the other of Westminster Hall. Lord Mansfield made an attempt to bring about some reconciliation. But that great Judge and jurist incurred great obloquy for his endeavours, because it had unhappily been the practice of the two classes of lawyers to consider their respective rules of judicature to be absolute perfection, and to look with horror upon any attempt to alter them. He remembered, indeed, that when he himself entered the profession the equitable doctrines of Lord Mansfield were sneered at and condemned in the Courts of common law. Thus things continued with little alteration until fortunately a Commission was appointed by Her Majesty to consider what improvements could be made in the Courts of equity. The Commission consisted of eminent men — namely, Sir John Romilly, Lord Justice Turner, Sir William Page Wood, Mr. Justice Crompton, Sir Richard Bethell, Sir James Graham, Mr. Henley, Mr. J. Parker, and Mr. W. M. James. Their recommendations, as far as the Courts of equity were concerned, had been almost entirely carried into effect; but he was sorry to say that in the Common Law Courts much yet remained to be done. The Commissioners took the most enlightened view of the subject and offered most valuable suggestions. In the Report which they presented to Her Majesty in 1852 they stated:—

“The mischiefs which arise from the system of several distinct Courts proceeding on distinct and, in some cases, antagonistic principles, are extensive and deep-rooted. These mischiefs, we believe, have arisen in part from the different principles by which the different Courts are governed, and the different systems of law from which those principles are derived, and in part from inherent defects in the powers of the several Courts. . . . It happens that, in many cases, parties in the course of the same litigation are driven backwards and forwards from Courts of law to Courts of equity, and from Courts of equity to Courts of law. A defendant in an action at law, who has a just ground of defence, is often obliged to resort to equity to control the decision of a Court of law, or to restrain the plaintiff at law from proceeding to obtain a judgment which cannot in equity be permitted to be available. . . . Again, Courts of law have no powers for the preservation of property pending litigation. A Court of equity has such powers; and parties suing in Courts of law are thus frequently driven into equity for the preservation of the property pending the suit at law.”

The Commissioners laid down principles which he wished to see adopted. They said,

“It is obviously most desirable that in every case the Court which has the cognizance of the matter in dispute should be able to give complete relief.”

The Lord Chancellor

Having then discussed the various remedies which had been suggested, they continued:—

“We have arrived at the conclusion that without abolishing the distinction between law and equity, or blending the Courts into one Court of universal jurisdiction, a practical and effectual remedy for many of the evils in question may be found in such a transfer, or blending of jurisdiction, coupled with such other practical amendments as will render each Court competent to administer complete justice in the cases which fall under its cognizance. We think that the jurisdiction now exercised by the Courts of equity may be conferred upon Courts of law, and that the jurisdiction now exercised by Courts of law may be conferred upon Courts of equity to such an extent as to render both Courts competent to administer entire justice without the parties in the one Court being obliged to resort to the aid of the other.”

In this Report of the Commissioners the principle was laid down on which the present Bill was founded,—one cause and one Court. It was not proposed that a suit should be brought in the Court of Queen's Bench against a trustee for breach of trust, or that an action for assault and battery should be brought in the Court of Chancery; but that legal rights should be enforced in the Courts of common law, and, if equitable questions arose incidentally, that those Courts should have power to dispose of them without entailing on the parties the necessity of going to another tribunal, employing another set of counsel, and thus incurring infinite delay and expense. His hon. and learned Friend Sir Richard Bethell, who was not only a great advocate, but a profound jurist, in an address which he delivered at the inauguration of the Juridical Society in 1855, said:—

“For above a century this country has exhibited the anomalous spectacle of distinct tribunals acting upon antagonistic principles and dispensing different qualities of justice. It is the rule and duty of the one set of Courts frequently to refuse to recognize the real right of ownership, to ignore defences and claims founded on the best established rules of justice; and the prevention of gross injury committed in the name of law is made to depend upon the other Court being quick enough to overtake and arrest the first in its career of acknowledged injustice, and prevent it from deliberately committing wrong.”

Afterwards Commissioners were appointed to inquire into the subject of common law procedure, and the country was deeply indebted to them for their labours. Whatever might be thought of their suggestions respecting the equitable jurisdiction, their recommendations for amending the pleadings and process of the Common Law Courts were universally admitted to have been of infinite benefit to the country. He found from a Return that in the twelve months before the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 came into operation, the number of rules granted by the Common Law Courts was 38,009, and that in the nine months after that Act came into operation the number was reduced to 3,081, although a greater number of actions were brought and depending. The Common Law Commissioners were Chief Justice Jervis, Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Justice Willes, and Baron Bramwell. In their second Report, in 1852, the Commissioners stated :—

“ We think we shall not outstep the limits of our commission by so far expressing our opinion, upon what is commonly called the fusion of law and equity, as to say that, whether or not it may be thought conducive to despatch of business and satisfaction in the administration of justice to do away altogether with the present division of labour between the Courts of law and equity, so far as that division arises out of the diversity of the subject-matters over which either class of Courts exercises an exclusive and complete jurisdiction it appears to us that the Courts of common law, to be able satisfactorily to administer justice, ought to possess, in all matters within their jurisdiction, the power to give all the redress necessary to protect and vindicate common law rights and to prevent wrongs, whether existing or likely to happen unless prevented.”

They then went on to recommend specific improvements, on which the present Bill was partly founded. On the recommendation of the Commissioners jurisdiction was given to the Courts of common law in all cases where there was an equitable defence ; but the Courts of equity held that suitors were not bound by the judgment where there was power to set up an equitable defence ; so that, if judgment were given against them, they might go into a Court of equity, file a bill, and have the whole case tried over again. Sir Hugh Cairns, a great ornament of the profession, had brought in a Bill which did give to the Courts of equity the powers that were required to do full justice to suitors who came before them, whereas formerly it was necessary, when a legal question arose, to go into a Common Law Court, directing an issue directed to try the point. Sir Hugh Cairns's Act enabled the Court of equity to decide legal questions arising in an equitable suit ; but he was sorry to say that the equity Judges were very reluctant to avail themselves of the power, and it was often necessary in an equitable suit to resort to an action in the Common Law Courts to enforce a legal right, and to incur great additional expense by employing two distinct sets of counsel. In their third

Report the Common Law Commissioners, Cockburn, Martin, Willes, Bramwell, and Walton, pointing out the evils and remedies, said :—

“ It is our intention and wish that the result of what is proposed should be ingrafted upon and become part of the common law, and that the distinction between common law and Chancery law should be so far abolished. If, in addition to this, the Court of Chancery is prohibited from interfering in cases where Common Law rights are thus rendered capable of complete vindication in the Courts of common law, and in which, therefore, its interference will have become useless, the greater part, if not the whole, of the field of conflict will be done away with by confining the operation of the courts respectively to subject matters peculiar to each. Thoroughly to effect this it is necessary to confer upon Common Law Courts power to give, in respect of rights there recognized, all the protection and redress which at present can be obtained in any jurisdiction, and it is upon this principle that we have acted in our suggestions. If they be carried into effect there will no longer be the spectacle of jurisdictions imperfect in themselves and clashing with one another, but each Court will be armed in itself with exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter within its cognizance, and with full power to give all the protection and redress which the law at present affords by means of a plurality of suits. The conflict of jurisdiction will be done away with, because the occasion for it will no longer exist. We have only to add that we have given our best attention to the question whether it is necessary to adopt the procedure of the Court of Chancery in cases where it is proposed to borrow from its remedies ; and we have arrived at the conclusion, strengthened by an experience of the working of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, that the desired object can be attained as effectually, and with less expense, by means of the ordinary proceedings of the Common Law Courts.”

This Report having been presented to Her Majesty, no time was lost to carry it into execution. The Bill of which he now moved the second reading had been framed entirely and exclusively on the suggestions of those eminent lawyers the Commissioners. The Bill, for which he took no merit, was drawn by Mr. Justice Willes, one of our soundest lawyers and ablest jurists, who had long distinguished himself by his earnest desire to assist in the amendment of the law, and he (the Lord Chancellor) had introduced it without altering a single line. It had been perused and approved of by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Baron Bramwell, and all the common law Judges. A copy of the Bill and of the Report of the Commissioners had been submitted to the equity Judges ; but those learned personages he (the Lord Chancellor) regretted to say disapproved of the Bill, and had even—including the Master of the Rolls, and the Lords Justices Knight Bruce and Turner—presented a memorial against it. They thought that nothing more should be done to bring about any further fusion of law and equity. He had no desire to ask their Lordships to pass the present measure without affording an opportunity for minutely and dispassionately considering the objections raised by the equity Bench—it was but reasonable that such a course should be taken—and with that view what he proposed was that their Lordships should give the Bill a second reading, and refer it at once to a Select Committee. In taking such a step he felt bound to state that the Common Law Commissioners were of opinion the objections of the equity Judges were untenable, and that Lord Chief Justice Cockburn had expressed a willingness along with his colleagues to answer the memorial of the Equity Judges. He would not enter with any minuteness into the provisions of the Bill, but would simply state that its object was to enlarge the powers of the common law Judges by enabling the Courts of law finally and completely to settle all questions of equity which might arise in the course of actions at law. He trusted their Lordships would consent to the second reading. All objectionable points could be fully discussed when the Bill was before a Select Committee.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he was wholly opposed to the principle and object of the Bill, and should oppose the second reading. The Bill purported to be a Bill for the further fusion of law and equity; but so far as it tended to alter the present system of legal proceedings, it might be characterized as a measure calculated rather to promote the confusion than the fusion of law and equity; for it would give to one Court powers which could far more properly and far more effectually be exercised by another. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had given to the House his opinion of the merits of the Common Law Commissioners and their recommendations; but he had altogether omitted to state the objections that were urged against the measure by the equity Judges. He should in the first place draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Commissioners had not been authorized to report in reference to equity jurisdiction, inasmuch as the order of reference had directed them to inquire into the principles of pleading in the Courts of common law; the manner of conducting suits before these tribunals and other circumstances connected with their procedure. The Commissioners had therefore gone beyond the scope of their powers, in reporting that it was expedient to give to the Courts of common law all the material functions which were now discharged by Courts of equity. And this without the slightest necessity. By this process it was supposed by some persons that the two different systems would be amalgamated; but it would have no such operation; they were leaving equity where they found it, and law where they found it; all it would do was to take equity from the Courts that understood it and from persons competent to administer it and give it to Courts that did not understand it and to persons who were not competent to administer it. If there was to be a real fusion of the two systems, they must have a code of law blending together those two branches of the law, and so make the union an absolute and complete one. As the law at present existed, no man had ability enough to execute both common law and equity. The legal system of this country was ancient and complicated, and had hitherto worked well. Let them consider a moment how the Courts, the machinery of both systems, stood. As to the machinery, the several Courts of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors have chief and other clerks, who admirably carry on the important business entrusted to them, and without such assistance, from the nature of equity business, justice would not be administered. There are registrars and other officers skilled in the framing and in the knowledge of the operations of the orders of the Court. The machinery works well, but Courts of law have no such machinery. They have only aid enough to carry out their own judgments. Is the country to be at the expense of unnecessary establishments to enable Courts of law to attempt to accomplish what is now perfectly executed by Courts of equity? The division of labour has been found to operate beneficially in various departments. As the law itself stands, this division between the Courts of law and equity is of great advantage. The object of this Bill is to put an end to that division. To try this proposal by a familiar instance, let the House suppose there to be two workshops, both supplied with adequate machinery and skilled workmen, but each confined and appropriated to a portion of the work—the machinery of the one inadequate to the work of the other; the workman skilled in one but utterly incompetent in the other branch. What should we say to a law compelling the manufacturer—for no sane man would do it without compulsion—to direct one division to execute the work of both without removing either the requisite machinery or the skilled workmen from the department whose duties it was proposed should be performed by the division to which they did not properly belong. In such cases it is not a question whether originally all the operations should not have been carried on together, but whether, being divided, you can without creating a new establishment by a real union of the divisions, effectually confer on one department the functions of the other. Now, as to the Judges, there were seven in the Courts of equity—the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, two Judges of Appeal, and three Vice-Chancellors. How they had answered the purpose intended was proved by the fact that in no country was a system of equity law ever so well, or so certainly, or so cheaply administered as in England at present. The Lord Chancellor sometimes sat separately; the Judges of Appeal were always sitting, sometimes with the Chancellor, but generally without his aid; the Master of the Rolls and the three Vice-Chancellors were always sitting. There were fifteen Judges of the Common Law Courts, who had already as great an amount of business before them as it was possible for them efficiently to transact. Why, then, was the proposed transfer of jurisdiction to take place? Only a few evenings since the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack asked their Lordships to agree to the Bill for increasing the powers of the Judge of the Divorce Court, on the ground that the common law Judges were too much occupied to be able to sit as assistant Judges in the Court of divorce. And yet this important duty was part of the functions with which the Legislature had entrusted them. Then, how was it possible to ask their Lordships, without necessity, to transfer the duties of the Courts of equity, which they were perfectly competent to execute, to the Courts of common law, that could hardly do all their own work? They were quite inadequate to discharge the new duties required of them, or undertake the amount of business that now occupied the six equity Courts and their seven Judges. The consequence of the change would be that the equity Courts would not be fully occupied, and the Courts of common law would be encumbered with too much work. The machinery of the two systems as at present constituted enabled each division to discharge its own duties. But he thought, with all respect to the common law Judges, that they were rather too fond of making cases brought before them the subject of reference to arbitration, which was not the case in the Courts of Chancery. And this Bill particularly provided for a reference to arbitration. It would be found impossible to transfer the business of one set of Courts to the other. It was inevitable that the common law Judges could not be learned in the law of equity; yet it was proposed to transfer to them a system of procedure they had never studied, and in which they had not had the practice indispensable to form an equity lawyer. The consequence of referring equity cases to the Courts of law must be confusion and a mass of conflicting opinions. He had the greatest respect for the learning of the common law Judges in their own line, but common law lawyers themselves would be ready to admit that they were not equity lawyers. They had no practical knowledge of the details of equity law and they would be overwhelmed by any attempt to bring its rules into practical operation. Then, if there existed a want of capacity in the Judge, insufficient time for dealing with these questions, and a want of adequate machinery for executing the decisions which might be made, with what prospect of success, he asked, could it be proposed to confer equitable jurisdiction on Courts of law? By taking on themselves to act under the provisions of this Bill these Courts would frequently be forced to take charge of the money belonging to suitors. In Chancery this portion of the duties of the Court had been reduced to a perfect system. All monies were paid in to the Accountant General, whose office was one of long standing, and who had under him a large staff of clerks; while in the Bank of England there was a large department appropriated to the Court of Chancery, with a view to insure the security of the funds and their due application. Was it intended that there should be a similar large establishment for the Courts of common law, or were they to have a repetition of what had happened in early times, where a suitor coming to claim his money found that it had been misapplied by the person to whom it was intrusted? In the case of a fraudulent or improvident trustee the person entitled to the equitable estate would have little difficulty, and would incur comparatively trifling expense, in causing the property to be conveyed into proper hands; but before the common law Judges a fraudulent trustee would be able to make out a much better case; and under the provisions of this Bill the owner, he contended, would be compelled to make good his equitable right as against the trustee before it would be competent for the Judges to decide on the evidence. The result of the measure, if passed, would be that the equity Courts would sit inactive, while the law Courts, with insufficient machinery, time, and information, would be engaged in the attempt to execute imperfectly and ineffectually the business which it was sought to withdraw from the proper channel. As for amending the Bill in Committee, there was but one thing which could be done with it, and that was to run a pen through all the clauses relating to the equitable jurisdiction. The third Report of the Common Law Commissioners proposed that certain equitable powers should be given to the Common law courts, which were accordingly conferred upon them, but those Courts had refused to exercise them, on the ground that they had not sufficient jurisdiction. It was not, however, a want of power on the part of the Judges, but a want of determination to execute that power, which prevented them from doing so. The Judges found—and nobody was better acquainted with the facts than the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack—that they were unable to deal with the subject, and they refused to assume the authority which the Act of Parliament had conferred on them. Now, it was proposed, in so many words, that they should have the power which they had before declared they were unable to execute. The Bill directed that in cases where the Judges found they were not able to do justice they should let the party go to equity. Was ever such a provision heard of? It was proposed, as an improvement on the existing system, that powers should be transferred from the Court of equity to a Court of law; and, if the latter found itself unable to deal with the cases brought before it, the remedy provided was, that they should be sent back to the very Court to which, at the present moment, they belonged! He maintained, as he had often done, that the tendency of modern legislation was to drive suitors from the uncertainty and conflict of jurisdictions into an arrangement of their suits by way of arbitration. The Bill proposed to give

The Lord Chancellor

Lord St. Leonards

to Courts of law power to enjoin Courts of equity not to give relief, and a more monstrous proposition he had never heard. The noble and learned Lord had referred to the example of America, where the equity jurisdiction was at one time in a most unsatisfactory state. The remedy applied was to enable Judges of the Courts of law to sit also as Judges of equity; but that was not a fusion of law or equity—it was a mere confusion of Judges. The Judges of the Court of Exchequer here had at one time an equity jurisdiction; but the result of their being both law and equity Judges was, that the equity jurisdiction was administered so unsatisfactorily, that an end was put to it by Act of Parliament, by the unanimous assent of all men, at a vast expense in the way of compensations and retiring allowances. And yet Parliament was now asked to sanction the re-establishment of a system with regard to all the Courts of law which had already been tried and failed signally. The noble and learned Lord on the woolsack had acted with the utmost fairness in regard to this Bill. When the Bill was produced it had thoroughly astounded him, and he had no hesitation in saying that his surprise was shared by every lawyer in and out of Parliament; and he suggested to his noble and learned Friend to refer it to the working Judges of the Courts of equity—since the Report, of which it was the echo, was drawn up entirely by common law Judges. That was done, and the Report of the Master of the Rolls and the three Vice-Chancellors was now on the table, condemning the Bill on every ground. To every word of that Report he thoroughly subscribed. The Lords Justices had not been included in the reference, but they had also expressed their opinion in communications addressed to his noble and learned Friend in strong condemnation of the Bill. Therefore the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack—new to the Court, to its law, and to its practice—stood alone against the other six Judges of the Court whose lives had been spent in it. A more important question had scarcely ever come before their Lordships, and whether an attempt should be made to refer the Bill to a Select Committee or not, he should certainly take the opinion of the House in the present stage.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the subject now under consideration was one of pre-eminent importance. Whether it should be referred to a Select Committee or a Committee of the Whole House was a matter upon which, at that moment, he would not offer any opinion. He thought, however, that it was of great importance that the Bill should not be crushed at once, merely on account of certain parts of it that might appear objectionable, for on the other hand there were certain parts of it which ought to become law. He hoped their Lordships would not accede to the objections of his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards). The object of his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack was to enable all the Courts of equity and at common law to completely and satisfactorily decide every question brought before them, so that the suitors should not be bandied backwards and forwards from one Court to the other. That that was a most desirable object no one could doubt, and no one could doubt that every case ought to be decided cheaply and quickly, and, if possible, before one tribunal. In the object in view, therefore, he entirely concurred, although he must express his opinion to be that he felt great reluctance against passing a large portion of the measure. He objected to some but not to all the equitable clauses. He was disposed to agree to some of them, as he thought they would be eminently useful. He thought it, for instance, of the greatest utility that pending an action for ejectment the Court of common law should be able to restrain parties from committing waste or cutting down timber; whereas persons who brought an action of ejectment in a Common Law Court were now driven to a Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain waste. So, again, in cases of forfeiture for non-payment of rent. If rent was tendered within a certain period the Court of common law ought to be in a position to stop the action in the same way as the Court of Chancery would now do. What objection could there be in such cases to giving the Courts of law larger powers? Last Session his noble and learned Friend, Lord St. Leonards, introduced similar clauses in reference to insurance. In the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 there were for the first time introduced what were called equitable defences at law, and the Commissioners had recommended a greater extension of the system, to enable Courts of law to deal with equitable subjects. He would not go into the question of the original distinction between equity and law. They must deal with the matter as an accomplished fact—they found it so. There were certain cases called equitable, and others of common law. Then why not fuse, so far as they could, the two together, and say the Courts should administer justice in all? The reason why it could not be carried out generally was this—that in one class of cases the subject matter in litigation required one sort of machinery and another class another kind; and the Courts of law and equity at Westminster had not the machinery which was required for the two classes of cases. If all had the same jurisdiction, they must all have the same machinery. Suppose, for instance, a person died indebted, the executor was the person whom the creditor must sue, and he could bring his action at law and obtain judgment. But a Court of equity said that was not perfect and complete justice, and what was required was, that all the assets should be got together, so that all the creditors might come in and prove their debts, and the estate should be distributed rateably among them. The Courts of common law could not possibly deal with such a case, because they had not the machinery whereby full justice could be done. They required the machinery of the Accountant General's office connected as it was with the Bank of England, and the assistance of officials to issue advertisements and take accounts. If they had not this machinery attached to the Courts of law, what would be the consequence? why, they would stop parties from bringing their actions, and then would not be able to give them complete redress. He would not go into the question as to the Judges of either Court being equally competent for both classes of business, no doubt the common law Judges either were already or would very soon become fully competent. But this would be of no avail because if they had not competent machinery all the learning and intelligence in the world would not be of any service. On the other hand, there were cases in which it was unjust for the plaintiff to sue at all; and in which no special machinery was required, yet the defendant could not stop the action without going to the Court of Chancery. It was to meet this state of things that provision was made in the second Common Law Procedure Act, whereby parties were allowed to plead equitable defences if the Court did not feel incompetent to deal with the matter. In the first year after the passing of that Act two cases arose which completely illustrated the necessity of the alternative which enabled the Courts of common law either to admit or refuse an equitable plea. In the first case, an action was brought in which the equitable defence depended on the defendant executing a proper surrender and doing other acts which the Courts of common law had no means of enforcing. In that case, therefore, the plea was not allowed. In the second case an action was brought to recover the value of machinery in a mill. The equitable defence was that £10,000 had been paid for the mill and machinery, but by a mistake the machinery was not mentioned in the bought and sold note. The Court of common law could deal with such an issue as that, and the plea was admitted. By this Bill it was proposed to enact that a party should be able to obtain an ex parte injunction upon what was called a summons from a Judge at chambers. At present such injunctions were only granted by the Court of Chancery to prevent irreparable mischief, upon a bill and affidavit disclosing all the circumstances both for and against the party applying. No such security would, as he understood the Bill, be obtained under the present measure. More than this, it was obvious that an injunction granted with the view of preventing irreparable mischief to one person might cause an equal injury to him against whom it was granted. Accordingly, it was essential to justice that there should be an immediate and ready means of getting rid of it. Under the present system the Court of Chancery was in theory, and to a great extent in practice, always open; but if injunctions were to be granted by Judges at chambers during vacation it might be several weeks before parties considering themselves aggrieved had an opportunity of applying to a Court of common law for their dissolution. He thought he was bound in justice to their Lordships, and to the Court with which he had so long the honour of being connected, to state his views upon the measure, in order to show why he could not concur with his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) in the opinion that the defects of the Bill afforded any ground for not reading it a second time. He objected to such an extreme course, because he believed that the larger half of the Bill contained provisions to which no objection could apply.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, that dry as the subject was, and unintelligible as it must necessarily be to the majority of their Lordships, he spoke with sincerity when he said that a Bill more important in its consequences had not often been laid upon the table of their Lordships' House. Its effect would be, whether wisely or unwisely, to subvert the system of law which had prevailed in England for upwards of 200 years, and to introduce into the administration of justice a confusion and uncertainty to which the nation hitherto had happily not been subjected. The distinction between law and equity arose from the circumstance that any system of jurisprudence which pretended to effect justice must apply different remedies to the assertion of different rights, and to the redress of different wrongs. The evil which was proposed to be remedied by this Bill, and which the Report of the learned Commissioners suggested needed a remedy, was not that the system administered by the Court of Chancery required to be altered, not that it was wrong, not that it failed to do justice, but that it would be more efficiently applied by Courts other than those to which its administration was now intrusted. It was contended that as the law was one, the same Court ought to administer it; but it might be said with equal force, that the same department of the State ought to conduct the Naval as well as the Military business of the country. That a colonel ought to command a ship and an Admiral to lead an army. The science of medicine was one, but nobody insisted on a physician proposing an amputation or on a surgeon attending through a fever. The only important question was how could the duty be performed with the greatest efficiency and at the least expense. The provisions of this Bill, instead of diminishing delay and expense, would largely increase them. The effect of the Bill in its present shape would be to empower an adversary, when a right was asserted in the Court of equity, to transfer the jurisdiction from that Court which understood the subject, and which was provided with all the machinery for administering the law, to another Court which was ignorant upon the subject and which possessed no such machinery. The question was not whether some improvement might not be made in some particular items, but whether the general change proposed by the Bill, and which was termed the "fusion of law and equity," was desirable; and if so, whether this Bill was calculated to carry out the object sought. He gathered from what was stated in the Report of the Commissioners, that upon a former occasion his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth)

Lord Cranworth

had objected to the proposals which were again submitted to their Lordships in this measure. If that were really so, he must be permitted to say that it was one of the many unacknowledged or ill-acknowledged obligations which the country owed to his noble and learned Friend, who, while he held the Great Seal, unostentatiously discharged its duties in a manner which might challenge comparison with the ablest and most distinguished of his predecessors. With the permission of their Lordships he would, for a moment, invite their attention to the course of procedure that would be rendered necessary in granting injunctions in the event of this Bill becoming law. In the first instance, an application was to be made to a Judge of the Court, and if granted, ex parte, of course, it might be re-heard. If either party were dissatisfied they might appeal to the whole Court; if a Court could be found sitting—and during a great part of the year the Court would not be sitting. The Court might direct a special case to be stated, or an issue or issues to be had, or reference to such person or persons, as the parties might agree upon. But the matter was then by no means settled. After it had passed through all these stages, which might occupy years, it might be brought before a Court of Error, which in many cases could have no means of forming a judgment on the matter. After having passed through all these forms, whether it was to be brought by a writ of error before their Lordships' House, or their Lordships were to be deprived of their jurisdiction, he was unable to say—but after it had passed through all these stages, after the opinion of all these Judges had been given, after the case had been argued, the issue tried on the point of fact, and the case had found its way into the Court of Error by way of appeal, the Court of Error might say, "We can make nothing of it. Go your ways to the Court of Chancery." He was told that the Bill was founded upon the Report of the Commissioners, and that it carried faithfully into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners. He regarded with the utmost respect the names which he found attached to the Report. The first was that of a most distinguished individual—at the bar the most eloquent of advocates—the most accomplished of gentlemen, and who, he believed, in his high office of Chief Justice, discharged its duties in a manner which gave general satisfaction. The other names were those of excellent common lawyers, but none of those learned persons ever had any experience of the course of procedure in Courts of equity. He confessed that he had heard with considerable astonishment his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General cited as one of the supporters of the measure.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I quoted, in support of the principle of the Bill, his address to the Juridical Society.

LORD KINGSDOWN: Knowing the precision and accuracy of the Attorney General, it was impossible for him to persuade himself that his learned Friend had ever given his high sanction to one single clause in this measure. Judging only from the internal evidence of that document, he must say that no man in the slightest degree conversant with the doctrines and practice of a Court of Equity could suppose that the provisions of the Bill gave to the Courts of law, with respect to injunctions only, the same authority which was now exercised by Courts of equity. While professing to confer this jurisdiction on Courts of law, instead of confining it as it had been confined by Courts of equity, the Bill actually extended it to every possible case in which actions for breach of contract or other injury might be brought. Any action—the most important or the most trivial—might be the subject of these injunctions. Looking through this Report, as he was bound to do when told it was the foundation of this Bill, he had met with a passage which had rather surprised him, and which he was utterly unable to comprehend. It spoke of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery "to entertain Bills technically called Bills for new trial." He must say he had never heard of such Bills. He should apologize to their Lordships for entering into these details, but it was important that the matter should be fully discussed. A good deal had been talked of the fusion of law and equity, but he could not help thinking that there ought to have been a fusion of equity and common law Judges on the Commission. He had no apprehension that this Bill, or anything like it, could ever by possibility pass into law. He had not much apprehension that this Bill would go to the other House of Parliament in its present shape. There was another and much more important point which was not necessarily involved in that discussion, and that was whether it was or was not advisable in a different mode to attempt that which was called a fusion of common law and equity. He confessed he distrusted all attempts to tamper with the existing legal institutions of the country. If that doctrine, which he believed was first propounded by the eminent individual to whom he had referred (the Attorney General) was capable of being reduced to a system, he (Lord Kingsdown) had no doubt it would be laid before the other House of Parliament with every advantage which the greatest ability could confer. Our judicial system was like our legislative system; they were both of native growth—the growth of England; they had grown with the growth of the people, and had been accommodated gradually to their wants; and though they may contain many irregularities, and may display some want of symmetry—yet with all these apparent defects they have conferred upon this country a greater share of order, freedom, and prosperity, and a purer administration of justice, than was ever enjoyed by any other country under the sun. He did, then, trust their Lordships would pause before, under the notion of making a theoretical improvement, they adopted an alteration which was calculated to impair the usefulness and endanger the security of such a system.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he entirely agreed in the panegyric pronounced by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack on the various Commissioners who had considered this subject. Many improvements had been made in the law in the course of the last few years. In 1850 a Commission was appointed to inquire into the state of the law, and through its labours great simplification had been introduced into the system of pleading, as well as other most useful alterations in the common law system. They were embodied in the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854, and were eminently useful. The latter statute gave the Courts of common law, on the one hand, equitable jurisdiction, to give plaintiffs the full effect of their judgments by injunction, and, on the other hand, to grant defendants relief, by injunction, from judgments against them, for which they would have otherwise been obliged to apply to a Court of equity. The Court of Exchequer, when he had a seat in that Court, decided that they could only give relief to a defendant in cases in which a Court of equity would have granted an unconditional perpetual injunction; and their decision was, I believe, approved of and constantly followed in the other Courts of law. Those Courts have not officers capable of working out the details necessary in conditional and limited injunctions, with which Courts of equity are familiar, and new officers would be necessary. Looking back to the last fourteen or fifteen years, he had seen that one certain result of most alterations of the law, had been the appointment of a great number of new, and often the pensioning off of a number of old officers, the expense of which to the country had been enormous. He entirely objected to the part of the Bill which gave original jurisdiction in equity to the Courts of common law, beyond that which the statute of 1854 gave them. But other parts of the Bill might be useful. He therefore entirely agreed with the noble Lord who first addressed their Lordships in opposition to this measure as to the impropriety of extending the jurisdiction of Common Law Courts to all cases of injunction. The noble and learned Lord concluded by observing that he could not therefore concur with his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) in objecting to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Kingsdown

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he entirely concurred with his noble and learned Friends by whom he had been preceded in their opposition to the Bill, and added, that when the question which it involved came on for discussion again, it would be desirable that the House should consider whether it was desirable, when a measure of such a character was introduced, proposing to effect, as the greater portion of this Bill did, important alterations in the jurisprudence of the country should be adopted, so far as its reference to a Select Committee was concerned, because it contained certain clauses which were in themselves unobjectionable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that as the Bill was about to be read a second time without opposition, he should not enter into a discussion of the various objections which had been urged against its adoption. He could not, however, help expressing the great surprise which he felt at the statement which had been made by his noble and learned Friend who had left the House (Lord St. Leonards) to the effect that he regarded it as an act of great presumption on the part of the Common Law Commissioners that they should have dared to meddle with the subject. His noble and learned Friend, indeed, seemed to look upon the conduct of the Commissioners in that respect as the right rev. Bench might be supposed to view a proposal for the amendment of the Ten Commandments. But he would remind his noble and learned Friend that the Commissioners had been authorized to examine how far the Courts of common law might be improved, and that they had come to the conclusion that a great obstacle to that improvement was the want of equitable jurisdiction. The having made a Report in accordance with the authority with which they were invested, then, constituted the head and front of their offending, and he could not help adding that the objections to the Bill which were founded on that Report seemed to him to be based on an entire misapprehension of its meaning; for it did not propose that suits, of whatever character they might be, might be brought indiscriminately before either equitable or common law tribunals, but that if, incidentally, a question of law arose in a suit in equity the equity Courts might be empowered to deal with it, and vice versa. Any Amendments in the Bill which might be suggested would, he need hardly say, receive his most careful consideration.

In answer to LORD CHELMSFORD,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would lay the Report of the equity Judges upon the Bill before their Lordships; and when they had had an opportunity of reading the opinions on one side and on the other, he would move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He stood in a neutral position between law and equity, and he hoped there would be no contest among lawyers on the subject, but that they would continue to work harmoniously together.

On Question, agreed to; and Bill read 2^a accordingly.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, April 24, 1860.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Berkshire, in the room of Leicester Viney Vernon, esquire, deceased.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Innkeepers Liability.

2^o Census (England).

3^o Public Improvements; Petitions of Right.

FRANCHISE STATISTICS.

QUESTION.

MR. HOWES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be laid upon the Table any further Returns which may afford information as to the probable effect of the extension of the franchise proposed by the Bill for the Amendment of the Representation of the People of England and Wales, or may throw light on the grounds or scope of the provisions of the Bill, and if so, when such Returns will be laid on the Table? He said his question was not intended to refer to any Return which might be asked for by an independent Member, but it solely referred to those returns which the Government might think fit to place before them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Government had given the House all the Returns of which they were in possession, and he was not aware that they contemplated laying any further information before the House. The House must be aware it was utterly impossible to enter on a valuation of property for the purpose of ascertaining the rental of all the tenements in the kingdom with a view to statistical results. Even if such a survey were made, it would take many months, if not a year or so, to complete it. Therefore all the Government could do was to obtain an abstract of the rate-books, and it was open to the House to consider whether the rate-books represented correctly what they purported to represent.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he also wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can place any statement on the Table of the number of houses between £6 and £20 rental for which the rates have been compounded for?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware whether the Returns distinguished those houses for which the rates were compounded for from other houses. If the existing Returns made that distinction, there could be no objection to produce them.

HERRING FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to introduce Amendments into the Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill, in accordance with views expressed at recent public meetings by persons having a practical knowledge of the Fisheries of Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in regard to the general question it was impossible to give an answer. Probably the best answer he could give was, that the object of the Bill was, as far as practicable, to prevent what was felt to be an injurious practice of trawling. He was quite prepared to adopt any provision that might be considered beneficial.

LAND IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, what day he intends to fix for the Second Reading of the Bill to amend the Law relating to the Tenure and Improvement of Land in Ireland; also, whether he can name an early day for the consideration of the other Bills having reference to the same subject, and which are now before the House?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was anxious to obtain a day for the consideration of the Bill relating to the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland, and had put it down for Friday. If he should not be able to bring it on then he would take the earliest Government day.

PROFESSORSHIP OF MODERN HISTORY, CAMBRIDGE.—QUESTION.

MR. STEUART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any special cause has prevented the filling up of the vacancy existing in the Professorship of Modern History for the University of Cambridge; and whether the vacancy will now be soon filled up?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied that as he had no official connection whatever with the University where the appointment was to take place, he could not answer the question of the hon. Member.

THE REFORM BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask, Whether it is intended that the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills be read a second time before the measure for the Representation of the People of England and Wales is proceeded with in Committee?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to decline giving any pledge upon the subject.

MR. HOPE said, that the reply of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) to the hon. Member (Mr. B. Cochrane) with respect to whether the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills would be read a second time before going into Committee on the Reform Bill for England, had not reached him. He wished to know what it was?

The Lord Advocate

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the noble Lord had said that he could not give an answer to that question at present.

ARMSTRONG BATTERIES FOR CHINA.

QUESTION.

MR. PAPILLON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What are the respective dates of the embarkation of the two Armstrong Batteries of Royal Artillery for China; of their arrival at Alexandria; of their disembarkation there; and of their re-embarkation at Suez; whether there is any truth in the statement that the Ammunition was seriously damaged, if not entirely spoiled, owing to the defective arrangements on board the Himalaya; and whether any steps have been taken in consequence to insure a sufficient supply of serviceable Powder by the time that the Batteries can be required for action?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that he had on a former occasion explained the cause of the detention of the batteries at the Isthmus. This was owing to unforeseen events interfering with the arrangements the Governor of Bombay had made for their transport from Suez to China. Lord Elphinstone had telegraphed a message proposing to send a vessel to Suez to meet the Himalaya, so as to take the 14th Dragoons; but the reply of the Government, though despatched next day, unfortunately, from an accidental circumstance, did not reach him until he had despatched the 14th Dragoons by sailing ships. Lord Elphinstone then undertook to send the steamer Auckland to Suez for one battery, and engaged with the agent of the Peninsular and Oriental Company at Bombay that one of their steamers should be placed at the disposal of Government at Suez for the other, and subsequently he despatched the Berenice to assist. The Auckland unfortunately broke down at Aden, and was obliged to return to Bombay, and the Peninsular and Oriental Company were unable to comply with their agent's requisition, so that the Berenice was the only vessel from Bombay which reached Suez until the Imperatrix, which had been employed in laying down the electric cable, was finally engaged through the exertions of the agent at Aden and our consul at Alexandria. Now, with respect to the dates. The two batteries of Royal Artillery were embarked on board the Himalaya at Southampton on the 15th of January; the Himalaya reached Alexandria on the 29th of January; No 1 battery, 4th brigade, disembarked from the Himalaya on the 11th and 12th of February. The above battery, with three-fourths of its stores, left Suez in the Berenice on the 15th of February, which vessel arrived at Ceylon on the 15th of March all right. The remaining stores of this battery were despatched in the Simla on the 20th of February. The second battery and stores disembarked from the Himalaya on the 9th and 10th of March, and were placed on board the Pre-cursor at Suez, there to await the arrival of the vessel that was to take them. The Imperatrix sailed with the above on the 5th of April. Captain Milward, who commanded the second battery, reported that on opening the limber boxes he found that damp had penetrated into them and damaged the powder; the fusees, however, were in a different part of the ship, and on inspection were found uninjured. The total amount of ammunition with Captain Milward was 112 rounds per gun. A portion of this might be so damaged as to be useless, but sufficient provision had been made against this by sending 812 rounds for each gun of the two batteries in the Kheronese screw steamer on the 26th of January last, which would arrive in China before the battery, in all probability. Independently, therefore, of ammunition already in China, or of what might be sent from Calcutta, whither Captain Milward had written for a fresh supply, there would be 924 rounds for each gun of the two batteries.

FORESHORES.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the rights of the Crown as connected with the foreshores, tidal rivers, estuaries, and bed of the sea round the coast of the United Kingdom, and the manner in which the Woods and Forests were dealing with the same. He said he had brought this question before the House on several previous occasions, both in the last and present Session, but had somehow always found his exertions rendered nugatory by a count out. This was more especially the case before the Easter recess. Such a result would have naturally made him draw the conclusion that the question was one of little or no consequence, but as on the last occasion the Second Reading of the Reform Bill stood also for discussion, and the count out was the act of Government, the inference he arrived at must be either that the Reform Bill was of very little or his own Motion of very great importance. As applied to both questions, he believed this to be a correct description, and therefore again ventured to obtrude this Motion again on the attention of the House. If, however, it was as insignificant as some supposed, he felt it was utterly out of his power to give it an importance which did not belong to it—to raise a mountain from a mole-hill—if, on the other hand, it involved such great interests as he believed, and embraced weighty questions of law, his embarrassment was not less enhanced at the heavy responsibility he had undertaken in attempting to deal with a subject to which it might be beyond his power to do justice, and therefore prayed the House kindly to extend him their indulgence while he attempted to unravel a matter necessarily involved in somewhat dry details and legal technicalities. A few weeks ago he presented a petition from a gentleman residing in Carmarthenshire, in Wales, named Rees, a magistrate of that county, who complained that he had been for many years exposed to a vexatious and expensive litigation with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in consequence of claims which had been made by the Commissioners to the foreshores. He said that he and his ancestors had had the advantage of this property for many generations without being interfered with in any way; and in 1838 he granted a lease to a company for the raising of coal upon this land. The land might be described as freehold property, and it consisted principally of marsh land adjoining the sea. About the year 1845 the Commissioners of Woods and Forests claimed this land as the property of the Crown, and they called upon him to point out the line and boundary of his property. Now he must here point out what an unreasonable demand this was on the part of the Woods and Forests. They had never been heard of before as claiming to be neighbours and to have an interest in property bordering on Mr. Rees's estate, and when they suddenly appeared in that character it was surely their part to name the boundary to which they claimed to be adverse possessors. Mr. Rees declined doing what was required, and the Commissioners appointed a Mr. Sop-

with, a surveyor, to set out what this line was. He laid down a line which Mr. Rees could not admit, and in consequence litigation was commenced, and had been going on ever since. In 1854 a decree was pronounced by Lord Cranworth which settled that the boundary line of the foreshores was to be the medium rise of the tides. The litigation, however, still continued, but he would not trouble the House with the various phases which the suit assumed, through other parties being joined in the same proceedings; suffice it to say, Mr. Rendel, the Civil Engineer, and on his death, Mr. Bidder, of Great George Street, Westminster, was appointed by the consent of all parties to set out the line by actual survey. This was given in by Mr. Bidder in 1858, fixing a line considerably seaward to that claimed by the Woods and Forests on Mr. Sopwith's Report. The Commissioners have declined to abide by Mr. Bidder's survey, and are still harassing Mr. Rees by further legal proceedings. Other landlords had compromised the matter, and Mr. Rees stated that if he had known the trouble and expense, he would have done so too. In these proceedings another step has been taken, since Mr. Rees's petition was presented, to which he particularly called the attention of the House. It was only last week the case again came on before the Chief Clerk of the Master of the Rolls, a Mr. Whiting. Mr. Watson, the solicitor for the Woods and Forests, objected to Mr. Bidder's line, on the ground that it ought to be fixed by some tidal observations which had for some years back been kept at the adjoining port of Llanelly. This Mr. Rees said he had no evidence ready to show ought not to be accepted as the guide, and asked for delay that he might be able to prove this. Mr. Watson pressed, however, for an immediate decision, and on the ground that Mr. Rees had presented a petition to the House of Commons complaining of the delays he had been subjected to. Now it was quite monstrous that any official of a Government Department should attempt thus to press hard on a subject, because he had done that which he had an undoubted right to do, to petition the House of Commons on the persecution he had endured in this protracted suit lasting fifteen years. The case of Mr. Rees alone was one of such hardships, that, in his opinion, it justified the appointment of the Committee. This interference with shore property commenced when Lord Morpeth became Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and had been continued with vigour ever since. Between the years 1834-57, nineteen very important suits were instituted, but they were most of them compromised, so that the questions which they involved were not fully tried out. The most important of these were the suits connected with the Mersey, and that in respect of the Thames, in which he thought the City of London were very greatly to blame in not having fought that contest thoroughly out. The Woods and Forests, however, were enabled, by the apprehension of legal proceedings which those actions excited, to make a great number of bargains. In the ten years 1830-9 there were only four sales; in the next ten years there were eighteen; but in the seven years 1850-6 there were no fewer than 117; making a total of 139. In 1858 there were thirty, and in 1859 there were thirty-nine sales, for which upwards of £170,000 was received. There had also been a great and an increasing number of leases for foreshores. Now, how was this money disposed of? It was entered into the capital account of the Crown lands, and went wholly to enhance the ultimate value of that property which the public only hold, as it is now the fashion to assert, during the life of the present Sovereign. Such payments, however, were almost entirely on account of interests given up by the public, which, like those of commoners in a Manor, are much larger than those of any Seigniorial right that might vest in the Crown. A Return lately laid on the Table showed the interest of a mere Lord of a Manor not to exceed a 14th or an 18th in the waste, but in the sales of shores the Crown appropriated to itself the whole proceeds. It was only of late that these pretensions had been put forward, for in former times it was always believed that the foreshores were vested in the Crown for the benefit of the public—that the Crown was, in fact, the trustee for its subjects. The language, however, now used claimed such as being part and parcel of the soil and territorial possessions of the Crown, in all respects the same as any other of the landed estates under the Woods and Forests. This doctrine is put forth in their Annual Reports, but still more strongly in certain documents laid on the Table at the close of last Session. These embrace a long correspondence relating to the Submarine Telegraph Company, well worthy on many accounts the attention of the House, as showing how any party or company may be driven from pillar to post through the interference of different Government offices, and accordingly we have here first the Foreign Office, then the Admiralty, the Board of Trade, the Treasury, and more especially the Woods and Forests, all evoked to bully this company. Mr. Gore, one of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests uses this language—

Mr. Augustus Smith

“Prima facie the shores of the sea, between ordinary high and low-water marks, and of all navigable rivers as far as the tide flows belong to the Crown.”

With respect to the bed of the sea from low-water mark, I apprehend the Crown title is indisputable, and that it cannot lawfully be permanently occupied by a subject without licence from the Crown.”

He would ask whether even with licence such occupation could be given? Mr. Gore goes on to say—

“As an illustration of the Crown’s right to the bed of the sea, I beg leave to enclose”—what! one would suppose some ancient authority or statute or charter, but—“a copy of the Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, of last Session, which declares Mines below low-water mark belong to Her Majesty, as part of the soil and territorial possessions of the Crown.”

And to the same effect the Atlantic Telegraph of 1857 is also quoted. He had objected to the former Act when passing through this House on the ground that its provisions, though apparently only applying to Cornwall, would be found to affect similar interests throughout the kingdom, and such prophecy has thus been verified. In a subsequent letter Mr. Gore states that the Crown lands by Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 50, are placed under the management of Commissioners of Woods, thus asserting the identity of the foreshores as part of the same. He further instanced the Durham Palatinate Act, passed two years since, where this description of property in the bed of the sea, and sea-shores, was stated to be part of the Jura Regalia vested in the Bishop, and not as forming a portion of the soil and territorial possessions belonging to the sea, though in the subsequent part of the same Act they were transferred and declared to be in future part of the soil and territorial possessions of the Crown.

Now in this rests the main question as to whether such is their true character and nature, and which, looking to all ancient authority and mode of dealing with this property, he altogether denied. Without going back to what is recorded in Magna Charta, or Bracton, or various ancient statutes, he would draw attention to Cal-lis’s work on Sewers in the time of Elizabeth. Here he would remark as to the meaning of that word sewer, which was very different to its more modern use. It really means sea-ware or sea-work, and the Commissions of Sewers were appointed under various Acts of Parliament from a very early period expressly to look to the repair and preservation of the sea-shores, which, had they been considered as part of the Crown Lands, would not have been necessary, as it would have been the duty of the officers having charge of such to have attended to these works. The shores were then also treated as highways. An Act passed in the 27th year of Elizabeth, providing for the repair of the sea-banks in the county of Norfolk, showed beyond all doubt that in those times the seashore was considered in the light of a highway, the repair of which devolved on the same authorities who were charged with the maintenance of the ordinary highways. Again, an Act passed in the 31st of Elizabeth, relating to the building of cottages, and providing that no cottage or house was to be built, unless with four acres of land attached to it, contained the curious exception that the Act was not to extend to any cottage erected within a mile of the sea, and giving power to the Admiralty—not any officers of the Crown Lands—to remove such. He quoted the opinion of Lord Hale, who compared foreshores to the waste of a manor; and he also cited Mr. Chitty’s book on the prerogatives of the Crown, published some thirty years ago, and that of Mr. Phear, of recent date, to show that they were at variance with the pretensions of the Woods and Forests on the question under consideration. Certainly, the Crown had no rights which would justify their late endeavours to invite and almost compel persons in some instances to buy up these interests in the shores, as illustrated by the advertisements published for some months in reference to Hull citadel, and the foreshore of twenty-six acres adjoining. What right and object can the Woods Commissioners have to put up for sale property in which the public interests are so largely concerned without their previous concurrence? What, therefore, he wished to learn was, whether these foreshores were part and parcel of the possessions of the Crown; what was the interest of the public in this property; and what rights the Commissioners of Woods and Forests had over it? He hoped he should have these questions fairly answered by the Attorney General, and that he should not be met, as he was on a former occasion, by an attack of a personal character. The learned Attorney General had thought fit on that occasion to allude to him (Mr. A. Smith) as holding some shore right—the facts being these: that whereas now all wrecks were taken possessions of by the officers of Customs, those officers had thought fit to make use of his property for the purpose of depositing wreck thereon, which practice he had complained of. He did not know whether the Attorney General had ever been on the seashore, but if he had, he must surely have known that the foreshore—that portion of the seashore over which the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours—was not precisely a spot that would be selected for depositing wreck upon. He begged to thank the House for the patience with which they had listened to so dull a subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the rights of the Crown as connected with the Foreshores, Tidal Rivers, Estuaries, and Bed of the Sea round the Coasts of the United Kingdom, and the manner in which the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are dealing with the same.”

MR. MORRIS, as representing a part of the county (Carmarthen) where the lands in question had been on several occasions the subject of legal proceedings, begged to second the Motion.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Truro accuse the Government of having on a former occasion, when he brought forward this subject, been instrumental in counting out the House. In this the hon. Member was entirely mistaken, and did the Government great injustice, but himself still greater, for he believed the House was counted out solely by the hon. Member's unassisted efforts. The Government regretted that the question was not then disposed of; and he was glad that it had been again brought forward, as heartburnings appeared to have arisen which it would be desirable to have at once removed. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of Mr. Rees, who had presented a petition to the House. He (the Attorney General) regretted that such a Petition should have been brought forward while the case was the subject of legal discussion. It had been heard before the Master of the Rolls, and was now awaiting decision. It was an unseemly thing to make the House the arena for the discussion of a case which was at the time sub judice. But there was another and most conclusive answer to the hon. Gentleman. In December, 1837, Mr. Rees, for his own advantage, thought fit to demise to a company the coal mines under his property; and in doing so he included mines belonging to the Crown, and which he knew belonged to the Crown, for in May 1837, he addressed the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, requesting them to grant him a lease of the property he afterwards took upon himself to demise. In that application he stated that he was owner of lands adjoining the seashore; that he was going to work a seam of coals, and that he was desirous of working also the seams under the sand and foreshores. He, therefore, asked whether the Crown had already granted a demise of its mines, and if not, whether the Crown would grant him the right to work the coals under the shores. At that time it was impossible to give Mr. Rees a positive answer, because the extent of the rights of the Crown—in other words, what was the line of high-water mark on this part of the coast—was unknown. In 1845 it was found that his lessees were working the coal in the Crown land; proceedings were then taken against him, but he was informed that the extent of the Crown property had been ascertained, and an offer was made, based on the admission by him of that which the Crown claimed, and which he was then distinctly told comprised so much of the sea beach as lay below the mesne high-water mark. The offer was not accepted, and it was the duty of the Commissioners to vindicate their right. The question was heard at considerable length before the Lord Chancellor, assisted by two of the Judges, and the principle laid down by them was in exact conformity with the rule which the Commissioners had previously adopted, and with the offer made by them. Mr. Rees, therefore, had no one to thank but himself. If he had accepted the offer of the Crown, he might have been in possession of a valuable property. But he had taken upon himself to deal with the question; he had failed; and he might thank his good fortune that the Act of Parliament, enabling the Crown to recover costs, was not retrospective, otherwise, in addition to being compelled to account for the property of the Crown which had been illegally taken by his lessee, he would have had to pay the costs of the suit. The claim, therefore, ought not to have been brought before the House. It was a claim obstinately and ignorantly brought forward, after the Crown had recovered judgment against him.

Mr. Augustus Smith

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH: In his petition Mr. Rees says, all that he granted was as far as the high-water mark. He did not grant anything below the high-water mark.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The question was, what was the line of high-water mark. The shore in that part of the country was excessively flat, for he the (Attorney General) had been by the sea side; and the shore being exceedingly flat, it was, of course, a question of very great importance, what was the line of high-water mark. Mr. Rees contended that it was to be determined by the neap tide, whereas the Crown contended that the average of the ordinary tides throughout the year, that is, the average between the spring and the neap tides, should be the line. A very considerable extent of land, in some cases running even as far as a mile or a mile and a half, was the difference between the high-water mark claimed by one and the high-water mark claimed by the other side. Mr. Rees took upon himself to say that the line he had laid down was the right line, and he granted a lease accordingly; whereas it turned out that the line of high water was far higher up inland, and that therefore the minerals in the intervening space belonged to the Crown. Another case had just been alluded to, namely, the case of the Submarine Telegraph Company, but the facts had not been stated. In every case where a great public benefit was involved the Commissioners of Woods and Forests acted in a liberal spirit, and made the rights of the Crown, of which they were the trustees for the benefit of the public, subservient to the interests of the public. Accordingly the Submarine Telegraph Company obtained the use of the seashore for laying their wires. The question at issue really was whether a private individual was to take land, the rents and profits of which belong to the Consolidated Fund, and to appropriate it. He trusted that the House would be of opinion that the complaint was not only ill-timed but was utterly and absolutely unfounded. A great principle was involved in the Motion, for the House was asked to grant a Committee to "inquire into the rights of the Crown as connected with the foreshores, tidal rivers, estuaries, and bed of the sea round the coasts of the United Kingdom." Why was the House asked to examine the rights of the Crown? The rights of the Crown were as much a settled thing as the rights of the subject. The House would only inquire into any right of the Crown when there was any doubt or uncertainty about it, or when it intended to modify the enjoyment of that right. Did the hon. Member propose to do anything so unconstitutional as to alter the right of the Crown. That right was the foundation of private right, and the House would not make a private right the subject of inquiry. The other part of the Motion, the manner in which the Woods and Forests had discharged their duty, came, he admitted, within the scope of Parliamentary inquiry. The rights of the Crown had been placed under charge of the Commissioners, for the benefit of the public, during the life of the Sovereign, in consideration of the grant of the Civil List; and if any case were established which would show that they had discharged their trust in an improper manner, it would be the proper subject for a Parliamentary inquiry. But from the Reports before the House it was apparent that the Commissioners had been faithful public servants, and had been eminently successful in the attempts they had made to recover the property of the Crown for the benefit of the public. He held in his hand a Return which extended to the close of the year 1857, from which it appeared that during the twenty-seven years preceding that date, twenty-nine suits had been instituted on the part of the Crown to recover property—partly mineral—which belonged to the Crown. Of those twenty-nine suits twenty-two had terminated successfully or had been settled amicably. Three were now pending, two were discontinued, and in two suits only had there been adverse decisions. The value of the property recovered was about £190,000; and in consequence of their rights being established the Commissioners had been enabled to make other grants of land amounting to about £130,000, so that the public had been directly benefited by these suits to the extent of about £224,000, less £15,000 costs incurred. Some of those suits had been instituted at the instance of individual proprietors of land, who appealed to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to decide the disputes arising on estates bordering on the seashore. He trusted that the House would be of opinion that the Commissioners had been faithful stewards for the country. In every single case brought before the attention of the Commissioner they had consulted the law officers of the Crown, and had acted under their advice. The hon. Member had embarrassed his mind by the perusal of law books full of technical language, which he did not apparently comprehend, and was entirely mistaken in his view of the right of property in the foreshores. He had entered into a lengthened argument, which, if it led to anything, led to this: that all our great lawyers for the last three centuries were totally ignorant, totally uninformed, as to the title of the Crown to the foreshore and the beds of our navigable rivers and estuaries; and that what they called the property of the Crown was, in point of fact, the property of the landowners. A greater mistake could not be made. The seashore was always held to be vested in the Crown. It was a part of the landed property of the Crown, that had never been granted by the Crown; and whatever property was not granted by the Crown still remained in the Crown. The public at the same time had certain rights; they had a right, for instance, to embark and disembark on the shore, and they had a right to demand that it be left free for the general purposes of navigation; and accordingly it was not competent for the Crown to fence off any portion of the seashore to the general detriment of the public. Whatever was done in that way amounted to a public nuisance, which could be suppressed at once by an indictment or information at the suit of the Attorney General. But whatever might be taken from the seashore, or from underneath the shore, consistently with the full enjoyment on the part of the public of the rights he had described, remained as part of the property of the Crown. When a railway company or any other body of private individuals were desirous of obtaining a portion of the seashore for purposes of private speculation it was the duty of the trustees of the Crown to take care that the rights of the public were not infringed, and that the company paid for as much of the shore as they were allowed to take possession of. But when a portion of the seashore was wanted for any public work, for the general benefit of the country, and not for the profit of private speculators, it was incumbent on the Commissioners, and it was their invariable practice to grant the portion of the shore required for that purpose upon liberal terms. Over the seashore the Crown had, through the Admiralty, the rights of jurisdiction, but could only enjoy its right of property therein to an extent that did not interfere with the privileges of the public. From the earliest times that had been the principle of the law, and he did not think the House of Commons would now be disposed to alter it. The hon. Member appeared to retain a somewhat irritating recollection of the view he had expressed as Attorney General last Session. When attacks were made upon the conduct of the Commissioners, and the question was raised whether the property intrusted to their charge could be more usefully vested in any other body of men, it became both proper and desirable to contrast the conduct of the Commissioners with that of private individuals who had obtained leases of the foreshores. And he believed the opinion which the House would most readily express on this matter was that the Commissioners ought to abstain from granting leases of the foreshores to private individuals, who employed the rights of ownership in such a manner that if the Commissioners had done the same they would have been justly exposed to the observations of the hon. Member. It was for the purpose of instituting that contrast, and not of casting any personal reflections on the hon. Gentleman that he adverted to his being in the habit of claiming a right over the foreshores of the Scilly Isles.

Mr. Attorney General

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he expressly stated that the charges were not made in regard to the foreshore, but in regard to ground far above the high-water mark.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was sorry if he had misrepresented the hon. Gentleman's claim. From his Bill of charges it appeared that if any person happened to drop an umbrella, or any trifling article, upon the sands between high and low-water mark, he would be charged 6*d.* or 1*s.* by the agent of the hon. Gentleman for the lodgment of the article. And the hon. Gentleman in his letters to the Board of Trade, when he was remonstrated with, insisted upon his right to do so. It was unfortunate, he thought, that the hon. Gentleman had not, before bringing forward his Motion, been more accurately informed as to the rights of the Crown, and as to the suits which had redounded so greatly to the benefit of the public and the credit of the Commissioners. It was also to be regretted that he had thought fit to bring before the House what formed the subject of a pending suit. He thought the House would agree with him in thinking that the hon. Gentleman had no reason to complain either of the conduct of the Commissioners or of the law under which they acted.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that, having been counsel in a similar case, he did not think the Attorney General had quite fairly stated the claims of the Crown in the suit with Rees. Instead of claiming from the ordinary high-water mark, the Crown claimed from the ordinary high-water mark at spring tides. As usually happened in doubtful cases, each party claimed rather more than it was able to make good.

Question put.

House divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 134: Majority 17.

ROYAL PROCLAMATION (PIETY AND VIRTUE, &c.)—REPLY TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Viscount PROBY) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:

I have received your Address, praying that I will cause the Royal Proclamation for the encouragement of Piety and Virtue, and for the preventing and punishing of Vice, Profaneness, and Immorality, issued at the commencement of My reign, to be revised:

And I have given directions that the Proclamation shall be carefully considered, with a view to its revision.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. GREGORY said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire how far and in what way it may be deemed desirable to find increased space for the extension and arrangement of the various collections of the British Museum, and into the best means of rendering them available for the promotion of Science and Art. Last year he moved for the appointment of a similar Committee, which obtained the sanction both of the Government and of the House. He would, therefore, not recapitulate the statements he then made, as every argument for an inquiry which had force last year was of even more force at the present time in support of a similar proposition. It was well-known that, owing to the over-crowded state of the British Museum, many of the valuable collections which it contained were of no use whatever to the public. Professor Owen had stated that, owing to the want of space there were specimens of natural history which could not be exhibited; the keeper of the ornithological department had stated that the most valuable parts of the collection were completely hidden from the public, and that many of them were actually perishing. The magnificent collection of prints, purchased at great expense, were completely shut from the public view; the interesting collections from Carthage were hidden in the cellars in the packing cases in which they had arrived; and those from Budrum were stowed away in the unsightly conservatory in front of the Museum. Every single evil he had then alleged as existing, had, if possible, become aggravated: every addition had left the British Museum in a more hopeless state of congestion than it was before. He, therefore, thought it was absolutely necessary for the credit of the country that some remedy should be provided. For the purpose of illustrating the mischief that resulted from the present state of things, he could not give a better instance than the well-known fact that in many instances persons who would willingly contribute by gift or bequest collections of rare value and interest to the Museum, were deterred from doing so by the knowledge that justice would not be done to their munificence, and that their gift would not receive that consideration which it deserved. When he had brought forward this subject last year it was objected that his Motion, which was for the re-organization of the British Museum, was too extensive. Perhaps such was the case, and he had therefore modified the terms of his Motion this year, and it was now precisely the same as the one which had been then accepted by the late Government. The course which he proposed should be adopted by the Committee he asked for was, that an inquiry should first be made as to whether there should be a separation of the collections, and what that separation should be. If the Select Committee which he proposed to be appointed were in favour of separation, then the opinion of the Committee should be pronounced on the point whether the separation involved the removal of the collections from the present site; and, should the Committee decide that there must be a removal, then they ought to inquire what would be the most proper place to receive the portion removed. The second portion of the inquiries of the Committee would have reference to the structural arrangements and alterations of the Museum; first, in the event of the collections remaining on their present site; and, secondly, in the event of removal. He thought it absolutely necessary to have an inquiry into this subject, because he found that there was the greatest difference of opinion between the persons connected with the British Museum and the trustees. He would state his reason for making this assertion. The trustees desired their architect, Mr. Smirke, to prepare a plan for the enlargement of the Museum. Mr. Smirke accordingly prepared a plan, which was presented to the late Government, without a single one of the heads of departments in the Museum being consulted upon the subject. Surely, if those gentlemen were fit for the offices they held they ought to have been consulted. They had not, however, been permitted to express an opinion upon it, and the consequence was that Mr. Hawkins, the head of the antiquarian department, presented a protest against the plan of Mr. Smirke, proving incontestably that it was founded on error, and contravening every position laid down by that gentleman. Professor Owen had also prepared a plan, which he sent to the trustees, embodying his notion of what would be the most advisable course to pursue; but the trustees, although it was at that time supposed that the Government were making every inquiry into the subject, had not even deemed it worth their while to send the report of Professor Owen to the Government. He wished, therefore, that witnesses should be examined with respect to the future structure and arrangements of the Museum. He would also like to have further information upon the subject of lectures. Since he last brought this question before the House, he had given much consideration to this part of the subject, and he confessed that it was surrounded by greater difficulties than he at first supposed could exist; but when he saw the great anxiety that existed on the part of every class to obtain information such as could be imparted through the medium of the specimens and books in the British Museum, when he considered the numbers that came from long distances to attend the geological lectures delivered at the institution in Jermyn Street, and when he considered the evidence given by Professor Owen before a Committee of that House to the effect that in not being a medium of instruction as well as of exhibition the British Museum was not performing the functions which the public had a right to demand it should discharge, he thought it would only be a proper deference to public opinion if the Committee should, at least, inquire whether the difficulties attending the establishment of lectures were insuperable, and what those difficulties were. Another point upon which he should like some further information was the law as it now stood. At present none of the specimens could be removed except by sale or exchange. He should like the opinion of scientific men to be taken upon the question whether it would not be advisable to draught specimens and books not required at the British Museum to district libraries and museums, where they would be most thankfully received and be of considerable value. He knew a strong feeling existed upon this subject, particularly at the east end of London, where there was a total absence of any such source of rational amusement. Duplicate books and specimens might thus be got rid of with advantage. Having thus foreshadowed the principal objects he sought to attain by the appointment of the Committee in question, he might add, that he did not hesitate to state his own opinion to be decidedly in favour of separation, but adverse to any removal of the collections. He believed that on the present site increased space might be found, and that it was infinitely better in every respect than the site to which it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as appeared perfectly clear from the printed papers, to remove the collections. A paper was presented to the House the other day, from which it appeared that Mr. Smirke was requested by the trustees to draw up a comparison of the expense attending fresh buildings at Brompton, and buildings close to the site of the Museum; and it appeared that the saving on the side of South Kensington was £212,500. He supposed that this must be the economical reason why the regard their decision as entitled to weight, for out of the nine in favour of removal, six were Cabinet Ministers whipped up for the occasion, seldom attending on other occasions; and the majority of one was secured by the lucky arrival of Lord Granville. The decision in favour of the removal to Brompton was the opinion of trustees who rarely showed their faces at the Museum; and was at the same time entirely contrary to the feeling of the working staff of trustees, and did not therefore carry the slightest weight to his mind. Last year the Natural History sub-Committee of the trustees expressed themselves, in the interests of science, adverse to the change; and the memorial, signed by a large number of scientific men, protesting against the severance of the collections, ought to have made the Government pause before they decided on this course without any inquiry. In this document, after giving six reasons against the removal, the memorialists stated that if the removal was to any considerable distance from the present central site, it would be received with extreme disfavour by the mass of the inhabitants of the metropolis, especially when it was remembered that by far the larger number of visitors to the Museum frequented the halls containing the Natural History collection. They enlarged on the advantages which at present accrued from having collections of scientific objects ranged around a library illustrative of their contents; and a gentleman occupying a high position in the Museum recently mentioned to him an instance of the appreciation of this advantage shown by intelligent foreigners. The gentleman in question was congratulated by some French visitors on the superiority of the British Museum over foreign collections in this respect. "At the Jardin des Plantes," they said, "when we want information on any specimen, we have to run to the Bibliothèque Impériale; so at the Louvre, when inspecting the collection of antiquities; while here you have all your collections together." And when his informant declared that the Government were thinking of foregoing this advantage by the removal of the Natural History Collections his French friends could hardly believe that he was in earnest. The only reasons which could influence the Government in and risk which would attend the removal of these fragile collections to such a distance, must be considered. In the next place, it was to be remembered that, if they were established at Brompton, it would be necessary to have a library of Natural History there, and that the library, with the salaried staff which would be necessary, would cost a considerable sum. Then, again, although there might be a difference of £212,000 in favour of the Brompton site, a large sum must be paid down for the construction of the requisite Museum, whereas, on the present site, they need not purchase at once the whole extent of land required, but might take what they wanted when they thought proper, paying for it accordingly. Moreover, it was well to consider the unbounded ideas which unbounded space gave. It was but natural that the heads of departments should make large demands, but in his opinion it was not well to be encumbered with enormous collections. It was better to put a restriction upon the space to be filled, and to have a well-assorted collection of objects, rather than an immense extent of ground and an immense number of specimens, many of which might not be required. He did not think that the Government could undertake a more unpopular task than that of transferring these collections to a distant district. It was notorious that the Natural History collections were the most popular portions of the Museum, the obvious reasons being that persons in a humble position of life were able to understand the objects contained in them, and did not require the special education which an assemblage of Egyptian, Assyrian, and Roman antiquities demanded for their appreciation. Besides, there was a strong feeling abroad that a kind of filtration was going on towards Brompton, and a feeling, also, was gaining ground that some portion of the rivulet of public generosity should flow to the eastern as well as the western part of the Metropolis. On this point he had received a letter from a clergyman (the Rev. Mr. Hewlett), who referred to the East India Museum, the only one east of Temple-bar, and said that in ten months upwards of 200,000 persons had visited this Museum, which was only open two days a week, giving an average of 2,500 a day; and that during or was ~~and~~ involving a great prospective expenditure of the public money. He could not, therefore, by any means submit to the censure of the hon. Gentleman against the Members of the Government who attended on the occasion referred to. He was not present at that meeting himself, but if he had been he would undoubtedly have given his vote with the majority. He wished to express his opinion, founded on inquiry, that it was not expedient for the interest of the management of the British Museum that an attempt should be made to purchase land in the immediate neighbourhood, but rather that a portion of the collection should be removed. He would say nothing as to the site to which that removal should take place. The hon. Gentleman, it appeared, thought that Kensington was too far to the west of London. If a more eligible site could be found in the eastern or northern portions of the metropolis, the hon. Gentleman had only to indicate it and it would be fairly considered. But wherever that site might be, he felt satisfied that it would be acquired at much less cost than would attend the purchase of land in the immediate neighbourhood of the Museum. He thought too, that the hon. Gentleman had somewhat exaggerated the danger attendant on the removal of some of the collections. It had been suggested that an additional story should be placed on the existing building which would render an enlargement of the site unnecessary, but on an examination of the plans great difficulties were discovered. All the collections in the top floors would have to be removed to other parts of the Museum, and that would necessitate the closing of the whole of the collections for several years. On the whole, therefore, although the trustees were favourably disposed towards the plan, it was considered that it would be impracticable. The hon. Gentleman adverted to the question of duplicates. He had proposed that duplicates should be removed from the British Museum to district museums to be established in different parts of the country. That also was a question which resolved itself into one of additional expenditure. If that House chose to found a number of district museums, and send the spare specimens in the British Museum to them, it was of course open for them to do so; but it would

Mr. Gregory

from the duplicates of the British Museum. He did not believe from what he had heard that there were any number of duplicates in the natural history collection. With regard to the books, it was his belief that the custom had been to sell what were, strictly speaking, duplicates, of which there was not a great number, except when the King's collection was added to the Museum. No doubt what ordinary persons would call duplicates were not so called at the British Museum. If a person had ten copies of Shakspeare or Milton in his library he would call them duplicates; but the British Museum did not consider copies of our classical authors of different dates as duplicates. It was well known that an old copy of Shakspeare was the most valuable of the whole, and nobody would think of selling that. If, therefore, district museums were founded they would have to be provided both in the natural history collections and in books by fresh purchases. With regard to the question of lectures, that also was a question which resolved itself into one of expense, and he was not aware of any institution like the British Museum, either in this country or abroad, at which lectures were regularly delivered—so as to render it a place of education as well as a place of exhibition. If the House wished to engraft on the Museum an institution for lecturing it would be necessary to build lecture-rooms and employ persons competent to deliver lectures, in addition to those already employed. No doubt, gratuitous lectures, assisted by a fine collection, would be attractive and beneficial, but it was a question of expenditure. It would be a system of endowed education, and he was not at all blind to the advantages it would confer, but he said again, it was a question of expense. As far as his own personal tastes were concerned, he thought such expenditure should be incurred, but he was bound at the same time to have regard to the state of the public revenue and expenditure, and he would remind them that they already voted £1,000,000 annually for science and art, in addition to the expenditure on the British Museum, an amount that would have to be largely increased. With these remarks he should offer no objection to the Motion.

MR. TURNER said, the right hon.

sons. That museum was perfectly unique, being, in fact, a type of all India in its manufacturing, social, ethnological, and physical features, and comprising specimens of all its raw produce; but he regretted to say that it was being broken up, waggon-loads of the natural history departments having been removed to the British Museum, he feared to be buried in its cellars from want of space. He believed that to break up the natural history department of the British Museum would be very injurious, and he hoped that project would not be carried out.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I agree with those who have said that this is entirely a question of expense. It turns on that alone, and its being a question of expense sufficiently accounts for that difference of opinion which my hon. Friend who introduced the subject criticised as having taken place at the meeting of the trustees to which he referred. Though an official trustee I am not able very frequently to attend the meetings of the trustees; but, understanding that a matter of importance was likely to come on, I thought it my duty to attend on the occasion referred to, not only on behalf of the Government but of the public. And when my hon. Friend draws a contrast between the opinions of the working members of the trust and those who are members of the Government, I wish him to bear in mind this distinction, that the working trustees have no interests to consider except those of the Museum, and what will best accomplish the purposes for which the Museum is established, while the Members of the Government are responsible to this House and the country for any measures that may involve a large expenditure; and we should have been forgetful of our duty if, knowing that a question was likely to be discussed involving great additional expense to the public, we had not attended for the purpose of hearing what arguments might be brought forward, and stating our opinion why such expenses could not properly be incurred. I agree with the hon. Member, that if the question simply were, will you maintain in the present Museum everything that is there congregated, and add to it on the spot all the additions that from time to time are collected, and if that can be done without any expense to the public, it would be preferable to continue the collection and all the additions that to subdivide and remove the collection or any part of it to another place. But we were informed that the building as now constituted does not adequately hold the collections on the spot, and therefore will not be sufficient to hold these that from time to time may be added. In point of fact there are various portions of valuable collections sent to the Museum that are stowed away where they are not accessible to those who wish to see them. Then the question arises, if you are to remove some portions of the collection, what portions ought, and what portions ought not to be removed. At the meeting I attended, we came to the conclusion that the books and the antiquities formed that portion of the collection that ought not to be removed. It then followed, as a matter of course, that the portion to be removed must be the natural history collection. The next question was, how can additional space be best obtained. Could it be obtained in immediate contiguity to the present building no doubt that would be better than securing it in some more distant locality. On that occasion we had calculations before us to prove that the difference of expense between getting that space which was assumed to be necessary in immediate contiguity to the present building, and obtaining a site in the suburbs would be upwards of £200,000. Now, no person all responsible for the expenditure of public money could hesitate in giving opinion adverse to an arrangement that would involve an unnecessary expenditure of £200,000. I have no objections to the appointment of the Committee now for. I think, on the contrary, that it will be a useful Committee; and if it will be that adequate space can be obtained for extension of the collection at the Museum and for accommodating those collections that are not now seen, at a less expense in the neighbourhood of the Museum elsewhere, the question will receive consideration from the House when Report is made. I cannot think, however, considering that the ground in immediate contiguity to the Museum is covered with large houses, and must be very valuable property, that any given space in that quarter can be as cheaply purchased as the same space elsewhere where the ground is not covered with houses, and, consequently, not so valuable. As to the calculations made by the hon. Member for Manchester

INNKEEPERS LIABILITY BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

COLONEL SMYTH, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to limit the liability of innkeepers, said, that the statute law which now regulated the liability of innkeepers dated from the reign of Queen Elizabeth. By an Act passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, an innkeeper was rendered liable for the goods of his guests in manner à fra hospitium, but not in the field or adjacent premises. By the common law innkeepers were bound to receive any guest who presented himself, and if they refused accommodation they were liable to an action and indictment. This enactment had borne heavily on innkeepers who had severely suffered from its provisions. In former days, when travelling was more tedious and disagreeable, when the roads were frequently infested with highwaymen and robbers, too often acting in concert with innkeepers, travellers were proportionately few, the dangers of the road were great, and the liability of innkeepers was only reasonable. But at the present day, when an innkeeper's house was filled night after night and for hours in the day with fresh guests, all strangers to him, it was not, he thought too much to ask that an innkeeper should only be responsible for goods above a certain value, which were actually placed in his charge. His attention was drawn to this subject by a trial at the assizes in the north of England, consequent upon a robbery committed at one of the inns in York. A considerable amount of property was taken from the bedroom of a traveller by a person supposed to have been concealed under his bed. The suspected thief escaped early in the morning, and was apprehended some weeks afterwards, but was not indicted for the robbery, as the evidence did not make a conviction probable. The owner of the lost property, however, brought his action against the innkeeper for restitution. The defence set up was that the innkeeper was not liable so long as the owner had personal control over his property. The law was, however, differently, and doubtless correctly, laid down by the learned Judge who tried the case, affirming the liability of the innkeeper, who had to pay a sum of £200, besides the value of the lost property.

to him that an innkeeper should only be liable for goods exceeding a certain value actually placed in his custody or delivered to his charge. This limitation of liability was recognized in almost every other business. Common carriers by the 11th of George IV., and the 1st of William IV., obtained exemption from unlimited liability. Railway companies had obtained a similar exemption, and it must be borne in mind that such limitation did not supersede, but confined within certain limits, the common law liability. He now sought to apply that principle to innkeepers. He proposed to make them liable, as at present, for goods up to a certain value, say £40. So far the present law would be unaltered; but he proposed that the value of goods above that amount should be declared to the innkeeper, and, if necessary, deposited with him for safe custody, in order to make him liable for any loss. Such a system worked well at the railway stations, where luggage was deposited in a safe place, and a ticket given for it during the absence of the owner. Some such arrangement was quite practicable at inns or hotels, and would be advantageous both to the traveller and innkeeper. The traveller would obtain safe custody for his property, and the innkeeper would be relieved from liability beyond a certain amount unless he had actually charge of the property. He had added a clause giving summary jurisdiction to a magistrate in cases where meat, drink, or lodgings had been obtained without the means or intention of paying for them. This fraud could now be punished by indictment, and was a serious hardship upon innkeepers. He, however, attached the greater importance to the other portion of the Bill, by which he hoped to secure to the traveller the custody of his goods, and to the innkeeper partial relief from his present liability. He would conclude, therefore, by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law respecting innkeepers and to prevent certain frauds upon them.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Law respecting the liability of Innkeepers, and to prevent certain frauds upon them ordered to be brought in by Colonel SMYTH, Mr. ROEBUCK, and Mr. EDWARD EGERTON.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

DOCKYARDS.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

MR. JACKSON, in rising to move for a Royal Commission to inquire into the management of the Dockyards.

men, one was connected with the navy, and all five were competent men. He was confident the inquiry would be efficiently conducted. As he understood there was no opposition to his Motion, he would not longer detain the House. He begged to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the system of control and management of Her Majesty's dockyards, the purchase of materials and stores, the cost of building, repairing, altering, fitting, and refitting Her Majesty's ships.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the system of control and management of Her Majesty's Dockyards, the purchase of materials and stores, the cost of building, repairing, altering, fitting and refitting Her Majesty's Ships."

Mr. KINNAIRD seconded the Motion.

Mr. CORRY said, that as the Government were not about to oppose it he should not make many observations on the Motion. He trusted, however, that the hon. Member who had brought it forward did not mean it to imply any want of confidence in the Committee of Inquiry into Dockyard Economy appointed by the late Government. [Mr. JACKSON: Certainly not.] He was glad to hear that denial, as he thought that their Report embraced almost every feature of dockyard economy, and contained many valuable suggestions which he should be glad to see adopted by the present Board. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the practical ability and experience of the five gentlemen who were to constitute his Commission; but he (Mr. Corry) doubted whether they could possibly excel the five who composed the late Committee. The chairmanship of that Committee was offered to Admiral Smart, a gallant officer, who was extremely conversant with the steam navy. Another gentleman on it was Mr. Chatfield, a most distinguished member of the School of Naval Architects. Next came Mr. Laws, the storekeeper at Chatham Dockyard, who had been employed in the dockyards for upwards of forty years. Then there was Mr. Andrew Murray, the chief engineer at Portsmouth, who had formerly been in the service of Mr. Fairbairn, of Manchester. He (Mr. Corry) had not been able to ob-

gentleman—Mr. Bowman, an experienced civil engineer and shipbuilder, who had been employed by the hon. Gentleman himself. Altogether, the Committee was such that, however well the Commission might be constituted, it could hardly be better qualified. He believed considerable misapprehension prevailed as to the difference in the cost of building ships in the Royal and private yards. The prices in the dockyards were no doubt higher than those charged in other yards; but he thought in making the comparison due regard was not paid to this fact that the scantling used in the naval dockyards was much larger; that the material generally was of a larger description, and also the work turned out was of a better and more durable character. It was with surprise and regret that he heard the noble Secretary of the Admiralty the other night repeat the assertion which he made last year, that £5,000,000 of the dockyard expenditure could not be accounted for. That statement had been distinctly disproved by a paper which had been laid on the table of the House from the Surveyor of the Navy. A calculation had likewise been entered into last year by his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, from which it appeared that the quantity which could be built by one shipwright in the course of the year was eight tons. Estimating the cost of labour at only £2 12s. a ton, it would be found that the wages of shipwrights at this rate would be little more than £20 a year; whereas they knew that their actual earnings were nearly three times that amount. This would go far to account for the difference referred to. So far from private dockyards being able to build cheaper than those which belonged to Government, Mr. White of Cowes, on being applied to before the commencement of the operations in China to construct two vessels, refused to do so unless an advance of 12½ per cent were made upon the Admiralty price. He had been always of opinion that the subject of dockyard expenditure was deserving of inquiry, and it was partly at his suggestion that the Committee was last year appointed; but he confessed, judging from the result of their labours, he did not entertain any very sanguine expectations as to the results which would follow from the Royal Commission at present moved for.

of men who were only beginning to acquire a knowledge of their business, when at the end of two or three years they were returned out to make room for others equally ignorant as they had been, while the subordinates did practically what they pleased, knowing that they were subject to no responsibility. All attempts to go to the root of the evil would be ineffectual till a Board was appointed which should no longer be subject to the caprices of fortune that befell Administrations, but should be composed of men practically conversant with the duties which they were about to undertake, and above all, with a man at their head of character, professional knowledge, and established ability, whose responsible position should be the best voucher to the country for the conduct of those establishments. Entertaining those views, he should have embodied them in the form of an Amendment to the Motion, but it had been suggested to him that a Royal Commission was not a tribunal of such a character as could most fittingly deal with the reconstruction of the Board of Admiralty.

Mr. LINDSAY said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down was continually finding fault with the Board of Admiralty. He (Mr. Lindsay), however, thought that any hon. Gentleman, before he condemned the system, was bound to state that he was prepared to propose a better. But he could not call to his recollection that the hon. Gentleman had ever stated what he would propose as a substitute for the present Board of Admiralty. He supposed the hon. Member wished that the Lords of the Admiralty should not go out of office with every change in the Administration. [Mr. BENTINCK: Hear, hear!] Then we should have all the evils attendant on life appointments; and it was a question whether those evils would not be greater than the present system of appointing fresh Lords on each change in the Administration. He inferred also that the hon. Gentleman was of opinion that the First Lord should be a naval officer. [Mr. BENTINCK: Hear, hear!] He would offer no objection to this. He thought it would be desirable that the First Lord should possess a considerable amount of nautical knowledge. But it should be remembered that the duties of the First Lord were not confined to t

every sense of the word, a statesman able to give an opinion at any moment on the various questions of domestic and foreign policy brought under the notice of the Cabinet. Persons combining these different qualifications were rarely to be met; but if such a man could be found amongst seamen he would be preferable as First Lord of the Admiralty to a landman, although he must say that those landmen who had filled the office since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, had done so with considerable ability. He wished to say a few words in reference to an erroneous impression that had got abroad in regard to a statement he had made the other night as to the ships built in Her Majesty's dockyards. He was of opinion that they could be built for less. And what he stated to the House was, that the Committee appointed by the Admiralty, after twelve months' inquiry, deliberately reported that the cost of building ships in Her Majesty's dockyards far exceeded what the cost of building would have been in private yards; and he did not find that this charge was met by the counter-report of Sir Baldwin Walker and other officers, who had reported on the subject. The statement, therefore, was not his. It was the statement of five gentlemen appointed by the Admiralty to inquire into the condition of the dockyards. If a Royal Commission should be appointed he hoped they would go to their work in earnest, and not shelve the question, as had been done before where Committees had been appointed. There was a feeling prevailing in the House, growing in the country and spreading every day, that the public were not getting value for their money in Her Majesty's dockyards. If this Commission was to be appointed, he trusted that there would be some clear and definite points laid down for inquiry. The Committee to which he had referred had made grave charges. The naval authorities, with Sir Baldwin Walker at their head, had made counter-statements, and he trusted that the first thing the Commission would do would be to give the charges and the counter-statements a full consideration, and satisfy themselves whether it was a fact or not that the cost of labour in Her Majesty's dockyards was a great deal more than it was in private dockyards, and whether or not it was the fact that the cost of labour in one of Her Majesty's dock-examining the members of the Board of Admiralty and the Comptroller whether the strength of the Comptroller's Office was sufficient for the enormous duties which were imposed upon them. When it was considered what were the duties which were embraced in that Comptroller's Office, and what the staff of that office was composed of, he thought it would be found that some addition must necessarily be made as a matter of economy. The Comptroller, first of all, had the management, under the responsibility, of course, of the Admiralty, of the whole of the ship building, the repairing of ships, and the fitting of ships in Her Majesty's dockyards; he had the control over the system of contracts for marine engines; he had the purchase of all the vessels—and there were now a great number—which were built and building by contract. Besides this, he had an immense field of labour and consideration in the promotion and the appointment of all the officers and workmen in the dockyards and steam factories. These formed some of his duties. But he had another duty, which was increasing daily, owing to the great advance of enterprise in this country—namely, the consideration of the numberless inventions daily brought to his office for the construction of vessels, of engines, and, in fact, of every detail connected with vessels of war. This alone took up much of his time, to such an extent that it was physically impossible that he could perform a most important portion of his duties—namely, visiting the dockyards with a view to a personal inspection of the vessels in the process of building or undergoing repairs. And why? Because he was imprisoned in his office in London by the vast amount of business which accumulated upon him. An inquiry into all these things would be a most important duty which the Royal Commissioners would have to perform. So strongly did the present Board feel the necessity of relieving the Comptroller of the Navy of some of his duties that they had actually decided on appointing an assistant to him; they had not, however, quite made up their minds whether assistance should be given in the form of a professional ship-builder, or a scientific officer of the navy. And as the notice of his hon. Friend was on the paper, his noble Friend (the Duke

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

another question presented itself to the Board had been the great and increasing work in the dockyards and the several systems of payment of wages. He could not but hope that this was only temporary. He never could believe that there was a necessity to go on in the enormous ratio in which we were now progressing in reference to ship building. He sincerely hoped that the present was only an exceptional state of things. But it would be a portion of the duties of the Royal Commission to inquire whether it would not be conducive to economy if there was some assistance granted to the superintendents at least in the larger dockyards. Another important duty for the Commission to perform was that alluded to by his hon. Friend, with a view to which he had proposed to add some words to the Motion. He did not think those words necessary. He thought the instructions to the Commission would embrace the subject of keeping the accounts. One cause of the growing idea of the public that they did not get their money's worth for their money, arose from the inability of any Admiralty, be they who they might, to give complete and detailed information to the House with regard to the cost of each and every ship in the navy. He blamed no individual. He felt it, however, so strongly that many years ago he suggested to the Admiralty that they should present to the House the cost of each ship. He had the honour of coming back to this House in 1857, and the very first time he addressed the House afterwards he offered his earnest advice that every year there should be laid on the table an account showing the cost of every ship, showing, in fact, the way in which the money had been spent during the past year, and by a clear statement showing how the money to be voted to be expended. That advice passed unheeded. In 1858 he again called the attention of the House to the utter want of information possessed by the House of the cost of the ships of the navy. He stated, not as an attack on the First Lord of the Admiralty but as his deliberate conviction, that it was due to the public that they should know how these vast sums were expended. Upon that occasion he used these words:—

“What had passed that night proved more than ever the justice of the complaint so often made, that those Estimates were not drawn up in such a

Motion agreed to.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

"That an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the system of control and management of Her Majesty's Dockyards, the purchase of materials and stores, the cost of building, repairing, altering, fitting and refitting Her Majesty's Ships, and the best mode of keeping the Accounts thereof."

LONDON CORPORATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would move the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to represent to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, that many of his hon. Friends, who had been instructed to state to the House their views upon this Bill, had left under the impression that it would be impossible to bring it on that night. Under these circumstances he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman whether the Bill ought not to be postponed.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the Bill had already been postponed some half-dozen times, and, if it was postponed now, he did not know when it would ever be discussed.

MR. AYRTON said, he had given notice of his intention to move that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee, with instruction to inquire into and report upon the charges and taxes on the metropolis, and the expediency of constituting the metropolis a county of itself for all purposes of local management, and for the administration of justice. He wished, however, at the outset to say, that it was much to be regretted that the Government placed their Orders of the Day on the paper in such a way that no man could tell what would come on and what would not. A hon. Member expected that a question early on the list would be brought forward; he waited in the House and was disappointed. Another that was interested away under the impression that it would not come on, and he was disappointed too. Why could not the Government conduct their business as the late Government did. When the right hon. Gentlemen opposite were in office, he never observed that there was any of that difficulty and perplexity which were now constantly taking place. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed to take delight in the confused manner in which he placed the Orders on the paper. He (Mr. Ayrton) was, however ready to take his part in the discussion of the present Bill, and to submit the grounds on which he proposed it should be dealt with by the Resolution he was about to bring before the House. He could not but express his surprise that a liberal Government should be introducing to the notice of the House a Bill to set up anew, as it were, the Corporation of the City of London; or should devote one hour's labour in the vain attempt to make such a Corporation useful for any practical purpose. The time was past when the Corporation could render service to any portion of the metropolis, though unfortunately the time was not past when it could be a great obstruction and inconvenience to the large body of inhabitants who resided about the boundaries of this petty municipality. The City occupied an exceedingly small area—something like 700 acres in the midst of the 78,000 acres which constituted the area of the metropolis; and its population was 113,000 in the midst of a population now amounting to 2,500,000. The population of the City instead of increasing rather diminished, because every year the habitations of men were becoming converted more and more into storehouses for goods. The population of the rest of the metropolis, on the contrary, was constantly on the increase, and required arrangements to be made commensurate with its great necessities; but the Corporation stood in the midst of it, incapable of progress, and dealing in no way with the great interests by which it was surrounded. This municipality was originally really a metropolitan Corporation. It was not a narrow municipality for the benefit of a small area, but it was established for the advantage and convenience of what was then the whole metropolis. The present citizens claimed as the founder of their City Brutus, the great-grandson of the brother of Æneas; but, one nobleman's estate and then another was built upon, until London assumed double its old dimensions. But though the City was thus allowed to enlarge itself, it did not grow in favour with the Court. In former days every Lord Mayor of London when presented to the Crown received the honour of knighthood; but when the City presumed to comment upon the conduct of the Administration the Government advised the Crown to pay no more respect to the Corporation, and from that day to the present no Lord Mayor was knighted except as a special mark of favour. He might add that the general character of the Corporation in connection with the trading companies continued perfect until the year 1835, when the Common Council made a rule that it should be no longer necessary for those who elected them to continue connected with the City Companies, and by a simple resolution deprived the freemen of the City Companies of the right which they had enjoyed for several centuries. In the whole history of this country there was no more impudent act than the resolution by which the Common Council excluded from corporate advantages all those traders in the metropolis who did not dwell within a certain very limited area. From that time the Common Council assumed a mere local character, not increasing in importance, and becoming less worthy of the consideration of the House of Commons. When they were connected with the City Companies they held an exceptional position, but then they became a municipality with 100,000 inhabitants, inferior to Liverpool, Manchester, and many other towns. After the House of Commons was reformed one of its earliest efforts was to examine into the affairs of the municipalities of England. Everywhere they had become subservient to the wishes of a few designing persons, and a general law was passed reforming those bodies in harmony with the idea of the present time. But why was not London included in the Reform? The only reason which he had heard assigned was, that it was so exceptional in its circumstances that it was impossible to bring it within the scope of general regulations. The Corporation, however, with great sagacity, saw the prospect of future Reform, and wisely considered that the best way of obtaining a well-regulated Reform according to their own estimation was to be re-had since enjoyed the full results of their wise and judicious proceeding. They had returned to that House the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs as their Member, and although repeated promises had been since made of reforming the Corporation, those promises had never been fulfilled. Some attempts had been made, but they were not of a character to commend themselves to the approval of Parliament. There had been small measures to make the Corporation more convenient for its own ends, to alter the number of the Common Council, to make arrangement for a voting list in the City, and to alter the mode of electing the Lord Mayor, just such as might be expected from local corporators who were anxious to increase their own importance, without regard to the just claims of the other inhabitants of London. After much perseverance, however, steps were taken to divest the Corporation of its peculiar and useless character. Two Commissions were appointed by Government, when the cry for Reform became loud, and in the Reports of those Commissions were paraded the shortcomings and the inutility of the Corporation; but there had been a power of vitality in that body which had enabled it to survive every exposure and condemnation of its faults and shortcomings. One Reform, however, did take place which was worthy of notice. The trade of the port of London had grown to such magnitude that it could no longer bear the fetters of the City Corporation, and the Government, yielding to the demands of public opinion, introduced a Bill divesting the Corporation of its main attribute as Conservators of the River Thames. There was one Member of a former Government, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, who applied his mind to the consideration of the wants of the metropolis, and brought his great intelligence to bear upon the construction of a municipal system suited to the requirements of the metropolis. That right hon. Gentleman (Sir B. Hall) had been since called up to the other House as a reward for his services in that direction—at least, so he (Mr. Ayrton) supposed, for he knew of no other services the right hon. Gentleman had performed. That was an encouragement to all metropolitan Members. The municipality then formed had shown itself able to deal with questions of great magnitude.

be the case when they were confided to bodies remarkable only for incapacity to deal efficiently with any matter they took in hand. A notable instance of this was that a department of the State was found so incapable for such duties that it could not even clean out a small piece of water like the Serpentine. How could a body like that regulate the metropolis? A complication of parishes, vestries, municipalities, and Government offices, all meddled with affairs with which they could not adequately deal, sacrificing the real interests of the inhabitants, who had nothing for it but to pay heavy charges which a little foresight and intelligence might have spared them. The evil was gradually increasing in magnitude, and the time had come when it should be grappled with. He therefore hoped the House would consent to an inquiry such as he had suggested. Session after Session Bills were brought in and Commissions appointed with respect to municipal subjects which ought to be dealt with by a properly constituted municipal body, responsible to the inhabitants and ratepayers, who would at once remove them from office if they misconducted themselves. The establishment of a municipality would involve serious consequences. Assuming that they would have such a governing body, of course they would have committees appointed who would superintend the different departments. They would deal with the whole area, and the now subdivided different bodies would then become united together. The City of London was a county of itself. Let the metropolis, according to ancient precedent, unite also in itself the institutions of a great city with those of a separate county. Then they would get rid of the preposterous pretensions of the Commission of Lieutenancy in the City of London which now enabled a number of portly people to dress in red coats and ape the costume of field-m Marshals in the army. The county of the metropolis might have its Lord Lieutenant like other counties; or, if it was thought advisable to gratify the vanity of a group of persons, the Crown might, as at present, put the lieutenancy in commission, when the position might be filled by men better qualified for it than aldermen, bank directors, and persons highly respectable in the eyes of the citizens and

ing stock of the Boulevards of Paris, and brought contempt on the City and the country to which they belonged in every foreign capital they visited. Then the City also had its sheriffs. The inhabitants of all Middlesex were treated almost as the property of the London Corporation, the shrievalty of that important county—a situation which might be an object of legitimate ambition to its gentlemen of station and fortune—having six centuries ago been assigned and bartered away to that ancient body for money by some corrupt statesman or improvident Sovereign. That abuse ought to be swept away, and an end put to the absurd claims of a little area of one square mile and 100,000 people, not only had their own sheriffs obstructing the administration of justice in the entire county, but arrogating to themselves the headship of the rest of the metropolis, to whom they affected to spurn and exclude from any share in corporate rights. These relations must be restored to a rational footing, when many gentlemen of distinction would be found ready to act as sheriffs for the county of the metropolis, where at present everybody with a character to maintain rather shrank from the office. He should be carried about as a mere page for the amusement of the London apprentices. Then, again, there were other offices, like those of the Recorder, the Citor, or the architect of the Corporation, with salaries from £3,000 to £2,000 a year attached to them, and which might command, as they now did, a great amount of ability and intelligence, although, fortunately, those qualities were not turned to account, as they might be, by reason of the very limited field to which they were restricted. Another obstruction existed in the City police. An admirable police force had been organized some years ago for the rest of the metropolis, but they were not allowed to enter within the bounds of the Corporation, where a separate establishment was still maintained, apparently for no other object but to put everything in confusion, and offer facilities to roguery and crime. That was a state of things he desired to see abolished, for he was satisfied that the amalgamation of the two bodies of police would be a work of great public usefulness and economy. Again, there was no police magistrate which had no relation to existing circumstances. If the Act depriving the Corporation of the conservancy of the Thames were examined it would be found that in the spirit, if not in the letter, the metage was to be levied for the benefit of the navigation of the Thames, not for the purposes of the Corporation. He might here also refer to the tax levied by the Government on hackney carriages in London. That tax was legitimate enough, no doubt, when first imposed, when only fine gentlemen got into coaches; but it was a monstrous thing now to levy £70,000 a year on cabs, while local taxes had to be imposed to pay for the repair of the roads which they were constantly engaged in cutting up. And he would call on those hon. Members who objected to a shilling of public money being laid out for metropolitan purposes to help in adjusting these matters of taxation between the citizens of London and the Exchequer. Another point of vast importance to the people of London, and even of all England, was that of the administration of justice in the metropolis. That was the third branch of the inquiry he proposed with a view to the introduction of considerable improvements. With regard to the criminal part of the question he had been anticipated by that great law reformer, Lord Brougham, who many years ago abolished a most indecent system of administering justice, carried on under the patronage of the City of London, and established the Central Criminal Court. The operation of that Court had shown the advantage of a uniform system. It had worked so well that it required no defence on his part. He desired to see that system enlarged and improved, for at present the relations of the people of London to the justices of Middlesex, Kent, and Surrey, and all the injustice they committed, were most inconvenient and harassing. It would be infinitely better than the present system to have a commission of the peace for the whole metropolis, and a body of justices selected from the inhabitants, who would necessarily take a deeper interest in the questions submitted to their judgment. There should be a uniform system for the whole metropolis, which might be divided into convenient wards, suitably arranged

mitted. This would be a great convenience to the inhabitants, and the police would not be withdrawn from their own districts to attend trials in which they were engaged. This would all result from the metropolis being made a county of itself. But he would have arrangements for improving the civil as well as the criminal administration of justice. The House would scarcely believe the amount of trouble, vexation, and annoyance to which the inhabitants of the metropolis were put by the manner in which civil justice was administered in connection with the highest courts of the country. From a Return made up to the end of 1850 being the latest made, it appeared that out of all the causes tried in that year before the Judges of the superior courts at Westminster with juries there were entered for London and Middlesex 2,600 while for the whole of England, except London and Middlesex, the number was only 1,329. The arrangements for trying civil causes were of the worst possible kind. They had not only Courts sitting in London and Middlesex, but after they had sittings at Guildford, Kingston, and Maidstone in connection with assizes. What a monstrous thing it that a man living on the south side of the river, when he had a dispute about his house, should be taken to Maidstone or Guildford, as the case might be, in order to have the case disposed of! On the north side there was experienced the great inconvenience of three Courts sitting at Westminster at the same time to hear causes with juries; and the same thing took place in London, to the great detriment of a right administration of justice. Instead of this antiquated contrivance, he wanted to have a central civil court for the trial of causes at nisi prius. That Court should be constantly sitting, so that if a man commenced his suit at the beginning of a month he would have it tried before its close, instead of having to wait for several months. One Judge from Westminster Hall should sit week by week in rotation, finishing the business before him, or, if not finished at the end of the week, the remainder should be disposed of at an extra sitting. Every man would thus know when his case was to be tried, and could insure of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent. Then, is it likely that any advantage would arise from the appointment of a Lord Lieutenant or the establishment of a militia or yeomanry, or the re-adjustment of the gaols? Could a single assize suffice for two and a half millions of people? Many plans, of course, may be proposed for placing additional funds at the disposal of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I should be glad to see the administrative functions of that body enlarged, and I am not blind to the various anomalies which exist in the Corporation of the City. It appears to me that the only legitimate conclusion to be derived from the speech of the hon. Member is that we ought completely to sweep away the Corporation of the City, and distribute its revenues among the different districts of the metropolis. That is a proposal which has never yet been suggested to the House and as the present Bill, in whatever change it proposes, goes in the right direction, I trust there will be no opposition to it in its present stage.

MR. JOHN LOCKE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time, as there would be ample opportunity for further discussion on going into Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, it was his intention to take the sense of the House on his Motion after the second reading.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT observed, that he was authorized to say, on behalf of the Corporation of the City, that they were desirous the Bill should be read a second time, but reserved to themselves the opportunity of proposing some Amendments in Committee. He hoped, therefore, hon. Members would permit the Bill to be read a second time at once.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS would undertake to postpone the division on the Motion for a Select Committee to another evening if they would agree to the second reading.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he thought it would be more convenient if the questions of enlarging the area of the Corporation were discussed on the second reading. He submitted that no time would really be lost by the adjournment of the debate. He was not disposed to abandon his Mo-

Hamlets could not be discussed till the Motion now before the House was disposed of.

Question put,
The House divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 82: Majority 45.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ROUPELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That this House do now adjourn."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he could not exactly see what was the object of these repeated Motions of adjournment after what he had stated in respect to the intentions of the Government. If the House would let the Bill be now read a second time he would on a future day move that it be committed to a Committee of the whole House, and then the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) might make his Motion as an Amendment to that proposition.

MR. AYRTON said, the course suggested might be adopted if they had any confidence in the manner in which the Government conducted the business of the House. But the way in which the business had been conducted had created a total want of confidence, and the best way to deal with the Government was to give up nothing. What they wished was that a Bill of such importance should be fixed for some certain day, and brought on that day. They had never been able to tell when the Bill would come on. They had been brought down to the House day after day for twenty days and subjected to every kind of annoyance. The right hon. Gentleman should fix some day for taking the discussion and abide by it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS denied that he had ever shown any want of good faith to the House. The Bill had been taken that night because he had felt himself precluded from bringing on the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill and the Highways Bill, in consequence of an error in the printing of the notice paper. He would fix a reasonable day for making the Motion to which he had referred, and if he was unable on that day to go on with it, he would give fair notice of the postponement.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, whatever opinions Gentlemen might entertain as to the conduct of public business, or want of confidence they might pointed for Scotland, and it was thought right to give him the superintendence of the census of that country. A separate Bill could be introduced therefore for Scotland, but the forms of census would resemble each other. With regard to Ireland, the census there had always been taken by the constabulary; and, as it cost no additional expense, the information had always been much fuller. The same plan would be adopted on this occasion.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Monday next.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read: Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in answer to Mr. WARNER, that the passing of this measure would not interfere in any way the discretion of Parliament as to the imposition of any Customs' duty on paper. He was willing that the third reading should be postponed.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, April 25, 1860.

[MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland).

2^d Masters and Operatives.

3^d Pawnbrokers Act Amendment.

LAW OF PROPERTY BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. WALPOLE moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill.

MR. HADFIELD said, he could not but complain of the Bill being brought on when so many hon. Members interested in the measure were absent. He was desirous of introducing a clause enabling trustees to exercise a judgment in the investment of trust funds, so that they might be enabled and Indian Stock, which was admitted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who ultimately drew up the clause, and he was surprised now to find that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was himself proposing its repeal. He was anxious to learn the reasons for that course, as he believed the clause had been approved of by the highest legal authorities on both sides of the House. If the consideration of the Bill in Committee could not be postponed, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would allow this question at least to stand over until hon. and learned Gentlemen standing high in the legal profession, who took an interest in the subject, were present, especially the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. R. Malins), who was engaged that morning elsewhere.

MR. WALPOLE said, that in reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Sheffield, he wished to express his regret at the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), who was, perhaps, as conversant with this subject as any other man in the kingdom; but he would take care that the hon. and learned Member, and every other Gentleman who took an interest in the subject, should have ample opportunity for discussing the Bill. He knew what were the views of his hon. and learned Friend, and when they came to the clause referred to by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield)—the repeal clause—he would explain the Amendments which he proposed to introduce, and which he hoped would remove that hon. Gentleman's objections. He had prepared such Amendments on the clause to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded as would have the effect of remedying the inconvenience apprehended by the repeal of the clause in the Bill of last year.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1. (Writs of Execution of Judgments to be registered).

MR. HODGKINSON said, he wished to move an Amendment to prevent the expense now frequently caused by the registration of Crown obligations. At present, when a person became surety to the Crown jurious. It was to repeal, to a great extent, the statute of the 1st and 2nd Victoria, by which mesne process was abolished. As the law at present stood, a simple process existed by which a creditor could have a valid registered security against his debtor, without proceeding to extremities against him. This process it was proposed to abolish, and no substitute was proposed. The principle of the clause was not a lawyer's question, it was a public general question, affecting the rights of creditors and of the landowners of the country, although the details might be a lawyer's question. The consideration which the Bill gave to the rights of the Crown alone showed the importance of the measure. The alleged principle of the clause was to save the trouble of consulting the register; whereas the whole scheme of improvement in modern conveyancing went to refer every transaction to the register. He repeated that the subject ought to be treated as part of an entire scheme, and ought to be taken up rather by the Government than by a private Member of that House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rolt) that the question was one of considerable importance. It was not the first time, however, that it had come before the House. When he had the honour of being connected with the Government, the whole principle was considered with respect to Ireland. He found nothing in the general law of the country that favoured the policy of making a judgment a lien on real property. The system of making judgments liens on real estate had given rise to great difficulties and complications in dealing with land in Ireland. Under the old system, the moment a judgment was obtained, it was registered and became a mortgage; off went the solicitor and obtained a receiver; the land was brought into the Court of Chancery, and every kind of embarrassment was experienced when it was attempted to deal with it by sale. He had attempted to settle this question, but his Bill had been put in the waste basket. He agreed in thinking that the subject was one that ought to be taken up by the Government. The Bill, however, had been prepared by Lord St. Leonards, and as he thought the clause before were recognizances. He joined with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rolt) in thinking that the two first clauses ought to be postponed, and if sine die, all the better. They operated retrospectively, depriving creditors of their security; and altogether the question was too large to be dealt with in a crude way by a couple of clauses.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the present state of the law in this respect occasioned great expense, endless complication, and continual complaints, and was attended with no good result. He should like to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on the subject of Crown debts. Owing to the fact that they operated as a charge upon land, landed proprietors were repeatedly prevented from giving security. If any doubt was felt as to the security, an extent ought to be issued at once.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would move after the word "recognizance," to insert the words, "to be entered up after the passing of the Act." The effect of that would be to respect and keep in full force judgments entered up previous to the passing of the Bill, and to confine the operation of the Bill to judgments entered up after it became law.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Amendments proposed in the clause bore out what had been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Rolt) as to the inconvenience of the fragmentary mode in which this subject was being dealt with. All that had been said in favour of the clause was that it would save a search in the registry; but he did not think it would have that effect. According to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), all judgments in existence previous to the passing of the Bill would remain in force. That, to begin with, would necessitate a search, which would be attended with trouble and expense; and if a man entered a memorandum on the registry of the issue of a writ of execution on a judgment one day before the conveyance of an estate was executed and the consideration money paid, that entry would operate as a lien upon the land, and would enable the execution creditor to hold the land in spite of the pur-

ventured to anticipate legislation, and which he had attempted to embody in the Bill to the second reading of which he now asked their Lordships to assent, was that in parishes once populous, but now populous no more, and where there were, if not large, yet considerable endowments for religious instruction, the funds might by some better arrangement be made more available for the spiritual wants of the poor; and that the pastors might, in such circumstances, be relieved from the unpleasant position of being pastors in name only, having under their care dead stone walls rather than living souls. It was to remedy that state of things, in the City of London especially, that this Bill had been framed. There were other places to which the same principle might apply; but this Bill had been especially prepared in relation to the state of things existing in the City of London. An illustration would show what he hoped to accomplish. In the City of London this happened—two parishes adjoined each other; the one was rich and endowed with revenues yielding £2,000 a year, while the population, although the parish was one of the largest in the City, was only between 800 and 900, and the number of poor 100. The erection of warehouses had driven the poor of many of these parishes to seek their residence elsewhere. The very next parish to the one first mentioned contained 15,000 persons, mostly of the humbler class; and the means for their religious instruction, so far as endowments went, amounted to nothing at all, the clergyman having to subsist on such fees as could be collected in his church, and the average sum raised by those fees for the spiritual supervision of 15,000 souls was £150 per annum; out of which, moreover, house-rent had to be paid, there being no parsonage for the incumbent. His object, therefore, was that the wealthy parish with the small population should contribute to the necessities of its poorer and more populous neighbours, or rather that the wealthy parish should contribute to the spiritual instruction of those who, notwithstanding the imaginary boundary line between them, were really its own poor. The case he had described was, he was bound to say, an exceptional one. It was generally supposed that the incumbents of the City of London were very wealthy; and certainly some of them series of things was very unsatisfactory. The clergyman could not attract to his ministrations on Sunday more than thirty, forty, fifty, or at most sixty persons:—not from any fault of his, but because there was little or no population. As their Lordships were aware, entire parishes were occupied by warehouses; and, notwithstanding that in some of them young persons connected with trade lived during the week—though even that was the exception—yet on Sunday they naturally went to see their friends in the country. It was therefore, a hopeless task for the pastor, however zealous, to attempt to draw round him a satisfactory congregation. What made the matter worse was, that comparatively few of the City parishes had parsonage houses; where they did exist, in some cases generations had passed since the clergymen had occupied them, and they had been converted to other uses; and the law allowed every clergyman who had not a residence found him to live anywhere within two miles of his church, and very naturally happened that many of the City clergy lived at a distance from the sphere of their labours. Moreover, the incumbencies were mostly very poor, and it was impossible for the Bishop to order the erection of parsonage houses. The consequence was that the evil of non-residence existed to a greater degree in the City of London than in any other part of the kingdom. The present Bill sought to open up the means whereby this evil might be removed, and, by amalgamating different parishes, to secure that the pastor should live in the midst of his flock. He was now only asking their Lordships to continue an Act which had already existed, but which, having been passed five years, would expire in August. At the same time, he had undertaken to make considerable alterations in the Act, because, owing to the complicated state of things with which it had to deal, it had proved inoperative. About three years ago the subject had received renewed attention, and he had put himself into communication with his clergy. The clergy of the City of London and Liberties, formed an ancient corporation, called Sion College, and that body had devoted great attention to the present Bill. They had appointed Committees among themselves; they had caused to be made—what he believed did not exist be-bury had their houses in the City; and though it was true that Covent Garden and Lincoln's Inn Fields were at that time beginning to be overspread with great houses, London proper, the City, was nevertheless full of habitable houses. At that time the solitudes of Islington and the wastes of Marylebone had no houses in them at all, and such persons as now lived in those places were all crowded in the City. Yet, even at that time it was the decision of those who looked carefully into the matter, that thirty-one churches would be sufficient for the City of London. It was found impossible to carry out that arrangement, and, accordingly, when the churches were rebuilt, fifty-eight were erected within the space he had described. What the state of things was which originally called into existence ninety-one churches in that very limited space, it was scarcely possible for them at this time to understand. These parishes never could have contained any very great number of persons, though each of them was the centre of some parochial life. But between the walls of old London and the outer fortifications, as e.g. between Ludgate and Temple Bar, there was space in which large parishes existed; the whole of the smaller parishes he had described were belted round with large parishes. The space between the walls and the outer fortifications was probably intended, at an early period, as a receptacle for cattle in a time of danger; but in progress of time these wastes had become overspread with habitations. The practice, however, appeared to have been for the citizens to erect their parish churches close to their houses, and to make little provision for those who lived immediately outside of the walls. It was to enable them to deal with this state of things, to make what was merely a reminiscence of the past a church really active at the centre, to relieve the clergy of the great difficulty under which they laboured, and provide for the spiritual wants of the poor lying in thousands around this narrow space, which was at present so unprofitably occupied, that he brought this Bill now before their Lordships. The object of the Bill was, in the first place, to enable them to take down some of these churches under particular circumstances. He was quite aware that it was treading on dangerous ground to talk of taking down churches in a day when so many efforts were being in a more populous neighbourhood. It might be that the funds raised under the operation of this Bill would of themselves enable them to erect these churches; but those who were acquainted with the difficulties of church-building were aware that it was not generally the erection of a church, which, after all, was the great difficulty—the great difficulty was to find the endowment for the clergyman. He confidently anticipated that if it were found necessary, as, no doubt, it would be, to take down some of these churches, which were of no use; for every one so taken down in places comparatively uninhabited there would arise another in some place that was teeming with inhabitants. It was said, with great reason, would not be an act of barbarism to take down such buildings, some of which were most beautiful in the land, consecrated by the genius of Wren, or the more ancient structures—such as St. Helena, St. Bartholomew's, which carried us back amid the hubbub of modern life, to those early times, to which it was good for us sometimes to be recalled? The safeguard introduced into this Bill, he believed, would effectually prevent such desecration. The process by which the whole arrangements were to be executed would effectually prevent the removal of any of those buildings consecrated by the reminiscences of the past; but those who were practically acquainted with the City churches, probably knew that some of them had neither beauty, nor antiquity, nor usefulness to recommend them. There was no reason, therefore, why they should hesitate to remove them. He was aware that a very difficult and tender question remained—with respect to the dead, who had been buried within their vaults. They were told, in a Report lately published, that as many as 11,000 of the dead slept in loaden coffins below these churches; and he remembered that when a similar measure had been advocated five years ago by his revered predecessor, the images of the departed friends of families still in existence had been conjured up to prevent any practical result from being arrived at. These objections, however, he feared were not always raised by the relatives of persons buried in the City churches, but by persons whose pecuniary interests were involved, who, taking ad-

With the view of remedying that state of things, an Act of Parliament had been passed, which, however, proceeded on the same vicious principle of a fixed money payment; so that the remuneration still continued inadequate from a similar cause. In former times, however, the difficulty was in a great degree obviated, inasmuch as the system of pluralities existed. That state of things had since been most wisely abolished and the result was that the majority of the clergy of the City of London were at the present day poorly remunerated. He hoped, therefore, that by assenting to the present Bill the House would place the clergy in the position of having a house in which to live, and afford them, if not enough to support them, at least something approaching to that amount. He might also observe that in dealing with the question of the union of benefices he did not seek so to amalgamate different parishes as to make them actually one parish for temporal purposes. They might, therefore, for such purposes have as many churchwardens as was deemed fit, and a vestry and clerk for each; his object was simply to unite them together for the promotion of spiritual objects. There was one more point connected with the small parishes of the City of London. It was said they afforded a maintenance for learned clergymen, and that it was not desirable all the clergy should be so overpowered by their pastoral work as to have no time for study. No one would object to any system that tended to do away with a class of learned men in the Church more strongly than he would do. He believed there had been too great a tendency to this result in some of the recent legislation as to cathedrals. He should be sorry that the good effect ascribed to the small City parishes in this respect should be interfered with. But he was convinced that the passing of the present Bill would be productive of no such evil, and that under the change which it would introduce learned men would be able to obtain benefices in which they could combine more satisfactorily than they could now do the gratification of their literary tastes with the performance of their clerical duties. A benefice of moderate size, with a residence, instead of a house for which a high rent must be paid, would be more favourable to literary pursuits on the part of a clergyman than the present system.

persons who still lived within the City, and could not at present be properly attended to by their clergy, and for the sake of those poor who lived on the outskirts of London, and were to be counted by thousands, and whose spiritual wants could not be neglected, but must be neglected if Parliament did not adopt some such change as that which he recommended, he begged leave to ask their Lordships to give a second reading to the Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he quite appreciated the motives which had influenced the right rev. Prelate in introducing this Bill; but he trusted the House would give full attention to the measure before they proceeded further with it. He believed that the measure involved questions of such gravity and importance that it would require the most careful consideration at the hands of their Lordships before they gave their assent to all its provisions. The right rev. Prelate had truly said that the Bill was a continuance of the provisions of an Act passed in 1855; but it was also a very material enlargement, and in some cases a departure from those provisions. Many of their Lordships were aware that in the year preceding a great difference of opinion arose out of this subject, and the question was at last referred to a Select Committee, on which he had the honour to serve. A Bill was then sketched out, which was considered a promise, and taken as the result of understanding on many disputed points, which Bill passed in the following Session. The cardinal point of dispute and subsequently of compromise was the condition under which the pulling down and the of church sites were to be effected. It then agreed that those sites only should be sold where no interments had taken place but this was absolutely thrown over the present Bill, which legalized, subject to certain consents of almost a formal character, the sale of church and churchyard. He must say that in a Bill which professed to be a continuance Bill, continuing the provisions of the Act of 1855, it would have been safer to have followed in the framing of this measure the wording and construction of the clauses of that Act. But a reverse course had been adopted; he ventured to say that their was scarcely one single clause in the Bill, though identical in substance with the Act of 1855, which power was taken for a transfer of the endowment of a rich to a poor parish, and which seemed to him to be necessarily capable of application in the case of large livings over the whole country. If the House admitted the principle that a parish worth £800 a year could be served at £500, and that they might take away the £300 and give it to a poor neighbourhood, it might naturally be asked what has the neighbourhood to do with it? and why should they not apply the same principle to the whole country, and transfer to Manchester and other places the superabundance of these better livings? If they were prepared to do that they were prepared to do an entirely revolutionary thing, and therefore he thought some limitation should be introduced. It was said that many of the attendants at these City churches had migrated to neighbourhoods close by; if so, let the change be provided for in the Bill. There were other objections that were chiefly matters of detail. He trusted that the 17th clause which empowered the Bishop to grant the use of additional churches left standing to the services of any denomination of Protestant Dissenters would be struck out altogether. In the first place, they could not limit the particular kind of Protestant Dissenters to whom such permission should be given, and there were some to whom, he thought, the House would be very unwilling that it should be granted. The Socinians of North America and the Mormons of the Salt Lake District would be entitled to come in under this uninhabited churches clause. It would be found to be impossible to deal with various sects drawing distinctions so nicely as to admit one and leave out another. The effect of this clause would be to open a door to principles which, if carried to their legitimate extent, would sanction the conclusions of those who claimed the churches as the common property of all sects and denominations of religion. He objected also to the 27th clause, which sought to introduce a wholly new system in reference to the appropriation of pews or seats in the churches of the united parishes, and no advantage, he thought, would be derived from introducing the machinery of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. With reference to the representation of the different parties he thought the inclusion of the archdeacon, incumbent, and others, would be a fair representation. He would

in Committee. Lord REDESDALE said, he entirely agreed with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) that this Bill should be limited to the City of London. As to the question of whether so doing would make this a Private and not a Public Bill, it certainly would have no such effect. Occupying as he did a position in the House, he must protest against a disposition to treat measures which dealt with matters of great public importance as private Bills. This Bill referred to a question which had been brought before their Lordships for a very long time, and he had taken such interest in the matter that he had last summer attended Divine service in very many of the City churches, to see what took place within them; and he would recommend those of their Lordships who were fond of a walk on a Sunday morning to do the same. He found those churches very well served, notwithstanding the smallness of the congregations and other discouraging circumstances. In no one single instance did he witness the slightest carelessness in the conduct of the service. Upon the whole, the service was better performed in these City churches—so far as his experience went—than in many of the chapels at the west end of the town. The attendance of school children, small as many of the parishes were, was good; though he remarked with regret that there was only a small attendance of poor; but that was not remarkable merely in the City. First, second, and third class seats were all very well in a railway train where people had to pay; but he protested against the principle of providing third class seats for the poor in churches. He believed that more persons of the humbler classes would attend if they could find seats without inconvenience; and without being placed in an inferior position with regard to the rest of the congregation. Some of the City churches were not very large, but most of them were pewed up from one end to the other, and in many there were pews of the most objectionable kind, in which the people sat face to face so closely, as almost to preclude devotion, or at any rate kneeling. He noticed that though there might not be a large parochial attendance, there was a large moving population around, which would more than fill these churches, and he was confident that a great many more persons would attend them if accommodation were found for them. He had benefices applied. He should be sorry to interpose any obstacle in the way of the passing of a measure which for the City of London he believed to be a matter of great importance; but he saw considerable difficulty, if it should be read a second time, of limiting it in Committee within the limits desired by many of their Lordships.

EARL GREY was understood to say that he was afraid that great inconvenience might arise from confining the Bill to too narrow limits. If they did not give a fair degree of confidence to some authority other than Parliament it was impossible that such Amendment as was required in our churches could be accomplished. Parliament had become in this day a very cumbrous institution, and it required great energy and power to overcome difficulties to carry a Bill through the Houses, and what was wanted in such a matter as this was a more quick and easily available authority. They should not keep power too much in their own hands when dealing with a matter of this kind, and he advised them to confer on some other authority, power which no doubt might be, but which they must trust would not be, abused.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that if it was the opinion of their Lordships that the operation of this Bill ought to be confined to a certain district he should be quite willing to accede to such an arrangement. He wished, however, to consider the poor outside the City of London as well as within it. The Bill as it at present stood was to some degree restricted in its operation, for it was limited to cities, towns, and boroughs. He had studied this subject for the last three years and had found it very intricate; and he did not wonder that it had been misunderstood. With regard to the accommodation of foreign Protestants in disused churches, he reminded his right rev. Brother that in the centre of the metropolitan cathedral of Canterbury there was a place of worship which was occupied by French Protestants, and that among the Chapels Royal, over which he, as Dean, was called upon to preside, there was a Lutheran chapel. He did not think that the clause which had been inserted in this Bill involved any departure from the principles of the Church of England in recognizing that there were such persons as Lutherans, and in affording them that accommodation which since the Reformation it had been the habit of one Protestant Church to extend to another.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and Committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday, the 21st of May next.

DIVORCE COURT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that the principle of the Bill was to give the Judge Ordinary power to act alone in cases in which he was now assisted by other Judges, and to leave to his discretion to call in other Judges to sit with him or not. It was impossible that his decision without assistance in cases of dissolution of marriage would have the same weight as a decision of the full Court; and one result of giving the Judge Ordinary sole jurisdiction in such cases would be that parties would be dissatisfied with his decisions and would appeal to that House, and thus bring back to their Lordships that very jurisdiction which it was the object of the previous Act almost wholly to extinguish. When he stated his objections on a former occasion it was said that there were instances in which a single Judge had already power to decide most important questions, and yet gave universal satisfaction. Criminal cases were referred to, and also the instance of the Lord Chancellor sitting in equity. If, however, there was one thing more than another that had for many years past been a ground of complaint, it was the leaving it within the power of a single Judge to adjudicate upon matters of great importance. In the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer they had four Judges sitting to determine questions of inferior interest to those of the dissolution or the nullity of marriage; and it had been found necessary, with a view to the due administration of justice, to appoint two Judges of Appeal to assist with their advice, and, if necessary, control the Lord Chancellor himself, the highest law officer of the country. It had also proved inconvenient that the appellate functions of that House should be exercised by two law Lords sitting alone, because, if they happened to differ in opinion, the decision of the Court below was practically affirmed by one of them. They were, however, now asked to give to a single Judge the power they refused the other day, except to a full Court, composed of the greatest legal authorities in the kingdom. A Judge of assize hearing criminal cases, if he experienced any difficulty, walked into another court and consulted his brother Judge; and, if he went wrong, there was a Court of Criminal appeal or the Home Office to grant relief. It was impossible to speak too highly of the Judge-Ordinary of the Divorce Court; but was it fair to throw upon him individually all the great labour which they had so lately thought required a full Court, with the highest Judges in the land, properly to dispose of it? If the Judge-Ordinary, sitting alone, decided questions of the dissolution or the nullity of marriage, his judgments would frequently be appealed against. If they then happened to be reversed, it was impossible to exaggerate the dissatisfaction and mischief that would ensue. He had been taunted with objecting to this Bill without offering any alternative proposal of his own. As an individual Peer, he had a perfect right to criticise the measures introduced by the Government, although he might not have any counter-measure to submit. But he had in this case a proposition to make to their Lordships, and it was one of the simplest nature. It was that there should be one other Judge always sitting with the Judge-Ordinary, to deal with questions of the dissolution and the nullity of marriage. It could hardly be objected to this suggestion that the Judges had no time to attend to this duty, especially when it was remembered that it was now sought to transfer a large equitable jurisdiction to the Common Law Courts, the effect of which would be to double the work of those tribunals. The existing law cast upon the fifteen common law Judges the duty of attending the Divorce Court in such cases; and, if they could not spare one of their number for this purpose, why was this particular portion of the functions vested in them, any more than in any other, to be cut off from the rest, and thrown upon some one else? If the common law Judges were not competent to discharge the duties imposed upon them, they ought to have further aid. But certainly they had no higher or more important duty cast upon them by the law than the jurisdiction now in question. If the matter could not otherwise be arranged with the present staff, he would propose that the Common Law Courts should sit with three Judges instead of four. Four was the worst of all Courts, because, in case of a difference of opinion, there being two on one side and two on the other, no decision could be come to at all. At any rate it was better that the Common Law Courts should sit with three Judges, than that the Judge-Ordinary of the Divorce Court should sit to decide cases alone.

Lord St. Leonards

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not help thinking that his noble and learned Friend had fallen into a considerable irregularity. That was his opinion, and he believed it was the opinion of their Lordships. On the second reading of the Bill the question was whether the Judge-Ordinary should be trusted to sit alone except in cases where he might think it expedient to call in the assistance of a brother Judge from the Common Law Courts. That was opposed by his noble and learned Friend in a very long, and, therefore, able speech; but that speech had been answered by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), who had been present this evening, but retired, not supposing that the discussion would be revived. That speech, even from his noble and learned Friend, excited unusual admiration and satisfaction. Except his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards), he believed there was not a single one of their Lordships who was not convinced by it. Indeed, he rather thought his noble and learned Friend himself (Lord St. Leonards) had been convinced, for after that speech was delivered he retired from the House. The question was not whether the Judge-Ordinary should sit alone, but whether a considerable portion of the business in the Divorce Court might not be fairly intrusted to him, he having at all times the power of calling in the assistance of another Judge; and he did not think it would become him to try to repeat the arguments of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) in answer to the statements which had been reiterated. While he was coming into the House he received a letter from the Chief Justice of England, written with his usual ability, and which he thought would remove any doubt on this subject, even from the mind of his noble and learned Friend. The letter was in these words:—

“April 24, 1860.

“My Lord,—Understanding that the Bill introduced by your Lordship for remodelling the Divorce Court is about to be discussed in the House of Lords, it occurs to me that it may not be inexpedient that your Lordship should be pos-

possessed of the view taken by the Judges of this matter, after a practical experience of two years. I trust, therefore, I am not stepping beyond my province in conveying to your Lordship what I know to be the unanimous opinion of the Judges"—

LORD CHELMSFORD rose to order. It was not regular to read a letter on the subject of a Bill before the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR apprehended that it was perfectly regular. His noble and learned Friend the other evening referred to the opinion of the equity Judges on the Bill then under discussion. This was not a private letter, but written for the express purpose of being communicated to the House.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought that, in that case, the noble and learned Lord ought to have moved for its production. He could not read a letter unless he laid it before the House.

EARL GRANVILLE believed the rule to be that such a letter to be read must either have been laid before the House, or his noble and learned Friend must be prepared to lay it before the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was prepared to lay the letter before the House the moment he had read it.

LORD ST. LEONARDS apprehended that the letter must be laid on the table by command of Her Majesty before it could regularly be read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the letter was written to give information and assistance of great importance to that House.

EARL GRANVILLE believed the constant practice was to read letters from individuals. Was it fit, then, that because a letter possessed great authority as coming from a Judge, and conveyed important information, it should not be read?

LORD ST. LEONARDS did not think it regular to read the opinion of one of Her Majesty's Judges as to the Bill under discussion.

LORD CHELMSFORD was not aware of any similar instance of such a letter being read, either in that or the other House of Parliament, with reference to a Bill under discussion.

EARL GRANVILLE remembered a letter being read in the other House from Sir George Clerk, Under Secretary of the India Board, stating the course taken by Government in regard to a particular measure.

LORD CHELMSFORD very much doubted whether the letter alluded to by the

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

noble Earl referred at all to the policy of the course taken by the Government.

After a few words from Lord WENSLEYDALE,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should, if necessary, take the sense of the House on the Question whether the letter should be read ["No, no."] The noble and learned Lord then proceeded to read the letter:—

"My Lord,—Understanding that the Bill introduced by your Lordship for remodelling the Divorce Court—"

when

LORD REDESDALE rose and said, he thought the noble and learned Lord had read quite enough to raise the question. When a person occupying the position of a Judge of the land, whom we may call upon to aid us by his advice if we please, desires of his own motion that his opinion should be laid before the House, with the view of guiding its decision with respect to a Bill which is under its consideration, your Lordships ought, I think, to be cautious how you allow such a communication to be read as a question of right. Information such as that which the letter contains may be very useful, but I contend that we ought not so far to accede to the wish of the noble and learned Lord in the matter as to allow him to set a precedent of this nature.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: If the noble and learned Lord were about to read a letter from any ordinary person—a person, for instance, not conversant with the subject before us—he might have adopted the course which he is about to take without comment. It seems, however, that because the letter is one which contains some valuable information we are to be precluded from having it submitted to our notice. For my own part I cannot see why it should be expedient that we should have withheld from us the expression of an opinion which may be calculated to guide us in coming to a satisfactory decision with respect to an important Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR then read the letter as follows:—

"April 24, 1860.

"My Lord—Understanding that the Bill introduced by your Lordship for remodelling the Divorce Court is about to be discussed in the House of Lords, it occurs to me that it may not be inexpedient that your Lordship should be possessed of the view taken by the Judges of this matter after a practical experience of two years.

"I trust, therefore, I am not stepping beyond my province in conveying to your Lordship what

F

I know to be the unanimous opinion of the Judges, that the attendance of the common law Judges in the Divorce Court, and their consequent withdrawal from the Courts to which they properly belong, cannot be continued without great inconvenience and detriment to the judicial department of the public service; while, on the other hand, no corresponding advantage results to the constitution of the Divorce Court itself.

"The fact is, that at the present time the judicial establishment in the Superior Courts of common law is not more than barely adequate to the discharge of those duties which were incidental to the judicial office before this new duty was imposed on them.

"For, though it is true that the County Courts have to a considerable extent relieved the Superior Courts of a large extent of the lighter and less important cases, yet the amount of business in the latter never was heavier than at the present moment. The increase of population and of commercial and manufacturing activity, the multiplication of inventions and patents, the right recently conferred on the representatives of deceased persons, where loss of life has resulted from negligence, to bring actions for compensation, the facility afforded by railways for bringing causes to London for trial, with other circumstances unnecessary to detail, produce an amount of important business which presses heavily on the Courts; more especially as the modern changes in our procedure (I allude more particularly to the examination of parties, which leads to the calling of witnesses for the defendant in almost every case, and to the allowing of second speeches to counsel for defendants), while tending materially to promote justice, have, on the other hand, a necessary tendency to prolong proceedings in Court and to occupy time. Besides this, new duties have been thrown on the Courts; for instance, on the Court of Queen's Bench, by the power of appeal from the decision of magistrates in petty sessions, given by the Act of the 20 & 21 Vict., which, added to the former appeals from quarter sessions, produces an amount of Crown business which occupies the Court two days a week in every term; on the Court of Common Pleas by the reference to that Court of questions arising on the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, and of appeals from the decisions of Revising Barristers.

"The effect of the whole is that the utmost diligence and activity of the Judges is no more than adequate to prevent the accumulation of arrears to a serious and mischievous extent.

"In term time it is, as your Lordship is aware, absolutely necessary that Nisi Prius sittings should be constantly going on. One Judge in each Court being thus employed, four would be left for the sittings in Banco, were it not that during one-half of the day another Judge is required to attend at chambers, whereby the number is reduced to three. I trust your Lordship will concur with me in thinking that the number of the Judges for sittings in Banco ought not to be reduced below the ancient and accustomed number. It is the unanimity of so many as four Judges, or in the event of difference the proportion of the majority, which has given so much authority to the decisions of these Courts. It is, no doubt, impossible to prevent the number from being at times reduced to three by the incidents to which I have referred; but when it is considered that the Court on applications for new trials is practically a Court of Appeal from the ruling of single Judges, or from the decisions of juries, that it is often called upon to decide difficult and complicated questions of law, and to settle the construction of important Acts of Parliament, I feel assured I shall have the sanction of your Lordship's opinion in saying that the number of the sitting Judges of each Court ought not to be intentionally reduced below three. Yet the withdrawal of one of the Judges for the purposes of the Divorce Court has necessarily the effect of reducing the number to two during a portion of every sitting, and, in case of absence by ill-health or other casualty, would have the effect of reducing the Court to a single Judge, or, as the alternative, of preventing the sittings at Nisi Prius or attendance at chambers.

The Lord Chancellor

"Out of term the inconvenience is still greater. The state of the cause-lists necessitates, as your Lordship knows, the constant sitting of the two Courts. Attendance at chambers continues to be as necessary as in term. Post-terminal sittings in Banco are indispensable to dispose of the arrears of term business, and at this period occur the sittings of the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, in which the presence of as many Judges as possible is most desirable, and less than six ought not to be dispensed with. Any one of these important Courts may be suspended by the withdrawal of two Judges (or even of a single one) from their proper and primary duties.

"I have omitted to advert to the sittings of the Central Criminal Court, as well as to the recently established Court of Criminal Appeal, which constitute an additional drain on the strength of the judicial establishment.

"These explanations, of which, fortunately, no one can be better qualified to form a correct estimate than your Lordship, will, I conceive, fully bear out the opinion expressed by the Judges as the result of their practical experience.

"Equally strong and general is the opinion that the expenditure of judicial force involved in the attendance of the Judges in the Divorce Court is, for the most part, pure waste, uncompensated by any advantage to the administration of justice in that Court. The great majority of cases dealt with in the Court of Divorce are either undefended, or the facts are too clear to admit of doubt, or at all events the question to be decided is one of fact alone, determinable by the evidence, and with which a Judge or a Judge and Jury are perfectly competent to deal, just as the latter would before have been in an action for criminal conversation, or a Judge would have been in a suit for divorce in the Ecclesiastical Court. Collusion, the apprehension of which excites so much alarm in these cases, occurs, I am satisfied, much less frequently than seems to be supposed. Where it does, the sagacity and acuteness of one competent Judge, especially of so eminently distinguished and able a Judge as Sir Cresswell Cresswell, may well be expected to detect and frustrate it. At the same time, as cases will no doubt at times occur involving more than ordinary difficulty, and in which the Judge-Ordinary may desire assistance, if, in such cases, no other means can be resorted to for strengthening the Court than the having recourse to the Judges, of course the latter must do their utmost to render the required assistance, so far as this can be made consistent with the exigencies of their more immediate duties. What they at present object to, and strongly feel, is the idle waste of their time, imperatively called for elsewhere, in sitting to hear causes in which there is neither necessity nor occasion for their taking part at all. At all events, they confidently trust that the Legislature will relieve them from attendance on the Divorce Court, except where the Judge-Ordinary requires their aid, or where appeals are brought against his decisions.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord,

"Your obedient and faithful servant,

"A. E. COCKBURN.

"The Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor."

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 agreed to.

LORD CRANWORTH moved the insertion of the following clause, which embodied two Amendments of which his Lordship and Lord WENSLEYDALE had severally given notice.

"Every Decree for a Divorce shall in the first Instance be a Decree nisi, not to be made absolute till after the Expiration of such Time, not less than Three Months from the pronouncing thereof, as the Court shall by General or Special Order from Time to Time direct; and during that Period any Person shall be at liberty, in such Manner as the Court shall by General or Special Order in that behalf from Time to Time direct, to show Cause why the said Decree should not be made absolute by reason of the same having been obtained by Collusion or by reason of material Facts not brought before the Court; and, on Cause being so shown, the Court shall deal with the Case by making the Decree absolute, or by reversing the Decree nisi, or by requiring further Inquiry, or otherwise as Justice may require; and at any Time during the Progress of the Cause or before the Decree is made absolute any Person may give Information to Her Majesty's Proctor of any Matter material to the due Decision of the Case, who may thereupon take such Steps as he may deem necessary or expedient; and if from any such Information or otherwise the said Proctor shall suspect that any Parties to the Suit are or have been acting in collusion for the Purpose of obtaining a Divorce contrary to the Justice of the Case he may, by Leave of the Court, intervene in the Suit, alleging such Case of Collusion, and retain Counsel and subpoena Witnesses to prove it; and it shall be lawful for the Court to order the Costs of such Counsel and Witnesses, and otherwise arising from such Intervention, to be paid by the Parties or such of them as it shall see fit, including a Wife if she have separate Property; and in case the said Proctor shall not thereby be fully satisfied his reasonable Costs, he shall be entitled to charge and be reimbursed the Difference as Part of the Expense of his Office.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR approved the clause; he had in the Bill of last year, given power to the Attorney General to obtain such further evidence in cases in which collusion was suspected. The delay was by no means to be complained of. In France, the decree in such cases was never pronounced till twelve months after the presentation of the petition.

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made.

Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

LAW OF DIVORCE (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD presented a Bill to amend the Law relating to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR would not oppose the measure, but to the greater part of the population of Ireland it would be useless.

Bill read 1^a.

House adjourned at a Quarter-past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, April 26, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Harwich, Lieutenant Colonel the hon. Richard Thomas Rowley.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1^o Education Bill.

ASSESSMENT OF HOUSE PROPERTY. QUESTION.

MR. WATLINGTON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether the Correspondent of The Times newspaper of the 23rd instant is correct in stating that the Auditors of the Poor Law Board have defined "gross estimated rental" to be "the landlord's rent, the landlord and tenant respectively paying their own proper charges," and, if so, to inquire what if any is the difference between "gross estimated rental" and "net annual value?"

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in consequence of the notice of the hon. Gentleman he had referred to The Times newspaper, and had seen in the letter to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, what purported to be the opinion of the auditors of the Poor Law Board. With regard to that letter, he thought it right to state that it had not been inserted in The Times newspaper after any previous communication with him, nor did it derive any authority from the Poor Law Board. And further, he might state that the auditors of the Poor Law Board had no peculiar competency in their office in defining what was called "gross estimated rental," and the fact of their having given any opinion on the matter arose from the circumstances which he would state to the House. There was a deputation from the Poor Law Auditors to the Poor Law Board, and, considering them much experienced in parochial affairs, he asked them what they conceived what the overseers called "gross estimated rental" to be, and he found that these auditors entertained the opinion that was expressed in the letter—namely, that the "gross estimated rental" was the rent paid to the landlord, the landlord and the tenant paying their own proper charges. He then asked them if they thought that opinion would be supported by their colleagues throughout the country, and he directed a circular to be sent to the different auditors to know if that corresponded with their experience, and their replies generally were to the effect that it did so. With regard to the other question which the hon. Gentleman asked him, as to what was the difference between "gross estimated rental" and "net annual value," he believed "gross estimated rental" to be pretty much what the auditors had represented it to be, the "net annual value" being what remained after the deductions had been made of the charges which fell on the landlord. The net annual value and the rateable value were in fact nearly identical. The landlord had certain charges which everybody knew were incident to owners of property. He had to pay the expenses of insurance and repairs, and these deductions having been made the overseer arrived at the rateable value. That he believed to be the distinction which had been recognized by the Courts of law, and had been supported by the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown so late as May, 1859.

PROTECTION OF BRITISH PERSONS AND PROPERTY IN NAPLES AND SICILY.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has heard that complaints have been made of the insufficient protection afforded to British subjects in the Kingdom of Naples, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the disturbances in Sicily, by the English Representative and British men-of-war on that station, and whether there is any truth in these complaints; and if he will state which of Her Majesty's vessels are on that station, and whether the instructions have been to give assistance to all persons rightly claiming the protection of the English flag? And whether, to his knowledge, it is true that Austrian troops have been employed to aid in the suppression of the efforts of the Sicilian population to obtain a better form of Government?

Mr. C. P. Villiers

LORD JOHN RUSSELL replied, that no complaints had reached the Foreign Office of the insufficient protection afforded to British subjects in the kingdom of Naples and in the neighbourhood of the disturbances in Sicily by the English Representative or the British men-of-war on that station. With regard to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, as to which of Her Majesty's vessels were on that station, he had to inform him that the Orion was at Palermo, the Argus at Messina, and the Cæsar was despatched to Naples for the protection of British interests. The hon. Gentleman further asked him whether instructions had been given to afford assistance to all persons rightly claiming the protection of the English flag. He had to inform him that Her Majesty's Government had forwarded instructions to the Commanders of those vessels to protect the persons as well as the property of British subjects. In reference to the last question as to whether "it is true that Austrian troops have been employed to aid in the suppression of the efforts of the Sicilian population to obtain a better form of Government," Her Majesty's Government had received no information of the kind, and indeed he thought it highly improbable that Austria should interfere in any such manner.

MILITARY SURGEONS.

QUESTION.

MR. DEEDES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War upon what principle a deduction of eightpence halfpenny per diem is made from the pay of the Surgeon and Assistant-Surgeon of a Cavalry Regiment for each horse kept by them for the public service, when the rate of pay of those Officers is precisely the same as that of the Medical Officers of Infantry Regiments who, under the 21st paragraph of the Warrant of the 1st of October, 1858, are expressly exempted from any such deduction, the words of the paragraph referred to being these:—

"Shall not in future be subject to any stoppage out of their daily pay for any ration of hay, straw, or oats supplied for the horse or horses kept by them for the public service."

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the case was as stated, and the papers on the subject were before the House.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. FOURTH NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. BLACK: Sir, it is with much reluctance that I venture to make any observations on the important measure now under consideration, especially as I fear my views on one essential part of the Bill are not in unison with the views of most of the friends with whom I am surrounded. But however painful it is for me to differ from them, I feel constrained by a sense of duty to give utterance to sentiments which I have often expressed in the city I have the honour to represent, and which I believe are entertained by the majority of one of the largest, most important, and, I may say, one of the most intelligent constituencies in the kingdom, who might charge me with shrinking from my duty, if I did not honestly state in my proper place the sentiments I have expressed to them. I hold, with Jeremy Bentham, that the best form of Government is that which produces the greatest amount of happiness to the greatest number; and, with this view, and this view alone, Governments ought to be constructed. Despotisms have been tried, oligarchies have been tried, and pure democracies have been tried; but under a mixed Government, with a balanced Parliamentary Representation, this country has secured a greater degree of power, and wealth, and liberty than has been attained by any other State. For the production of good Government, then, the Representative system, when properly constructed, experience has proved to be the most efficient instrument. It is a powerful and a delicate machine; to say that it is not perfect, is to say that it is only human, and must partake of the imperfections of humanity: it should be attended to with the greatest carefulness; but we must not be always tinkering at it. If it should at any time get out of gear, or if defects should be discovered in it, they should be rectified; but no alteration should be allowed to be made in it, without its being first proved to be imperfect, and the proposed alteration an improvement that will remedy the defect. A machinist would consider it necessary that he should work upon sound, scientific principles. So, in the measure before us, we ought to act upon a sound political system. Is the elective franchise a right or a trust? Some have said that every man is naturally entitled to share in the Government of his country; that those who are to obey the laws, should have something to say in the framing of them; that taxation and representation should be co-extensive. If the elective franchise is a right, it must be based on some ground—if it is on taxation, then every man who smokes a pipe, or drinks a cup of tea, has a right to the elective franchise. What the people have a right to demand is, that they should have that system of Government which will most efficiently work out the greatest amount of happiness and prosperity; you are not bound to gratify every demand of theirs, which would not tend to promote their happiness. It might be asked who is to decide. The answer was that this duty must devolve upon the Government of the day; this responsibility rests upon the House of Commons; and a tremendous responsibility it is. The elective franchise ought to be intrusted only to those whom we may reasonably suppose well qualified to exercise it for the general advantage. Taking this, then, as the principle which ought to regulate us in considering a reform of our Representative System, let us examine the leading propositions of this Bill. First, then, as to the introduction of the £10 occupants in the counties. I think there is good ground for that arrangement. It appears to me contrary to principle that a man should be excluded because he lives in the county and not in the burgh; and there is no reason to suppose that the dweller in the county will be inferior in intelligence, independence, and integrity to the dweller in the burgh. I hold, then, that on principle we are fully warranted in adopting that part of the Bill. Then, in the Bill for Scotland, the clause which reduces the property qualification to £5, is so far right; but to act upon precedent and principle, it ought to be 40s., as in England; not only because it is so in England, but because we have had proof that it has worked well there; and a man who holds property yielding 40s. a year and upwards,

[Fourth Night.]

if he has acquired it, most probably is a man of industrious habits and good conduct; and if he has inherited it, you have reason to believe that he is well educated. The possessor of property, however small, takes as deep an interest in whatever affects it, as the possessor of the largest estates. These two classes, I think, may safely be trusted with the elective franchise. Holding to the principle which I have laid down, that no alteration should be made in the electoral body but such as will manifestly improve it, I ask would the introduction of the large class of occupants between £10 and £6 improve the electoral machine? I do not now enter into any calculation of the numbers or proportions of this class. It is, however, certain that in some cases they will add a quarter or a half to the present number of electors; in others they will double them, in others they will be a majority. Will this large infusion of the lower element improve the aggregate, will it increase the intelligence or independence of the constituency? Will it not throw a preponderating weight upon some part of the machinery? Do not imagine that I undervalue the virtues that are to be found in that class of the community, or that I am disposed to speak disrespectfully of them; but neither will I flatter them. I speak of them as a class, and a large class, which we ought to look at with impartiality and discrimination. It is nothing to the purpose to be told that you will find among them men as independent and intelligent as in the highest class. The question is, is it reasonable to expect, in the class occupying houses between £10 and £5 rent, the same amount of education and intelligence as in the various classes occupying houses from £10 to £1,000? If you had an important business of your own to manage, whether would you risk it to occupants of some of the lower streets of Westminster or St. Giles', or to the tradesmen in Cheapside or the Strand, not to speak of Belgravia? You say you will find as intelligent and independent men occupying £5 houses, as some occupying £60 houses; that may be quite true, but you will likewise find men occupying £5, and £4, or £3 houses as intelligent as those who occupy £6 houses. Political questions are often among the most difficult that can be submitted to human decision, and cannot safely be committed to the arbitration of great masses of half-educated men, perhaps brought together under the excitement of passion and prejudice, and under the guidance of unscrupulous agitators. By conferring the franchise on such a large mass of half-educated people, you would not raise the character of the constituency: but, on the contrary, must inevitably bring it down, in some degree, to the level from which the new body of the electors sprung. Would that be an advantage? If so, it should be done at once; but if it were doubtful, it would be prudent to hesitate before taking a step which could not be retraced. Within these few months we have had a melancholy example of the manner in which they mismanage their own affairs. How easily they were led astray by noisy agitators, after an impracticable delusion to demand ten hours' pay for nine hours' work; and see the domination and tyranny that one set of them exercised over others. At the factious and exciting harangues of their leaders they unite for impracticable purposes, and expose their wives and children to hunger and suffering in a foolish contest. We sometimes manifest indignation at great landholders who exercise undue influence over their tenants; but the largest landholder in the kingdom, or a dozen of them, would not be able to compete with Mr. Potter. Then there is danger from their acting in concert; they not only have their unions, but these unions are affiliated, and the leaders have only to give the word, and woe to the man who rebels. It has been said that were the power largely in the hands of that class, they would throw the taxation of the country unduly on property; but it would not be the holders of property only that would suffer, but the manufacturers. At a meeting with the operatives before my last election, one question that was put to me was, Will you support a Bill in Parliament to reduce the day's labour to eight hours? I told them to their face that the putting such a question only showed the danger of giving them the franchise. Depend upon it that one of the objects which they would exert themselves to attain would be to shorten the hours of labour, and that test would be put to every candidate; too many of whom, to obtain their sweet voices, would swallow the test. Are honourable Members aware of the extent of these affiliated unionists? They will, perhaps, be surprised to hear that Mr. Potter has stated their number to be 600,000. These are all under the orders of a small executive committee, most probably composed of a small number of the most energetic, enthusiastic, and aggressive characters. A large number of these would secure the franchise by this Bill, and every one of them would vote as directed by the executive committee, and every one of those who did not obtain the franchise would be most active canvassers. The noble Lord, the Member for Stamford, said he had sat on several Election Committees, and found that the parties who took bribes were generally the freemen; men who were in the rank of those who would be enfranchised by the £6 clause. [“No!” and cheers]. He could give another proof. Before the Reform Bill of 1832, the freemen and the potwallopers in the boroughs of England were bought and sold. The Bill of 1832 left them still their privileges, but the dry rot was in them; and when the ten-pounders were added to the constituency, the rot spread into the new timbers. In fact, the tide of bribery and corruption rolled over England and stopt at Berwick. But in Scotland we had no freemen electors, and as the franchise did not descend below a £10 rent, we had none of the lower class; consequently bribery is almost unknown in Scotland. There was another view which must be taken of this Bill. There had not been much agitation about it; but there had been some meetings at nearly all of which resolutions in favour of manhood suffrage, or something of that sort, had been submitted. It was, however, argued by the leading speakers at these meetings, that they should be content with this Bill, because it was a step in the right direction, it was an instalment, and they need not fear that the whole sum will be paid in due time. You may go down by easy stages, but whether your steps are short or long, you will have got upon the slide, and you cannot stop till you reach the bottom. I can see a principle for universal suffrage, but I can see no principle for stopping at £6. The man who pays £5 or £4 will have a good right to say, I am as well entitled to the franchise as the man who pays 20s. of more rent. Do not imagine that you will stop the agitation; you will have given it a shove onwards and downwards, and the downward progress must of necessity be an accelerated one. In twenty years or less you may be obliged to descend to £5 or £4, and in other ten years you will have no standing ground but on universal suffrage. Well, perhaps you think universal suffrage the best. If it is, and certainly it has better ground of principle, it would be better to adopt it at once, and thus save all the agitation and fighting that must accompany a downward progress, if downward we must go. Reference has repeatedly been made to the opinions of Lord Macaulay on this subject. I knew them well, but I will rather refer to a letter written by him in 1857 to Mr. Randall of New York:—

Mr. Black

“ I have long been convinced that institutions purely democratic must, sooner or later, destroy liberty, or civilization, or both. In Europe, where the population is dense, the effect of such institutions would be almost instantaneous. What happened lately in France is an example. You may think that your country enjoys an exemption from these evils. I will frankly own to you that I am of a very different opinion. Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. . . . But the time will come when New England will be as thickly peopled as Old England. Wages will be as low and will fluctuate as much with you as with us. But you will have your Manchesters and your Birminghams, and in those Manchesters and Birminghams hundreds and thousands of artizans will assuredly be sometimes out of work. Then your institutions will be fairly brought to the test. Distress everywhere makes the labourer mutinous and discontented, and inclines him to listen with eagerness to agitators, who tell him that it is a monstrous iniquity that one man should have a million while another cannot get a full meal. In bad years there is plenty of grumbling here, and sometimes a little rioting; but it matters little, for here the sufferers are not the rulers. The supreme power is in the hands of a class, numerous indeed, but select—of an educated class—of a class which is, and knows itself to be, deeply interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order. Accordingly, the malcontents are firmly but gently restrained. The bad time is got over without robbing the wealthy to relieve the indigent. The springs of national prosperity soon begin to flow again, work is plentiful, wages rise, and all is tranquillity and cheerfulness.”

My chief objection to the part of the Bill that provides for the admission of occupants of £6 houses is, that the infusion of such large numbers into the burgh constituencies will dilute and lower the entire constituencies, and give an undue preponderance to one class, and that the least educated. The operative classes are entitled to have their interests represented in this House, but adopt a method by which this may be accomplished without lowering the whole electoral body. Before the Reform Bill of 1832 there were boroughs in which the freemen and pot-wallopers engrossed the electoral franchise. If there was a return to a similar plan you might accomplish the object sought to be obtained. But I do not acknowledge that the interests of the operative classes are neglected by the present representatives. I do not believe that the interests of any class have been so carefully attended to. I know it will be said that all my objections were urged against the Reform Bill of 1832, but, upon the principle I have laid down, the Reform Bill of 1832 was just and rational. It was a measure of necessary reaction against the defects of an exclusive oligarchy. It transferred the power from small knots of a dominant party, possessing few, if any, popular sympathies, to large masses of the most highly educated, the most wealthy, and the most influential parts of the upper and middle classes of society, and embracing a number of the lower classes and those who sympathize with them. Experience has proved that the plan was wise and advantageous. I am unwilling to take up the time of the House by entering upon other plans of increasing the constituency which, I think, would be more advantageous, such as admitting lodgers, the holders of a certain amount of money in savings banks, and others, which may be taken up in Committee. As I have said, it is painful to me to differ from statesmen whom I hold in the highest honour and respect for the invaluable services they have rendered to their country, but the stake is too vast and the responsibility too great to shrink from a disagreeable duty from motives of affection.

[Fourth Night.]

SIR BULWER LYTTON said: * Sir, the debate has hitherto chiefly turned on the quality and nature of the proposed borough franchise. It is evident from the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, that this involves a question on which Gentlemen opposite have an interest fully equal to our own; I shall, therefore, so far imitate his example, that I will endeavour to state my views in a spirit that shall be as free from party bias as I can possibly form and express it; and as I think it very important that we should have clear perceptions of the nature of our dispute, and of the consequences of any mistake we may commit, I will first entreat the House to bear with me for a few minutes, while I try to consider whether, at least, we cannot agree as to some broad principle upon which all good representative systems should be based. Sir, I will assume that every popular reformer, and every sound political thinker, who seeks to estimate the proper standard at which to fix an electoral franchise, must, in abstract theory, start from the same point;—and that point is the prima facie right of manhood suffrage. Where you find a civilized community in which all the Members are equally free, and where, by a system of indirect duties, every man is more or less taxed to the support of the State, I can readily understand that every man should consider that he has a prima facie right to vote for those who superintend his affairs and regulate the machinery by which his welfare is controlled. But here, from the origin of all political societies, commences another view of that same question, upon which popular reformers may differ—I do not know if they do—but on which all who are acknowledged to be sound political thinkers are agreed; and it is this: granting that every man in a free community may thus put forward his claim to the electoral franchise, still every member of a community merges all his individual rights, and many rights much nearer and dearer to him than an electoral franchise, in the paramount consideration how the State itself can be best sustained for the general safety and the social advancement; or, in the words of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, how “the greatest happiness of the greatest number” can be secured from attacks, without and within, from foreign dangers or its own mistakes, for the longest probable period. The Member for Edinburgh says that he would wish to see established some definite principle by which we might construct our measure, and by which we might test its details. That which he asks has been the object of research to political reasoners for more than two thousand years; but I think the substance of all that has been said by those whom we hold to be authorities may be found in this very simple definition: a free State will be thus best sustained and advanced by securing to its legislative councils the highest average degree of the common sense of the common interest. For this, intelligence is requisite, but not intelligence alone; you might have a legislative Assembly composed of men indisputably intelligent—nobles, lawyers, priests, who might honestly believe they used their intelligence for the common interest, when in fact they used it for their own. Hence it follows that no one class interest must predominate over all the others, or the common interest is gone—gone if that class be the great proprietors; gone if that class be the working men. But there is this distinction between the working class and every other, that, granting their intelligence to be equal to that of others, granting that it be not more likely to be misdirected, still, when it is misdirected, the consequences are, if they are invested with the electoral power that determines legislation, immeasurably more dangerous both to the common interest and to their own. For they are the roots of society, and it is the roots of society that their errors will affect; while their numbers are so great that their votes could overpower the votes of all the other classes put together. When this happens, the instinctive safeguard of the rich is corruption; and the instinctive tendency of ambition, if it be not rich, is towards those arts which give dictatorship to demagogues.

The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone has done me the honour to quote expressions of mine in praise of the labourer and mechanic. I neither retract that praise, nor the qualification with which it was then accompanied. The working class have virtues singularly noble and generous, but they are obviously more exposed than the other classes to poverty and to passion. Thus, in quiet times, their poverty subjects them to the corruption of the rich; and in stormy times, when the State requires the most sober judgment, their passion subjects them to the ambition of the demagogue. To every man who has read history, these are not unsupported propositions. The history of all the old republics is uniform as to their truth; and as in all those old republics, at least where democracy was established, vote by ballot was employed, so the same history tells us that vote by ballot is no cure for the evils. Hence it is that those eminent writers on the Liberal side, who have lately examined this very question of a new franchise for England, with political courage as well as speculative acuteness, have all specially dwelt on the extreme danger of basing that new franchise rudely and exclusively upon a principle that, once conceded, must expand—a principle that, by avowedly reducing your borough franchise so as to admit manual labour without any equipoise, without any test or condition beyond that of finding a roof to cover it at 2s. 4d. a week, must end by giving to manual labour the political power over the capital that employs and the mind that should direct it. An hon. Member in the course of this debate referred to the opinions of Mr. John Mill, than whom no severer reasoner adorns our age; but what are Mr. Mill's opinions? Sternly against all the arguments by which the proposed franchise is defended. He would give, it is true, a vote to every man, but in order to counteract the effect of numbers so created, he would give to a man of superior education or property, such as a farmer or a tradesman, four or five votes; to a man of still higher education and property, five or six votes. More lately Mr. Mill has declared in favour of the scheme propounded by Mr. Hare and explained by Mr. Fawcett in a very remarkable pamphlet; a scheme that is based upon the principle of securing representation even to the smallest minorities. These ideas are so against the taste of the House and the inclination of the public, that their adoption may be impossible; but I mention them to show that, here, are consummate reasoners whose doctrines of Government belong to the boldest school of liberal opinion, and who are yet more anxious than the highest Tory amongst us to secure to property and intelligence a power that shall not be overborne by the influence of numbers.

The Member for Birmingham says there is no cause to fear the influence of numbers or of the working class in the Bill that is now before us. He says, firstly, that the proposed addition as regards the boroughs is not considerable; secondly, that the total constituency will still be very small in proportion to the adult male population. But the Member for Birmingham fails to see or to grapple with the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire. It is not with my right hon. Friend a question of numbers alone, but rather of fitness. In fact, though I accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that the most conscientious pains were taken to obtain accurate returns, yet he must pardon me if I say that, without entering into the dispute between him and the Member for Marylebone, those returns must seem incredible to any Gentleman who will use his own powers of inquiry and observation; for a £6 house is a house at 2s. 4d. a week, but if any Gentleman will inquire in the small rural towns or even the large villages in his neighbourhood, he will find that there are scarcely any houses in them that are let to the most ordinary artisans at less than 2s. 6d. a week; but if 2s. 6d. a week be the lowest rent paid by a journeyman labourer in a small rural town, what must it be in a populous borough where the average rental cannot fail to be higher? Just consider! Many Gentlemen, no doubt, have built plain cottages for their own day-labourers; those cottages less capital and educated interest will have a voice in the representation of the place, the prosperity of which they created and maintain.

[Fourth Night.]

And, now, Sir, let me observe that it was well said by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster, in a speech which the Home Secretary censures for being animated—I cannot retort the charge on the right hon. Gentleman, who spoke as if “he came to bury Cæsar, not to praise him”—that much of this argument has been conducted on premises that are not strictly true. It has been too much assumed that all the working class are excluded by the present franchise. We are asked to open the door to them, as if the door had been kept rigidly locked and barred against them. But is that the case? I apprehend that in all the metropolitan boroughs artisans must form a considerable part of the constituency. In fact, if your Returns are correct, and if we must prefer them to the calculations of the Member for Marylebone, it is clear that the main reason why artisans living in houses below a £10 rental will not add considerably to the metropolitan constituencies, must be because a large number of artisans in metropolitan constituencies live in houses that are not below a £10 rental. But, take any borough, any county,—have not all and each of us several working men among our constituents? The working classes are, therefore, admitted at present. The door is not locked. You say admit more, many more; open the door much wider. Very well, do so; but, since you cannot admit them all, let us try and establish some better test than that of a certain amount of poverty. Do not lower your franchise upon the express principle of admitting the poor, solely and wholly because they are poor. The Member for Halifax, in a speech of much promise, and in the excellent taste of a Gentleman who can unite ardour for a cause with courtesy to opponents, said, “The best test of fitness for the franchise is the desire to possess the franchise.” Let him reflect for a moment, and he is too good a logician not to see that his position is untenable. Desire is no proof of fitness. We all desire to be rich,—is that any proof that we all deserve riches? We all desire to be strong, healthy, and wise, and how few of us take the smallest pains to be strong,

the human being vindicates his claim to reason—I mean the habit of frugality and forethought for the morrow in the man who lives by the labour of the day. We thus did expand the franchise to the working class, not by regarding such voters as the mere symbols of four crazy walls, but in proportion—I do not say as they had a stake in the country, for every child just born has a stake in his native country—but in proportion as they showed they were sensible of that stake, and had by the mere exercise of a virtue most useful to themselves—the mere principle of saving for the uncertain morrow—entered into the class of proprietors, and had become participators in that prudent regard for order which is the safeguard of property, and the main distinction between liberty, which is always thoughtful, and licence, which is always reckless. You dismiss these attempts of ours to modify, refine, and exalt a mere popular franchise—dismiss them without one effort of your own to improve them; and I believe they could be greatly improved and enlarged by Government in whom Reformers had confidence, and whom this House honoured with a majority; you dismiss not only notions, but all the remonstrances and the warnings of your own ablest writers, and you who came into power upon the presumption of superior capacities for a comprehensive scheme, content yourself with what?—rudely creating an additional constituency upon the express and principle that it is to be poorer and less intelligent than the present, without a single franchise of a higher nature; you make that addition so numerous in most of those large towns which are the centres of energy, which the Member for Rochdale once told us “govern England,” it is that poor and less intelligent class which must take the lion’s share of political power. And when we are told by the hon. Member for Birmingham and the hon. Member for Leeds, that a £6 franchise is not so rigidly confined to the working class but that there are several £6 occupiers who are not actually working men, I say that in no way touches our objection. They are equally men subjected to the conditions of poverty and passion; and though we are willing to admit poverty and passion into the franchise, we are not of hands d... Parliament! "Privilege!" and why? Because at that moment this House represented property, station, and knowledge, as well as patriotism and valour;

[Fourth Night.]

and therefore, it had strength in public opinion. But a few years later Cromwell expelled all the Members, and locked up
the House itself; and there were then no
cries of "Parliament!" "Privilege!"

There was scarcely a murmur heard out of doors. Why was that? Because the House was then only a Rump Parliament.
It had ceased to represent property, station, and knowledge; and, therefore, it had no strength in public opinion, though its majority, even then, were staunch Reformers: nay, they were actually discussing a new Reform Bill, not altogether different from that of the hon. Member for Birmingham, at the very moment Cromwell and his pikemen entered. Is there any Gentleman here who will tell us he expects to return to Parliament a wiser man—a sadder man, perhaps, he may be
—when he knows he has ceased to represent property, station, and knowledge, and has become the delegate of the poorest householders in the borough he represents?

But how will this measure improve the constituent body? When that question was asked in the debates on the great Reform Bill, the answer of the Reformers was crushing. You then got rid of the boroughmonger, who sold his borough—of the potwalloper, who sold his vote; and your substitutes were trade, commerce, manufactures—that combination of various interests which is found in the middle ranks
of society, which cannot be called a class,
because it comprises all classes, from the educated gentleman to the skilled artisan,
and which, therefore, does represent a high average of the common sense of the common interest. You, then, did not merely extend the franchise. The Home Secretary has taken pains to prove that.
To use the words, I think, of the late Lord
Grey, "you purified, you exalted the constituency." But when you are asked,
"How does the little Reform Bill purify and exalt the constituency?" what will you answer? You will say, "It is true
we found many persons of respectable means and excellent education, who complained that they were without a suffrage;

and fran-puris
S
trati Refc
Ame
rify
first rend
come ques
Let
whic
ques
we s perh thing then tuen noble gent
men, whor
from datei
Brow
son s rises
Brow
treat proce
new hon.
ers a —liv
of pl
a has supp
milit
Smit
the C
the E
crimi
and i
and tal b
the c excit
the o
his w ration eloqu
there and l
mani

and answered his own question in a breath, "Because you know you have a majority against you!" In I ask him, not scornfully, but in a appeal to his love of truth, "Grant-ract of that alleged majority, does obtain Members more than enough the scale in our favour if they voted to the opinions they express in it is because there is at present to vision, because we would not, if make that strict demarcation of which would not faithfully repre-al difference of opinions, that I may, without presumption, solicit us reflection of those enlightened rs who do not desire change for sake of change. I know, indeed, re are some persons who believe gress consists in always stopping ad to alter the springs of the car- which we travel. I know that e some who think that man was r nothing better than to pass his istence in the ecstatic contempla-terminable Reform Bills.

Let us flatter ourselves that such enthusiasts are to be found chiefly doors, and not among us, to whom n and knowledge of the world may supposed to have given the ordi-ributes of common sense. We can- uise from ourselves that, whether at home or abroad, this is a some- itical moment in the destinies of ntry, one in which we would rather the highest wisdom, the ripest ex- e we could obtain for our guidance, rge such wisdom as we do possess, xperience as we have acquired, in tration of men who have never been called upon to judge of questions so ated and grave, and from whom, if e appoint them, you can never have of appeal. I do not say that the I have urged as to the state of or as to our own financial deficit nsons that the Government could put forward for withdrawing this ut they are reasons which their own ters might privately urge upon them, ey are reasons which might satisfy wn good sense and justify them be- e public if, having honourably ful- their pledge to introduce a Reform is Bill was withdrawn on the obvious nswerable ground that it has failed or to any Government. A Reform Bill, s easy to the theorist, is very difficult to th practical statesman. The hand of the tru artist may well tremble when he applies th hammer and the chisel to the palladium of his country's laws. I do not presume t think that anything I can say will hav the least influence upon the Governmen but they would be wrong, indeed, if the did not respect what may be said, or if ne said, what they know is thought, by the own temperate and tried supporters. I however, you tell us that, be the Bill good or bad, you are resolved to persevere in it that what we think its defects you hold t be its main principles; that you will ne wait for the Report of the Committee yo have conceded to the other House; tha you will avail yourselves of the natural reluctance which the Members for borough may feel openly to declare against those new constituents to whom, next December you would condemn them to appeal,— that be the course which, as the Queen's advisers, you deem it your duty to pursue then I can only express a fervent wish tha the result may justify your reversal of al the rules by which the statesmen, even o republics, would rather seek in similar tim and circumstance to strengthen the hand of the executive than transfer to the wide circle of an unaccustomed multitude the nice and permanent adjustment of national finances, and the cautious preparation against perils which already alarm the boldest statesmen and menace the strong- est thrones.

MR. MARSH said, that in answer to the challenge of the right hon. Baronet he for one was not ashamed to avow in public that which he had stated in private, and therefore declared that he would not support the Bill in its present shape. The only doubt he entertained was whether or not something might be made of it in Committee; whether the franchise might not be made £8 instead of £6, and whether securities could not be obtained that persons who compounded for rates should not be allowed to vote unless they paid the full amount as their fellow-townsmen. This was the first time in the constitutional history of England that any attempt had ever been made to lower the franchise. By the Reform Act of 1832 the franchise was raised rather than lowered. The copyholder, the £20 leaseholder, and the £50 tenant-at-will in counties was of a higher the money, in order that employment might be given to their members; and in one night £3,000,000 of the public money was voted for the construction of railroads. In another case 300 persons, who said they were unemployed, went in procession to the Secretary for Lands and Works. Mr. Robinson, the Secretary, received them very kindly, and promised them every aid in securing employment for them. Then a deputation of the iron trade appealed to the Government in favour of the eight hours' movement; the ground for all this could not be that they were in want of employment, while at the same time there was an advertisement in the papers offering 15s. a day to workmen for three months certain. That was the state of society to which they would come if they lowered the franchise. Since the Reform Bill of 1832, many important measures with regard to commerce and navigation had been passed, mainly by the exertions of the able men whom the commercial constituencies had returned to that House; but if the franchise were lowered, what would become of such men? No Members would be elected who would not promise to secure for the working classes ten hours' pay for eight hours' work. Candidates would have to give a promise, like Jack Straw, that a penny loaf should be sold for a halfpenny. Political economists had to a certain extent been formerly radicals, and had flown to democracy to assist them; but he would ask whether democracies were even good. Political Economists, witness the restrictions on trade in France and America, and the nonsense mooted by the trades unions in England. Financial reformers also were inclined to a democracy, but were democracies ever thrifty when they were spending other people's money. They had only to look to France, America, or Australia, if we wished to know of what extravagance, corruption, and jobbery a democracy could be guilty. There were persons now engaged in what all must call a holy work, endeavouring to bring about a time when war might cease, and these men fled to democracy for support; they sought for peace where there was no peace. He questioned whether democracy was ever peaceful. Were the small democracies of Greece peaceful? Was not the great democracy of Rome aggressive? Look at the enormous armaments of France. Look at the acts of America. Was not America always within the last few years should we have quarrelled with the United States but for the dignity and good temper of John Bull! The Oregon Question, the Enlistment Bill, the outrage at Vancouver's Island, would most probably have occasioned war with America, if England had been a democracy. He firmly believed that the military aspect of France was mainly owing to democracy. The French naturally were not so warlike as ourselves. There would be no army there without the conscription. The conscription was the key-stone of the gigantic military system which kept the whole of Europe in hot water, and made us pay the income tax. In time of peace and parade we no doubt experienced some difficulty in enlisting soldiers, but the moment a Crimean war began, or an Indian mutiny broke out, we could get any number of soldiers. The contrast between the French conscript and the English recruit was very great. In England, when a man enlisted as a recruit, he went with his comrades to the dépôt of the regiment singing "Cheer, boys, cheer!" or some such inspiriting ditty as that; but when a young French conscript left home to enter upon his military career he took a formal and solemn leave of his family, finishing the ceremony by kissing his grandmother. The conscription in France was popular, because it was supposed to have a tendency to raise wages, by withdrawing a large portion of the population from the labour market. It could not be contended that this Bill was required on the ground that at present the interests of the unrepresented poor man were uncared for in that House. In the case of the Factory Act and other similar measures, all the rules of Political Economy were broken, in order that the working man might be benefited. By the Health of Towns Act everything was done to promote the poor man's health. Again, take the question of taxation. What taxes did the poor man pay? He paid no income tax. Nothing that he wore was taxed in the slightest degree. Nothing that he ate, except a plum pudding, was taxed. In fact, taxation was struck off everything he consumed, except drinking and smoking; and with regard to the tax he paid on his porter, he believed more of it went to support a monopoly than to the revenue. The question of Reform would not be set at rest by passing the Bill. If the Bill were passed there would still be possessed higher qualifications than those who now enjoyed it, he should have opened the door to such members of the working classes as had the energy and disposition to raise themselves to it. If he were sincere in his aim he should have so framed the provisions of his Bill as to hold out to working men inducements to aspire to the possession of the franchise, and not reduce the qualification arbitrarily to include large numbers of them. There were two very important omissions in the Bill—such omissions as entitled the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) to say that he did not consider it a Reform Bill at all, but only a Bill for the extension of the franchise. In any Bill deserving of the name of a Reform Bill, there ought to be an attempt made to remove existing anomalies. It appeared to him, though his opinion might not be shared by many hon. Members on his (the Opposition) side of the House, that the most startling anomaly was the large number of representatives that were returned by very small constituencies, and the small number of Members returned for the larger constituencies. Surely this was an evil that demanded a remedy in every Reform Bill. Then, again, the inequalities of representation, which were closely allied to the other anomaly. Some additional Members were given to large towns in the most objectionable manner, leaving large and important minorities as little represented as they were before. Could anything be more unjust than to give two additional representatives to the West Riding of Yorkshire, for example, where 11,000 persons had voted at the last election for the defeated candidate? That minority would no doubt be considerably increased under the present Bill, and yet in all probability they would continue as unrepresented as before. He thought it was wilfully to disregard an opportunity for a beneficial change to propose to increase the injustice rather than to correct it.

[Fourth Night.]

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present. House counted; and Forty Members being found present—

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON resumed: An hon. Member referred to the great inequality of the representation as regarded Scotland. That country occupied much less attention from the Government than it deserved. Scotland, in respect to its wealth and population, was entitled to at least seventy Members. By the present Bill she was only to get an additional three or four seats, and therefore Scotland had great reason to object that the inequality of representation of which she complained was continued by this Bill. This was another proof of the grave omissions of the Bill. It would be folly to pass it, too, without some attempt to remove the scandal and reproach of the intimidation and corruption which now existed. The obstacles which existed to the exercise of the franchise he looked upon as a standing reproach to all sincere reformers. Whether it were intimidation or corruption, intimidation by oppression or otherwise, it seemed to be practised in a great many places with perfect impunity. Whilst the noble Lord was extending the franchise to the lower classes he ought to have provided some means by which they would be protected in the exercise of their privilege. Without such protection it was better that they should be left wholly unfranchised. The revelations in the Committee rooms up stairs had shown that corruption and intimidation was the canker which was eating into the root of our representative system. That evil he thought would, in a great measure, have been obviated by the proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli)—namely, the distribution of voting papers. If that provision were carried many of the better class of voters would be able to exercise the privilege of the franchise who were now unwilling to run the risk of facing a riotous mob. Again, when the Bill proposed to admit to the franchise a large mass of the working classes of boroughs, upon what principle was that privilege to be denied to the same classes in counties? Was it because the same class of dwellers in towns were more educated, more enlightened, and more independent? He denied that this was so. Trades unions and associations were fully as tyrannical as any masters. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) had shown the wide-spread influence of those unions, but he could not understand how the hon. Gentleman, whilst holding the opinions he had expressed that evening, could have been induced to vote a short time since in favour of a Resolution affirming the opposite principle, and upon the success of which Resolution the Reform Bill of the late Government was refused a fair discussion. The only intelligible principle of the present Bill was that it gave the franchise to a certain number of persons; but it was most un-

[Fourth Night.]

just and impolitic to give to the working classes the power to override all other classes in a constituency. Therefore, his great objection to it was that while it extended the franchise by giving power to mere numbers, it failed to include classes much superior to those who lived in houses of £6 value. Members of the learned professions, officers of the army and navy, certificated schoolmasters, and other lodgers were all persons paying much higher rents than the house occupiers who were enfranchised. The residence in lodgings was the condition, and not the exception, of many hundreds of persons well qualified to exercise the franchise. He trusted that the House would not consent to this great injustice and anomaly being maintained. For whom would the working classes legislate if they were invested with supreme power? Could they be expected to legislate with large and enlightened views, and look beyond their own immediate interest? As the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) had pointed out, the 600,000 new electors might be ruled over by a small junta in London, exercising an influence throughout the entire country greater than that exercised by any legitimate authority. The manner in which that influence would be exercised, and what its effects would be in cases where that junta was interested in carrying out its own views, might readily be imagined by all who did not wish to ignore the experience of the past, or to disregard the laws upon which human society was regulated. He contended then that it was a false principle to extend the franchise merely on the standard of numbers. If the working classes were not fit to exercise it they ought not to have it, no matter what their numbers. On the other hand, if they were fit to exercise it, it was wrong to keep it from them, no matter how numerous they might be. But was it just that they should have the franchise conferred upon them without any test of education—even to the extent of requiring that the voter should possess the education given in a charity school, or that he should read? It had often struck him, when canvassing in English boroughs, that it was a great anomaly to see officers, graduates of universities, and other persons of education without a vote, while perfectly ignorant persons, and in many cases persons following disreputable occupations, had the franchise. Surely that was an anomaly which ought to be removed. There could be no doubt that this Bill would indirectly confer great influence on individuals. He was informed, for example, that the representative of one of the metropolitan constituencies was the proprietor of 800 dwelling-houses, the occupants of which would all acquire votes, and that an eminent manufacturer would have a larger number of his workmen enfranchised than was set down in the returns of the noble Lord for the whole burgh in which he lived. This subject had, undoubtedly, become too serious to be dealt with for mere party purposes. He feared the Bill, as now framed, would be likely to lead, not to a settlement of the question, but to further agitation and disturbance. The most notorious agitators had given fair notice that this measure would be used as a stepping-stone to further reform. Had not the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) over and over again intimated that the time was coming when those to whom the franchise was to be extended under this Bill would be able to carry a real Reform Bill, which he did not consider this to be? What security had Parliament, then, that if the franchise was lowered a Bill of revolution, and not one of reform, would not at some future day be the result? He believed that there were no hon. Members on either side of the House who proposed to gain a triumph for their party by the discussion of this Bill. The question of reform had, in the minds of serious men, become far too important for party triumphs. It was said that it would be dangerous to postpone the Bill, because less quiet times might come. He was not insensible to the force of the argument; but he did not see how a Bill would enable them to meet more dangerous times which settled nothing and removed some of the safeguards which still existed. It was, no doubt, desirable to settle the question, but a little delay would be well repaid if they were able more deeply to probe the evils which existed, and to devise a more effectual cure. He would cordially support the enfranchisement of the élite of the working classes, but he thought there were less hazardous modes of accomplishing that object than that now proposed. Surely the fancy franchises might be turned to some account. Could not Parliament open the door to men of energy and who had a disposition to improve themselves? If a man desired to raise himself above his fellows by acquiring the exercise of the franchise, could not means be found which would enable him to obtain the object of his desire? He trusted there were many Members of the House better qualified and with greater experience than himself, who would turn their attention to the introduction of such clauses into this Bill in its future stages. They had been told that the Government were not averse to having the Bill improved by the House. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: Hear, hear!] He had stated on a former occasion that the simplicity of the Bill testified to the desire of the Government to carry it, and their sincerity of purpose would be still further shown if they left it to independent Members to clothe the skeleton which they had presented. The hon. Member for Birmingham had said that the present Bill must be accepted, as the House would not pass a larger measure. He did not agree with that idea. He hoped the House would render the measure larger, more Conservative, more just and equitable to all classes of the people, and, as a consequence, more likely to secure a permanent and beneficial settlement of the great question before them.

Sir James Fergusson

MR. DENMAN said, he cordially approved the Bill in the main, and thought the Government had discharged their duty to the country in bringing it forward. He had listened with pleasure to the eloquent piece of declamation with which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Herts had favoured the House, but he confessed that he had been unable to detect in it anything in the nature of an argument against this Bill. They were not considering the state of things in France or America, but whether the present Bill was an improvement of the representation. It did not follow that because universal suffrage and the Ballot had produced great evils in the United States a £6 franchise in England was to prove equally mischievous. Unless a £6 franchise could be shown to be bad in itself there was no validity in such an argument. The House had also been asked not to legislate on the subject of the representation when things were in so critical a position both at home and abroad. When were things to be less critical than they were at the present moment? Such an excuse could always be found for not passing a Reform Bill. Reference had been made to the apathy which was said to prevail on the subject. The people were not apathetic, but—to use the words of Sydney Smith when the same argument was used in 1831—they were waiting with patience for the completion of the Bill, “because they knew it was in the hands of men who did not mean to deceive them.” The necessity for a further measure of reform was now admitted on all hands. Another observation of the same rev. gentleman was one well worthy of remark, that he did not expect the Bill of 1832 would settle the question for ever, but he did expect it would settle it for thirty or forty years, “which was an eternity in politics.” That prophecy had proved not far from the mark. A great change had taken place since 1831, and the people were no longer the same people who were dealt with by the first Reform Bill. The number and circulation of newspapers had immensely increased of late years, proving that the people were better educated and possessed more political information. In 1831 the total number of stamps issued for newspapers was 35,198,160. In 1849, the last year for which he had a return, the number was 89,346,000. Again, the number of persons who between 1839 and 1857 signed the marriage registries with their marks instead of their names had diminished to the extent of 5 per cent in the case of males and 10 per cent in the case of females. In the Registrar-General’s 20th Report, published in 1839, it was stated as follows:—“of the total number of persons married, of the men 72 per cent, and of the women 61 per cent, wrote their names; while 28 per cent of the men, and 39 per cent of the women, made their marks. This implies a great deficiency in the elementary education of the people; but indications of improvement appeared in 1847, and, as the persons married were educated some years ago, it is evident that the education of the people made a new start on the passing of the Reform Bill, and has since made considerable progress.” Railways, although the argument had been sneered at, must, by the freedom of intercourse which they had produced, have tended greatly to enlighten and improve the moral status of the people. The argument applied with remarkable force in the case of the Post Office, when, in 1839, the number of letters conveyed was 82,000,000, and ten years later it had grown to 337,000,000, showing an increase amounting to 308 per cent. If they looked at the frugality and care which dictated the large deposits in savings banks, there was still less reason to entertain dread of the classes that were about to be enfranchised, and he hoped means would yet be found by which those who had turned their money to such good account would be enabled to participate in the benefits of this Measure. In 1833 the number of depositors was 402,607, and the sums invested amounted to upwards of £12,000,000. In 1851 the depositors had increased to 966,000, and the investments to £25,000,000. By the latest accounts in 1858, there were 1,194,726 depositors of sums amounting in the aggregate to £31,533,736. If they were to judge merely by the contentment and general good behaviour of the people in the present day, it would be evident that they were no longer dealing with the same population as in 1833. They were reproached, it was true, with their tendency to combine in support of exorbitant demands; but had a strike of the same magnitude as that of a few months ago occurred in 1831-1832, would there not have been scenes of violence, dilapidation, and cruelty? His hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone had recently discussed with an advocate chosen by some workmen of his own borough, and in presence of a meeting of from 1,500 to 2,000 persons, points with reference to which his opinions had been unpalatable to the great bulk of his hearers. He (Mr. Denman) had been present on the occasion, and no discussion, even in that House, could possibly have been conducted with greater decorum, and he was informed that on all similar occasions, however unpalatable might be the truths which were uttered, and however calculated to give offence to persons who were not capable of appreciating a political argument, the working men behaved with equal propriety. And such were the men a portion of whom the Bill professed to enfranchise. In considering a Reform Bill, the object which it was sought to accomplish might be best defined by saying that it was an effort to secure a fair, adequate, and impartial representation of the best features of the English character. The present Bill divided itself into three heads, the first of which consisted in the redistribution of seats. He could not agree with the champion of reform as the hon. Member for Birmingham had been styled, that the pith and marrow of the Bill consisted in this redistribution according to the principle of population; for by the doctrine of mere numerical majorities in particular places they only obtained a representation of a certain state of feeling among a portion of the population, and they failed to include some of their most important and characteristic features. It was idle to talk of any

[Fourth Night.

Mr. Denman

attempt at reform as final; all that could be done was to remove anomalies from time to time. Perhaps the most formidable attack which had been made upon the present Measure had proceeded from the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey), but his arguments resolved themselves very much into the claim for an additional Member for Salford. That constituency, however, bore a close resemblance to Manchester, which would obtain an additional Member under the provisions of this Bill. The towns were merely separated by a stream, and he thought it mattered very little whether that Member were given to the constituency at one side of the bridge or at the other. In any case it was only a question for Committee. The hon. Member for Leeds approved of the Bill on several grounds, but among the rest because Leeds was to have an additional Member. But whilst on this subject he could not refrain from referring to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone as to the borough of Tiverton. The hon. and learned Member had put forward Tiverton as a specimen of a rotten borough, and complained that Tiverton was to retain two Members, while Guildford, which had more electors, was to be cut off with one. Tiverton was a thriving place, continually increasing in population and prosperity. It was the staple of the lace manufacture of Devonshire, as it had been the staple of the woollen manufacture. On looking to the Returns it would be seen that there were forty-six boroughs with two Members which were inferior to Tiverton in the number of population, inhabited houses, rateable value, and payment of direct taxes—inferior, in fact, in all points except one, and that was the number of electors. The number of voters at Tiverton was 526, and when the Bill was carried the number would be increased by from 270 to 300 persons entitled (as he was assured by persons well qualified to judge, of whom he had made inquiry) to exercise the franchise from their ability to exercise it in an independent and satisfactory manner. It was, then, unfair to call it “a rotten borough.” The House had also been informed that it was “a nursery, a cradle for statesmen,” and a “harbour of refuge.” As he did not call himself a statesman, he would say nothing about the “nursery for statesmen.” As to its being “a harbour of refuge,” he asked whether the borough which had given refuge to the Minister now at the head of Her Majesty’s Government, when ostracised

by the University of Cambridge and by Hampshire, deserved to be spoken of with disrespect? It was not "rotten," and any one who attempted to canvass the borough would find the electors determined, liberal, and unflinchingly independent. The very fact that for twenty-four years, through good and evil report, it had stuck firm to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, of itself was sufficient to show that it had a character of its own—a part of the general character of the English people. The arguments advanced on the other side with regard to the county franchise had surprised him very much, for he could not understand the horror which the idea of a man in a country district, who lived in a £10 house, having a vote seemed to excite on the other side. He could see no reason why a man living in a £10 house at Croydon was not just as fit to have a vote as a man of the same class who lived at Guildford—and fitness, according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, was the only test which ought to be applied. The arguments advanced against the reduction of the borough franchise were founded entirely on assumptions of the vaguest character. All sorts of "fancy" phrases of opprobrium were applied to the proposition, and these did duty for argument against it. It had been called "medæval," "homogeneous," a "brick and mortar" franchise; and he had been reminded of the saying of Hume, that "brains and not bricks" ought to be represented. The right hon. Gentleman opposite complained that a large mass of persons identical in feelings and habits were to be thrust upon the present varied constituent body, but he denied altogether that the working class were as "homogeneous" as the right hon. Gentleman imagined. It was a mere assertion, entirely unwarranted by the experience of those who had been among them and knew what their feelings were on political topics. It was a mere assumption, utterly incapable of proof, to suppose that all occupiers of £6 houses were labouring men. He had made inquiries in his own borough, and he was informed by friends on whose authority he could depend that in point of fact there were as many and more persons of a totally different description—small shopkeepers and retired tradesmen—who would come in under a £6 qualification. Constituencies differed very much in their characteristics, and the Bill would be attended with different results in different localities. He would venture to predict that one effect of the Bill would be to return bond fide representatives of the working classes, themselves working men, for some of the large boroughs, instead of hon. Gentlemen of great power, eloquence, and high station, but all drawn from the same class as the rest of the House. He would say with the greatest confidence that it would be a happy day for England when that took place. One of the difficulties which they felt in the House of Commons when talking upon subjects closely affecting that class was, that the opinions of working men were filtered through Members who did not belong to them, and necessarily entertained different notions from those which prevailed among them. He believed that the number of working men who would be sent to Parliament would be very small, but the difficulty of which he had spoken would be removed, and there would be the further advantage that the members of that class would discover how erroneous were some of their opinions. They would find their level. Their fellows would be satisfied when their Members had been heard, and the evil power of the agitator would be greatly lessened by their being heard within the walls of the House of Commons. He concurred in the wish which had been expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone to see a lodger franchise. He hoped a fair franchise of that kind would be added, and he believed it would admit numbers in the metropolis who were quite equal, if not superior, to those who would now be admitted in other boroughs, where it was the fashion for every man to live in a separate house. He also believed that the lower orders would be more likely to look for their representatives among the aristocracy than the class which possessed the franchise now were. Constituencies were, generally speaking, very glad to have a Lord for their representative, if they could get him, and this feeling would be, he believed, increased rather than diminished. His hon. and learned Friend seemed, the other night, to be apprehensive that there would be a great addition to the constituency in the metropolitan boroughs, and said that as there were 3,796 houses in St. Pancras alone, the landlords of which paid the taxes under the Compounding Acts, that by a very simple alteration as many persons as houses could obtain votes. The hon. and learned Member entirely forgot that these 3,796 houses were let out in floors to, perhaps, four times as many people, and that it did not follow there were as many £6 tenants as houses. The number of houses was no test of the number of voters. There would be no vote without a separate occupation at a £6 yearly rent, and these tenants did not occupy from year to year, but from week to week. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire seemed to have fallen into the same error when he said that a man who paid 2s. 4d. a week occupied a tenement worth £6 a year. It must be a clear annual value of £6, and weekly tenants were charged a higher sum than the value, because of the uncertainty of the holding. He apprehended that the statistics of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone were entirely fallacious, and if they were to attend to such objections they might never legislate at all on the subject. Therefore they must take a fair average statement, such as was furnished by the Return on the table. By the present Bill every person would have a vote in a borough who occupied, as owner or tenant, a tenement of the clear yearly value of not less than £6. He must have an exclusive occupation, and not an occupation as servant or lodger, whether of the whole or part of a house, and his qualification would likewise depend on residence for a certain period and on the payment of rates. Were not these safeguards to prevent a flitting and uncertain population from having the franchise under the Bill? The question was whether the £10 qualification should be reduced to £6, and every one must be guided to some extent by his own inquiries and experience. Under the £6 qualification as under the £10 qualification, there would, no doubt, be many undesirable persons in possession of the franchise; and it was said that brothel keepers would be enfranchised. But he was not aware that that was more likely to be the case under the £6 than under the £10 qualification. If one person in 10,000 were vile and base enough to keep a brothel, were all the honest, hardworking, intelligent men living in £6 tenements therefore to be deprived of the franchise? There were certain objections taken to the Bill, not on account of what it did, but on account of what it did not do; and he for one should most gladly consider any well-conceived scheme to bring within the franchise respectable lodgers paying a certain amount of rent. He believed that that would be a Conservative measure, in a good sense of the word, and that it would be beneficial in admitting working men to the franchise who would not come under the £6 franchise. It was objected by some that the Bill was imperfect because it did not contain a provision for the introduction of vote by ballot. Now, he was not going to argue that question at any length; but he had no hesitation in stating that if he believed the men who would be admitted to the franchise by the measure would require the ballot he would not support the Motion then before the House. He was firmly convinced that, as a body, they did not want it, and that the great majority of them would be as independent as the Members of our existing constituency. He felt persuaded that the ballot would make voting secret in those cases in which it ought to be public, while it would leave voting public in those cases in which it was sought to render it secret. It would secure secrecy in those cases in which it was the interest of the community at large to know whether or not bribery and intimidation had been practised; but it would never prevent the agents of corruption from learning through wives, or children, or apprentices, or other persons, whether the parties they had bribed had voted according to their promises. That was one ground on which he opposed the ballot. He believed that the present Bill was a good one in its main provisions, and he could not, therefore, refuse to give to it his support. It was true that some of those who supported the Bill from his side of the House had dealt it very severe wounds. But that arose from the nature of the case. They were a Liberal party, and it was of the very nature of a Liberal party that there should be serious divisions among them as to the extent to which reform should be carried, while all were agreed on the necessity of some reform. There were many points on which he did not agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham—particularly on the question of the ballot; but on this Bill the hon. Member, he held, had acted a wise and patriotic part in not insisting on his own ulterior views. With regard to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, they would have been just as applicable to the Bill of 1832 as they were to the present measure. The Bill was certainly not absolutely complete or even perfect, but was a skeleton measure on which it would be easy in Committee to graft clauses which would make it more effective. In the course of the debate he had been alluded to as having signed a memorial in favour of an educational franchise. It was true that he had done so, in common with the present Lord Chancellor and other eminent men, but though he retained the opinion he then expressed, there might be valid reasons why no such franchise was allowed to form part of the present measure. It was difficult, for example, to find any one who would be entitled to vote under an educational franchise, who would not also be entitled to vote under a £6, or at all events, under a lodger franchise, so that they would be establishing a cumbrous system for the benefit of only a small number of voters; and besides this, it would give an additional vote, in many instances, to people who had one, possibly more, already. He thought the Government had done wisely in not introducing what were called the fancy franchises, though he thought the lodger franchise was desirable. There was one suggestion, however, to which he hoped the Government would listen. A Member was to be given to the University of London, the graduates of which were scattered over the country, and were very anxious that they should be allowed to vote by a system of voting papers. In the older Universities the existing system was found to work the greatest inconvenience. At Cambridge, for instance, there were about 230 resident and about 4,500 non-resident Members of the Senate, many of whom were poor curates and persons who could often spare neither the time nor the money to go the University on the occasion of an election. It used to be the practice to pay the travelling expenses of such persons, but he hoped that a clause would be inserted in the Bill enabling the graduates of the London as well as those of all the other Universities to record their votes by voting papers. With regard to the Bill generally, he should give it his hearty support, believing, that, as Earl Grey said of the measure of 1832, in the best sense of the word, it would be Conservative of the constitution.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. Denman

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he might congratulate the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down on having made a good speech, and gallantly fought an up-hill battle in defence of the measure. But he thought he might still more congratulate the Government in having at length had the good fortune to find a supporter, and he trusted the noble Lord who had taken this Bill under his more special protection would, for the sake of human nature in general, and the character of public men in particular, not be wanting in gratitude. To the hon. and learned Gentleman the noble Lord owed it that when he next sat in Cabinet Council, if it should happen—as it might possibly happen—that some of his colleagues were lukewarm or reluctant, the noble Lord might venture to assume a firmer and loftier tone, and say with proud consciousness to his colleagues, “I have got a supporter.” He (Sir J. Walsh) had attended pretty closely to these long debates, and up to this time his mind was in a state of doubt and perplexity as to which side of the House he ought to award the prize of merit for having levelled the heaviest blows and inflicted the greatest damage on this measure. For some time he thought the hon. and learned Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) had inflicted the heaviest hit in that able speech which he terminated by pronouncing the emphatic “No” to the question of the second reading—a monosyllable that would be re-echoed by himself (Sir J. Walsh) at the proper time. But soon after the House was addressed by another hon. and learned Member, only second in authority among them to the Speaker, and to that Gentleman, the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey), he was obliged—although he (Sir John Walsh) leaned with some degree of partiality to his own side of the House—toward the merit of having inflicted the greatest damage upon the Bill. So things went on with doubtful success till on Monday night they had the pleasure of hearing the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy), whose powerful and able speech all must admit to be among the happiest bursts of modern Parliamentary eloquence. Still, with every wish to award the belt—to use the language of the day—to the hon. Member for Leominster, he was obliged to admit that it had been taken fairly out of his hon. Friend’s grasp by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James), who, although not dealing with so many points, contrived to give the Bill a mortal stab. He might take the opportunity of advertising to a circumstance connected with himself, which arose out of the hon. and learned Member’s speech, who, mistaking a quotation from a little work which he (Sir J. Walsh) had given to the world for a statement of the right hon. Member for Droitwich, had referred to a conversation which had actually taken place, in which a constituent of the hon. and learned Gentleman, a Conservative, stated that he had withdrawn from political contests for ten years because he had no chance of getting a Member sympathizing with his views. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone said if there was a sulky elector in that borough there might also be another sulky elector in Droitwich, whom the right hon. Baronet did not represent. It was not likely that there was a sulky elector in Droitwich, considering the conciliatory manners and great abilities of the right hon. Gentleman who represented that borough. That was the point which he (Sir J. Walsh) was endeavouring to prove—the great injustice which these proposed alterations in constituencies inflicted by shutting out whole classes of opinions. In all boroughs there were some persons who were not represented; but in the large urban constituencies, especially in the new boroughs, the evil was much greater than in the old and smaller constituencies. In the case of Marylebone the Conservative elector had nowhere to look for consolation; if he went to Finsbury, or to the Tower Hamlets, or to Lambeth, he found his principles equally unrepresented, while the Liberal elector at Droitwich had only to drive a short distance to Bewdley, and there he would find a representative of his opinions. The objections which had been urged by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone against the accuracy of the Returns which had been laid upon the table were directed against the very existence of the measure. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs based all his arguments upon them. He claimed for the Bill the character of being a sound, moderate, safe, and wholesome measure; but if the Returns were as inaccurate as had been stated, it possessed none of these characteristics, and all the noble Lord's arguments fell to the ground. If the hon. and learned Member's assertion that the Returns only represented half the number of voters that would be enfranchised were correct they had better wait till more excited times, when brickbats were flying about and bludgeons flourished, for they could not be in a worse position. No argument had made so strong an impression upon his own mind as that advanced by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Bulwer Lytton), who had pointed out what was really the fact, that scarcely any houses could be found of a smaller rental than £6. A comfortable cottage for a labourer with a garden attached, even in the country, generally let for £6; and therefore it was fair to assume that in towns of the second order of importance only any houses which was more than a cabin or hovel would obtain £6 rent. If this were so, this was really a household suffrage Bill under another name. It had also been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) that a house let off in flats or chambers might give votes to three or four persons. Under all the circumstances, he thought that a prima facie case at least had been made out against the accuracy of the Returns; and it was possible that, if the noble Lord was once convinced that the measure would enfranchise 400,000 instead of 200,000 persons, he might see the necessity of withdrawing the Bill, which had been founded upon such erroneous data, and had met with so few supporters. In the absence of all proof of the correctness of the Returns, it was fraught with the greatest risk to the character of the House to go on with this Bill. They ought first to ascertain the grounds on which they were about to legislate. If through the investigation, which was going on in "another place" before a highly competent Committee, it should turn out that all the data on which the Government founded their measure were erroneous, the House would be placed in a false and humiliating position. Nobody could suspect the noble Lord of double-dealing, but one might suppose he was preparing a quiet sort of feather-bed to tumble his Bill upon. When the measure reached the House of Lords it might be found that it had been based on what might be characterized as false pretences. The hon. Member for Bristol, an old Whig, and one of the noble Lord's oldest supporters, on Monday night attacked the Bill with a degree of virulence with which few measures were assailed in that House, and bitterly complained of the painful position in which it would place him towards his constituents. There was, in fact, only one party anxious to pass the Bill, and it was led by the hon. Member for Birmingham. But that party avowedly accepted it only as an instalment. They were too straightforward to practice dissimulation or reserve on that point. They did not profess to rest upon it for one moment as a final measure, but wished to make use of it for the purpose of obtaining something else. It was the mere prelude to the changes that were to follow. Well, what were the ulterior objects contemplated by those hon. Gentlemen? Why, the redistribution of seats, the ballot, the abolition of the rate-paying clauses, and all those measures which, coupled with this great extension of the franchise, would have the effect of changing the character of the House and converting it into a purely democratic assembly. Those Gentlemen, indeed, said it ought to be a democratic assembly—that being the people's House it ought to represent the people, meaning by that term the numerical masses. Now, that might be quite consistent in those hon. Gentlemen; but how could those who, if any of these subversive measures were proposed, would unhesitatingly vote against them, reconcile it to their consciences to support a Bill avowedly viewed as the means of effecting such unconstitutional objects? The hon. and learned Gentleman who had made so elaborate and excellent a defence of Tiverton did not seem to see that if this Bill were carried Tiverton must go, if not this year, the next. Surely the hon. and learned Member's constituents had a right to claim from him an effort to secure them a much more prolonged political existence. In the very nature of things this measure, if passed, must bring on further changes in the constitution. He was one of those—now a rather select band—who had the advantage or disadvantage of a seat in the Parliament which carried the Reform Bill of 1832, and, as hon. Gentlemen might be aware, he was one of the most strenuous opponents of that measure. Not only so, but he had the honour, at the request of the late Sir Robert Peel, of moving its rejection; and that was one of the few acts of his public life of which he was particularly proud. The difference in the tone and temper of the debates then and now was very remarkable. The Conservatives always rested their objection to the first Reform Bill on the ground that it could never be a final measure. Mr. Croker, Sir Robert Peel, and all who took an active part against that great measure, maintained that so great a transfer of power as it involved would inevitably lead to further attacks on the Constitution, until it entirely assumed a democratic shape. They did not deny that there were defects, blots, and anomalies in the representation. They did not defend Gatton and Old Sarum in the abstract, but said that the system was so nice, delicate, and complicated that if they began to alter and were not very moderate and careful they would destroy the balance of the Constitution and render still greater encroachments certain. That line of argument was controverted by all the advocates of the Reform Act, and every endeavour was made to overturn it. The noble Lord the Member for London and most of his supporters contended that the comprehensive nature of their measure was the very guarantee for its permanence, and said they had given it a sweeping character precisely in order that it might be final. The greatest pains were taken to create the same impression throughout the country. The cry was then "The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." Those Gentlemen who at the time represented extreme opinions—the late Mr. Hume and the late Mr. O'Connell, and the Gentlemen associated with them—entirely suppressed all movements of a kind which could at all interfere with the passing of the Bill. There was then no question of ballot or of rate-paying clauses, nothing that could tend to interrupt the unanimity of Reformers. It was all "finality" then on that (the Ministerial) side of the House. But now there was no pretence to "finality." All the predictions which came from the Conservative side in 1832 had been confirmed by the progress of time; and he said now—as he said of the Bill of 1832—if this measure were carried the House would not be able to stop there. Hon. Members who sat below the gangway, and who held the fate of the Government in their hands dictated their own terms, and expected to do so still more in the next Parliament, said that the Bill could not and should not be final; that it was a miserable and incomplete measure; and a measure which put Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Bristol in a painful position of defection. That hon. Member when appealed to would not even give place to the Bill by postponing for a night his annual Motion on the Ballot, declaring that his measure was a much more important one than that of the Government. He had no doubt that the hon. Member for Bristol would bring on his Motion next year, and if the Bill now before the House passed he firmly believed that the hon. Gentleman would carry it. The Bill of 1832 was brought forward by a powerful party as a final settlement, and as such it was at that time accepted by the country; but there was not a shadow of probability that the present measure would be final; it would not even occasion a pause in the agitation on the subject. If it passed into a law the hon. Member for Birmingham in September next would be starring it again in the provinces, addressing crowded and excited audiences from platforms, pointing triumphantly to the success which had been achieved in Parliament during the Session, and to the equanimity with which he had borne all the rhetorical blows of every hon. Member who had had a "shy" at him. He doubted not that the hon. Member would be perfectly successful, and would again present himself to the House with all the prestige which success in dealing with enthusiastic and exciting masses always gave a man. Of all the topics adverted to during the debate there was none so remarkable as the fact that a Bill so universally repudiated was about to pass the second reading without a division. It might be thought the most natural and obvious proceeding that hon. Members on both sides, who had so unanimously opposed the whole principle of the Bill, should testify by their votes to the sincerity of the opinions maintained in their speeches. But the fact was, that hon. Gentlemen on both sides had so entangled themselves with hustings' declarations and professions that now they did not feel themselves at liberty to give expression to their own impressions and convictions. The country was now, in truth, considerably in advance of the Government on the question of Parliamentary Reform; public opinion was ebbing away from it, and leaving Her Majesty's Ministers stranded. That public opinion was being exhibited in the defection of almost all their tried supporters, and in articles in all the most liberal public journals and periodicals. It was no longer a popular question. It might be a popular question on a Birmingham platform, but the sound public feeling of the community at large was not represented there. So far from the Bill being popular in the country, he believed if it was rejected to-morrow that the feeling throughout England would be one of relief and satisfaction. He took leave of it with considerable trust and confidence that it was not destined to pass into a law, and believing it was the last expiring effort of a mischievous agitation to which the natural good sense of the country was opposed, he trusted that in the next Session they would have to congratulate themselves on a good deliverance.

[Fourth Night.

Sir John Walsh

[Fourth Night.]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, it is agreeable to be reminded by the hon. Baronet of a time when we were younger than we now are. The prophecies of ruin to the country in which he has indulged, and the attempts to show that wild democracy is about to overspread the land, are the exact counterpart of those which I heard made thirty years ago. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Walsh) refers with satisfaction to the prophecies which he then uttered. I am glad to find that he is not in that position described by the poet, and that he beholds the flourishing state of the country without any of those feelings, which are supposed to be inspired by envy. But that the hon. Gentleman should have referred with satisfaction to the efforts he made to defeat the Bill of 1832, I own surprises me, for it is notorious that since the passing of that Bill the most useful measures of legislation have from time to time been adopted. Our municipal corporations have been subjected to legitimate popular control; the tithe question, which led to continual bickerings between the clergy and their congregations, has been satisfactorily settled and given place to harmony; we have utterly abolished slavery in the West Indies; we have completely altered the tenure of our Indian Empire; we have by the adoption of free-trade measures, which I am persuaded an unreformed Parliament would never have passed, increased the wealth of the country. I will not refer to statistical returns to show how unparalleled that increase has been, for they have been in the hands of everybody lately. But I say, whether with regard to manufactures, whether with regard to commerce, or whether with regard to shipping, there is no parallel to the present condition of the industry of the country; and while this has been going on, so far from being in a state most alarming to the governors of this country, which prevailed before the Reform Bill, there has been a change for the better, which in itself is a remarkable circumstance. In 1817 the Government of the day proposed the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in consequence of the prevalence of dangerous conspiracies. In 1819 they proposed six different measures of severe coercion to suppress the people, who were then believed to be aiming at the destruction of the Crown and the established institutions of the country. In 1830, not long before the Reform Bill was introduced, any one who travelled through the country at night might have seen fires blazing in the stackyards and houses of the farmers, and the peasantry were in such a state of discontent and insubordination that the Government were kept in a state of perpetual apprehension. And what has been the case since that time, especially during the last few years? Have there been disloyalty and conspiracy, or general discontent with the laws? On the contrary, the feeling—the general feeling—of the country has been that of loyalty and contentment; and the people, whether it be the artisans of our manufacturing cities, or whether it be the farmers and their labourers, have been enjoying a degree of comfort and prosperity not known to them before the passing of the Reform Bill. Therefore it was with surprise that I heard the hon. Baronet who spoke last pluming himself on his prophecies relative to the first Reform Bill. It seems that the hon. Baronet and others believed, at the time that Bill passed, that the settlement it made could not be final. But has that prophecy been fulfilled? Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say that we are even now, twenty-eight years after the passing of the Bill, again in the midst of agitation? for if we are not again in the midst of agitation, what becomes of the prophecy? And if we are again in the midst of agitation, what becomes of the statement about the total apathy of the country? The prophecy was wholly misplaced—it was a mistake; it has not been fulfilled, and is not likely to be fulfilled. Sir, in listening to this debate, while I have heard many expressions of alarm and much eloquent declamation, especially to-night, from the right hon. Baronet who spoke early in the evening; it has appeared to me very singular that the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken with so much dislike of this Bill, and with so much alarm, have never taken the pains to reconcile the provisions of the Bill with their alarm, or to show that their arguments followed naturally from the contents of the Bill. They seemed to think it sufficient to say that it is a Bill which admits the poorest classes of the community to the franchise, and, not only so, but that it gives into their hands the whole representation of the country. They have a perfect right to say so; but what I complain of is that not one of them attempted to prove it. We have had eloquent declarations to the effect that the poorest classes of the community will entirely overbear the other classes; that the institutions of the country will in some degree be impaired; that our finances will be injured, and that a great deal of mischief will be done; but what has never been attempted from the beginning of the debate till now is to show that we have really done what is alleged against us—that we have either, in the first place proposed to put the power of voting into the hands of the poorest class of the community; or, secondly, that we have given the entire representation into their hands. Now, it is worth while to consider a little, which I shall endeavour to do, some of the facts connected with this point. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Walsh) seems to be persuaded of the accuracy of the statistics produced by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James), and I cannot say I am surprised at it, for probably he has not examined the grounds on which they rest; but to any one who has looked into the returns made by the Poor Law officers and to the facts must see that the blunders made by the hon. and learned Gentleman were perfectly ludicrous. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that in the Tower Hamlets there are 67,000 persons who live in houses above the value of £10, and that there are only 28,000 who have the right of voting; and that in Liverpool there are 39,000 who live in houses above £10, and that only 18,000 have the right of voting. But if you pass this Bill you would suppose, from what the hon. and learned Gentleman says, that every one of these persons—the 39,000 in the Tower Hamlets and the 29,000 in Liverpool—will possess the franchise. Now, in order to have it happen that all these persons should immediately become voters, there must be some alteration in the state of the law which this Bill does not make. The law of registration that now exists is continued in the present Bill, the only exception, as I am reminded, being in the case of the assessed taxes. In all other respects the state of the law remains the same. There is a deduction of 50 per cent to be made for the persons living in £10 houses, and who do not enjoy the right of voting, and the reason is, that there are various restrictions by which the £10 franchise is bound and confined. If any Gentleman will take the pains to go through the returns from the largest boroughs, including the metropolitan boroughs, he will find what these restrictions are. In the first place, there are many men who at the time of registration—the end of July—have not been in occupation of their houses for a clear twelvemonth, and who therefore cannot be put on the register. Such a man may remain in the house for a year, but in the meantime if any election takes place he will have no right to vote. There are many others who have not paid their rates—some from negligence, many from poverty, and immediately the registration takes place their names are struck off the roll. There is another class of a very numerous description whose rates are compounded for by the landlord. The landlord compounds because he then pays a diminished rate, but the consequence is that, the names of the occupiers not being in the rate-book, they are not included in the register. But it may be said, though it would be a most extraordinary thing to say, that though not above fifty in a hundred £10 householders have the right to vote, yet between £6 and £10 a much larger number will be placed on the roll. The very contrary, however will be the case. There will be fewer, for those living in houses between £6 and £10 are a poorer class of people. Many of them will not pay their rates, and they are much more likely to go from one town to another, and so be often changing their residences. All these causes of diminution were left out by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. He does not seem to have taken them at all into his consideration. It was our endeavour at the time we framed the Reform Act to give the right of voting to householders who might be said to represent the ancient right of voting. I heard the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt)—to whom the hon. Baronet gave the palm of having struck the earliest blow at the Bill—I heard that hon. and learned Gentleman say that we were endeavouring still more to separate representation from property. There was once in this House a very learned Gentleman, as learned a person probably as the hon. and learned Gentleman, though that is saying a great deal—that Gentleman who was at the head of a famous Committee in this House—I mean Serjeant Glanville; and the report of that Committee was that wherever there was not a right of voting settled by law or charter of the place the common law right of England entitled every person paying scot-and-lot to vote at the election of Members of Parliament. Did Serjeant Glanville think that he was separating representation from property? Did he, or those who acted with him, believe that they were injuring property or its representation by what they so did? On the contrary, these men were the founders of the liberties of England. These were men who thoroughly understood our institutions, and they said that scot-and-lot was the common law right of this country. But not only was this the plan of Serjeant Glanville two centuries ago, but at the end of the last century Earl Grey, in proposing a Reform Bill, proposed this plan, that 400 Members should be elected in different electoral divisions of the country by all householders paying scot-and-lot. Thus after so long a time the principle of householders paying scot-and-lot was acknowledged by the authority of Lord Grey. When we were engaged in framing the Reform Bill it seemed to us that there had been that change in the manners and habits of the country that it could not be said that every man paying scot-and-lot was entitled to the franchise—that great numbers of them were not substantial householders as householders were two centuries ago—that many of them were in a state of poverty, and more especially that the payment of scot-and-lot, which was the payment of the poor rate, taking place at the time of the election gave room to a great deal of abuse, the candidates generally paying the rates at that time. We therefore proposed that this household suffrage should be accompanied as of old by the obligation to pay poor rates, but that that obligation to pay poor rates should be ascertained at the time of the registration fixed in July, and that no person should be entitled to the franchise unless he occupied a house of the value of £10. Well, we some time afterwards—at least, I, as a Member of the Government—considered that there were many reasons why we should reduce the money-value of the franchise. In the first place, I think the Committee who framed the Reform Bill were very prudent and cautious not to place the franchise too low. We considered, as some hon. Gentlemen do now, that if we placed it too high it might not be very difficult, or at least not impossible, to reduce it; but if we fixed it too low that would be an error which could not easily be redressed. We therefore placed the franchise high in fixing £10 as the qualification—perhaps it was unreasonably high; but, in the next place, there had been a very considerable change in the condition of the householders of this country. By various measures that had been introduced they were placed in a state of greater comfort, education had made great progress, the taxes which immediately fell on them had been very much reduced. There were, therefore, persons with houses much under £10 who were entitled to the franchise by their property and intelligence. Now, Sir, I have heard much said—indeed the greater part of this debate on the other side of the House has been conducted on the principle—that no extension of the franchise should be allowed to reach the working classes. [Cries of “No.”] I think the representation generally has been that the working classes are entitled to all our respect, but they are very poor—the working classes are persons whose good qualities we exceedingly esteem, but they are very ignorant—the working classes deserve all our care and our affection, but they are very corrupt; and, being poor, ignorant, and corrupt, they are not entitled to the franchise. [“No, no.”] Hon. Gentleman opposite say “No,” but I really have heard one speech after another to this effect, and that speech which on this point most excited my surprise was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. The speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. White-side) and many speeches since, have all gone to that point. They have none of them said that the working classes, having a very great share of the £10 franchise, ought to be more largely admitted to the right of voting—they did not propose an £8 or £7 franchise; but they objected to this particular franchise which does introduce a great number of the working classes. Therefore I say—and I can come to no other conclusion, and that is a very serious conclusion to come to—that a spirit of distrust of the working classes as holding any portion of political power is apparent in the speeches of hon. Gentleman opposite. [“No, no.”] Hon. Gentlemen again say “No;” but what is their proposal for the admission of the working classes? They allowed there might be some cities of refuge in which the working classes might be allowed to vote for Members. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) said that something of that kind might be allowed, although he did not tell us that Edinburgh was one of those places. It really behoves hon. Gentlemen to reconsider their speeches if this were not their meaning, but I say the whole impression I have derived from their speeches is, that you ought not to trust the franchise to the working classes, and that they ought not to be generally admitted to it. Well, let us look at what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) said upon this question last year. After saying that the Bill they had introduced would admit about 500,000 persons to the franchise, speaking on the 7th of June, 1859, on the subject of another Reform Bill which might have been introduced by Her Majesty's then Government, the right hon. Gentleman then said—

Sir John Walsh

Lord John Russell

“The question of the borough franchise, however, must be dealt with, and it must be dealt with, too, with reference to the introduction of the working classes. We admit that that has been the opinion of Parliament, and that it has been the opinion of the country as shown by the hon. Gentlemen who have been returned to this House. We cannot be blind to that result. We do not wish to be blind to it. We have no prejudice against the proposition. All that we want is to assure ourselves that any measure that we bring forward is one required by the public necessities, and will be sanctioned by public approbation and support, and therefore we are perfectly prepared to deal with that question of the borough franchise and the introduction of the working classes by lowering the franchise in boroughs, and by acting in that direction with sincerity; because, as I ventured to observe in the debate upon our measure, if you intend to admit the working classes to the franchise by lowering the suffrage in boroughs, you must not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope.”—3 Hansard, cliv., p. 139.

I must say that the right hon. Gentleman went on to argue most fairly on the subject. He said you might contrive a franchise so that it would appear to allow a great admission of the working classes, but, in fact, rather restrict than extend the qualification. He said, if you deal with the question, deal with it fairly, and provide for the admission of the working classes. But, although that was his opinion last year—although, speaking with the confidence of the Earl of Derby and the whole Government he represented, as well as the great party of which he was the leader in this House, he laid it down as a substantial proposition that in any Reform Bill to be introduced you must have a reduction of the borough franchise, and by that reduction of the borough franchise he meant the admission of the working classes. Then I ask how is this to be done? Let hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they do not approve this £6 franchise, frame some other proposition by which the working classes would otherwise come in. Some gentlemen, indeed, have said what I remember I suggested in 1837, that the proof of frugality, by a considerable deposit in the savings bank, might form a claim to the franchise; but, although that would admit some, the numbers admitted would be so small it could not be said to be a substantial admission of the working classes to the franchise. What other propositions have they made, and in what other way do they mean to admit the working classes? Depend on it, much as hon. Gentlemen have talked of the danger of passing this Bill, suppose their anticipations were realized and no such Bill as this were passed—if no other measure were introduced by which the working classes were to be admitted, whatever might be the feeling now, all that expectation which has endured for the last five or six years being then disappointed, the working classes considering themselves as the mark of stigma, as the objects of the distrust of this House, would be in a very different temper from that in which they have been for the last few years. Is there no danger in that. You will perhaps say, then there was no use in introducing a Bill to lower the £10 franchise, and alter the Reform Act. But successive Governments have proposed measures on this subject. The Government of which I had the honour to be the head, the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen, the Government of my noble Friend near me, and, lastly, the Government of the Earl of Derby, although they did not propose to alter the £10 franchise, have all introduced Bills on this subject of Reform, and I own it is my opinion that, if you have a Reform Bill without a reduction of the franchise, that will be more perilous than passing this Bill. Now, so far as the character of the working classes is concerned, it needs no eulogium from me, and I am of opinion that every hon. Gentleman in this House, although he may not wish that they should be the recipients of political power, will admit that so far as their conduct and intelligence are concerned they are deserving of the highest praise. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh seems, it is true, to have a great distrust of them, and contends that they are not good judges of difficult political questions. But let me remind my hon. Friend that one of the greatest political philosophers who ever wrote has said that it is remarkable that while persons in general are not good judges of political questions in the abstract, they are able to form a very correct opinion with regard to the men in whom it is desirable that their confidence should be placed. Suppose, for instance, that Mr. Huskisson had presented himself to the freemen of Liverpool, and had delivered a lecture on the bullion question, it is doubtful, although he was right in the views which he held on the subject, whether he would be able to get his audience to concur with him. The probability is, indeed, that they would have regarded his views as unsound, and that it was expedient that paper money should be abundantly issued, as wages would rise in consequence; but when the question was put to them whether it was likely Mr. Huskisson would make a good representative for Liverpool they had no difficulty in replying in the affirmative, being aware of his eminent qualities, his persevering industry, and the general estimation in which he was held. I admit, therefore, that if you seek to make people in general, be they £6 or £10, or even £20 householders, judges of difficult questions, either of political economy or constitutional right, it is not improbable you may find that they will come to a wrong decision on those points; but if the question submitted to them be to whom they should intrust the privilege of being their representative, although they may sometimes make a bad choice, yet I believe they will, as a general rule, be found to make a good selection. I cannot, I may add, agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh in thinking the constituency of that city the most enlightened in the kingdom, because I am of opinion that there are few counties or boroughs in the country which would have rejected such a man as Lord Macaulay; but, be that as it may, there is another point connected with the working classes which is well worthy of attention. It is a common error to suppose that they are always in a state of discontent, either with the institutions of the country or with the circumstances by which they are surrounded, and that they therefore seek to pull down to their own level those who are above them in station and wealth. For my own part, I believe that the poem of Burns called "The Twa Dogs" contains more philosophy on the subject than most of the speeches to which I have listened. After describing the poverty of the poor labourer in Scotland, he says,—

Lord John Russell

"But how it comes I never ken't it, They're maistly wonderful contented."

Indeed I cannot help thinking that the working classes take things more as they come than either the upper or middle classes, and that they are, whether from a spirit of philosophy, or rather, as I believe, from a true Christian feeling, as a general rule more satisfied with their lot in life. It is not therefore, I maintain, because they are discontented that we ought to refuse them the privilege of exercising the franchise. I now come to another part of the subject—I allude to the allegations which have been over and over again made without proof, that we are about to intrust to this class the whole representation of the country. In answer to that charge let me take the representation as proposed by the present Bill. It must be borne in mind that there are a great number of boroughs and also a great number of counties which send Members to this House, which are not at all likely to be swamped by that flood of £6 householders of which some hon. Members seem to be so apprehensive. On referring to the Returns, I find that boroughs, having a population of 20,000 and upwards, return 137 Members; that those having from 20,000 to 8,000 return 109, and that boroughs having less than 8,000, return not less than 87. Taking also the smaller boroughs having a population of less than 1,000, I find that no fewer than 111 return 172 Members, which added, to the 159 Members which are returned for counties constitute a majority in the list of returns. No one, I may remark, can fairly contend that with regard to those smaller boroughs any very great change will be accomplished, or that property, so far as they are concerned, will be less adequately represented than at present; for there can be no doubt that in them property rather than population is the prevailing influence, whether that influence be exercised through the medium of the landlord or the neighbouring squires. I of course quite concur with those who think that property and intelligence, as well as population, should be represented; but if any one were to attempt to frame a scheme by which the three should each be duly represented, I believe he must fail in the endeavour. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir E. B. Lytton) who spoke with so much ability and eloquence this evening, referred to the proposition of Mr. Mills, to the effect that a man of a certain degree of intelligence should have five votes and that another of greater intelligence should have seven or eight votes, as the case might be, and the right hon. Gentleman very properly set aside that plan as one which it was not desirable to adopt in this country. In the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject I entirely concur. Mr. Fox said, and I believe with truth, that if the wisest man who ever lived were to set about framing a constitution he could not invent one which would be even of a tolerable character. Concurring in that view, I, for one, while I am a reformer, and while I am desirous to improve our present political system so as to render it suited to the changing circumstances of the times, am prepared to stand by the old frame work of this constitution of the country. Hon. Gentlemen have been talking for so many nights of a new constitution that one might really think that this is a Bill to introduce a new constitution to that House. The Reform Bill of 1832 did so to a certain degree, because at one blow it struck off 157 seats. This Bill takes away twenty-five seats, and of these fifteen are taken from small county towns and given to counties. This is a change that makes very little alteration in the character of the representation. The general frame work of the representation will remain very much what it has been. Then we are asked, "But will you be able to stand there, and will not other changes be introduced?" For my part I think that the question leads to two very difficult problems, and I cannot say which is the more difficult. One is—Should we attempt to induce this House again to disfranchise a very large number of boroughs? Any one who tries that task would find, as we found in 1854, that those boroughs, being not merely nomination boroughs and having a certain number of electors, and often very independent electors, there would be such a resistance on the part of the representatives of those boroughs as, joined to the objections of the Conservative party, would create an opposition to such a proposition that would be irresistible. Then comes another question, on which the hon. Member for Birmingham and I very much differ. That question is, supposing you obtain the disfranchisement of sixty or seventy seats, as proposed in 1854, how are they to be distributed? We proposed, in 1854, that a great number—I think forty-seven or forty-eight—should be given to counties. We likewise proposed, both with regard to counties and cities, that where a third Member was given the minority should have the power of electing him. I am not going to argue that question; but that was a representation perfectly safe, and there was, at all events, in that proposition no excess in the line of democracy. But that would have caused a great struggle, and if any one should now propose to give those seats to the counties all those hon. Members who represent the great industrial centres of the north of England would propose that the greater proportion of those seats should be given to the towns. I do not wonder that they should make that proposal; but it would cause a very great struggle, and would be very difficult to carry. For these reasons we have not attempted any such changes in the present Bill. But we do not disguise from ourselves that if this Bill should pass, there would remain, with regard to the greater proportion of the boroughs, and the whole of the counties, very much the representation that at present exists. With regard to the counties, we have not done in respect of the franchise much more than the House has already decided. The House of Commons has decided in favour of extending the right of voting for counties to houses of the yearly value of £10. I do not say whether that is exactly the best limit, but we found it already decided by the House, and no one will say that occupiers of £10 will form any very dangerous element in the representation of the country. I think, Sir, I have now shown that so far from giving the whole representation of the country into the hands of the poorer classes, the class of householders we propose to enfranchise are very much above the poorest class, inhabiting houses for which they pay rents and rates, and in which they have had certain length of residence. A proportion of these are not working men, and a great proportion of the inhabitant householders will be excluded from this Bill. With regard to Edinburgh, I have seen returns, from which it appears that the present constituency is about 8,000, and that by a Bill of this kind the number will be raised to 12,000. With regard to many places the increase will not be so large. In Edinburgh there will remain about 12,000 houses for which no votes will be given. I cannot conceive that this will be so dangerous an extension of the franchise as hon. Gentlemen on both sides think. If it is found that we were right in choosing that franchise for boroughs, let the House affirm it. If, on the contrary, hon. Members do not agree with us, let some variation be proposed. But I own I cannot look with any satisfaction upon the prospect of this House declining to legislate on this subject altogether. In Committee any new clauses can be proposed, and that question of the lodger franchise may be very fairly taken. But do not be induced now by the absence of agitation to suppose that you can take this question up at any time and settle it when you please. I have seen an exemplification of a similar faith on the part of this House, but in which they were cruelly disappointed. Every one thought that the Catholic question could be settled at any time. It was thought very well that there should be a majority of five one year in favour of the Catholics, and the next year a majority of four against their claims. But there came a time when the country was close on the borders of civil war, and when yielding the Catholic claims was in fact a capitulation to a superior force, and many of those benefits which Mr. Pitt desired to derive from the settlement of this question were entirely lost to the country in consequence of the delay. Well, it was thought that the Corn Laws could be settled in the same way. It was thought, too, that the first Reform Bill could be settled at any time, and the consequence was it was settled in the midst of agitation. Who will assure you that events not now foreseen and that cannot be foreseen, may not happen to make this a question most difficult to settle? I remember that at the time of the first Reform Bill there was some feeling—no great deal—in favour of reform, and that when I proposed that Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds should have Members, that Motion was rejected by a considerable majority. This House and the Government of that day thought that they could settle any such claims at any time, and that Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds might continue without Members for twenty or thirty years more. But there was a revolution in France that contributed, not to cause the opinion in favour of Parliamentary Reform, but the agitation on the subject, and which fed the flame of that agitation until it got to a dangerous height. If you put this Bill off to next year or the year after, for the sake of the census, who will tell us what the circumstances may be under which we shall have to legislate upon this question? ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. Member treats this suggestion with great ridicule and contempt, but I remember saying at a quiet time, in 1825—the metaphor was not a very good one, but it expressed my feeling—that "If Parliamentary Reform did not flow on with the majesty of the river it would come on you with the madness of the torrent." Then came the riots at Bristol, and the Castle at Nottingham was fired, and you began to think that the time had really come to settle this question. History will tell you, and may you reflect on that history, that it would have been better if, ten years before or five years before these events, the question of Reform had been settled. It would have been better if prudent measures had been taken, if the franchise had been gradually enlarged, and if that measure of Reform had been carried by general consent, instead of being an object of such hostility and violent agitation. In the belief that we can now legislate safely on this question Her Majesty's Government has introduced this Reform Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire told, as I have already shown, you last year, that it was right to admit the working classes to the franchise; that you should not attempt to hold them in a state of dependence; that, with regard to them, you should not "keep the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope."

[Fourth Night

Lord John Russell

MR. DISRAELI: You have not read the extract correctly.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I have read every word of the passage.

MR. DISRAELI: No; read what follows "hope."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: "The lowering of the suffrage must be done in a manner which satisfactorily and completely effects your object, and is at the same time consistent with maintaining the institutions of the country." Well, I say that we, in proposing to lower the suffrage, believe that we shall satisfactorily and completely effect our object; that is our opinion; the right hon. Gentleman has another way of maintaining the institutions of the country; but I think we are as well entitled to be thought anxious to maintain those institutions as the Earl of Derby or the right hon. Gentleman. We proposed the Reform Bill in 1831, and Earl Grey advised His Majesty to declare in the Speech from the Throne that a measure of Reform was proposed with regard to the House of Commons that would respect and preserve every portion of the Constitution. Was not that promise kept? I have shown how well it was kept. I have shown that the institutions of the country are stronger now than they were in 1831; does the right hon. Gentleman deny that? Then, if we have kept that promise and have maintained those institutions, examine this Bill; examine it as much as you please, and if you find anything dangerous in it, alter that part of the measure. But my belief is that the Bill will tend, like the previous Reform Bill has tended, to preserve our institutions; and this I think above all, that if you find there is a numerous class that has advanced in intelligence, wellbeing, and comfort, and is fitted to possess the electoral franchise, it is an injury, not so much to them as to yourselves and the institutions of the country, if you exclude them from it. I remember well the homely and forcible expression of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) last year; if you draw a "hard line," and will have a £10 franchise and nothing below it, I think the "ugly rush" he spoke of may very possibly come to pass. I hope, therefore, that you will, by enlarging the franchise, strengthen the institutions of the country, and, by admitting a larger class to the exercise of the suffrage, give those institutions an increased safety.

MR. BENTINCK moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

THIRD READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. DISRAELI said, the Bill would probably lead to a prolonged discussion, and he therefore hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not press the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if there was to be a discussion at the present stage of the Bill, he could not think of pressing the third reading. There was another Bill—Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal Bill—on which there would probably be a discussion, and he would consent to that also being postponed.

Debate further adjourned till Tomorrow.

CUSTOMS BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. RIDLEY expressed his belief that the reduction of the stamp duty on bills of lading and charter-parties would lead to an increase of revenue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that under the operation of this Bill they would be able to ascertain fully the working of the present law as to the sixpenny stamp on bills of lading, and, if there was any ground for the prospect held out by the hon. Member, they would be very happy to carry out his suggestion.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed. Bill reported as amended.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

appointed to them their duties. He ving in the See gmentation had any appreciable
the provision for ughout the kingstantial increase-£10 a year to £20 a year to the urgent ne-
was, therefore,
hips should know
ums taken from missioners. It ecause in some
he income was ll, no considera-
e surplus there-
aces in the very
he contrary, the e labour great.
derable sums of m, which might ally for the large ion was increas-
unt was extreme.
fully established
ot been done to nd he should not se who had en-itions, if he had articulars. He t some measure to remedy what ying evil.

SLE thought it
attention of their
to the spiritual populous a dio-
s also right that should be direct-n the hands of ioners; for if the e Viscount were nt of Diocesan ke at the root
ined on behalf
er parts of the afraid the noble
e sympathy as
m. The noble
ne consideration
large amount of diocese of Durp of Carlisle)
r consideration
the actual con-Carlisle. The case of Durham

was 264, and in that of Carlisle 261. In Durham there were 28 livings under £100 a year; but their Lordships would be surprised to hear that in the diocese of Carlisle there were 11 livings under £50 a year, 9 under £60, 16 under £70, 15 under £80, 22 under £90, and combining the whole there were 120 under £100 per annum. He was quite aware that great claims could be urged with respect to the number of the population to whose spiritual wants the clergy ministered; but there was another important element to be considered, that was the extent of the acreage of the various parishes. In London, in many instances, a clergyman might go half over his parish in a few minutes; but in parishes so extensive as those in the diocese of Carlisle, the labour of visiting was very great. With respect to the sum abstracted from Durham, he found by a Return moved for in the other House of Parliament, that in 1857 the total income of the Dean and Chapter of Durham was £81,000, of which £22,000 was expended in defraying the expenses of the services in the cathedral and other outgoings connected with it; in point of fact, £53,000 was expended in respect to the cathedral alone. Their Lordships had already twice confirmed the plan of the Common Fund as now placed in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and under those circumstances, he hardly thought it wise that they should pass a retrograde Motion founded upon a petition without entering into the fullest investigation. Their Lordships should consider how many had benefited and how many looked forward to benefit by the resources of this diocese. A clergyman must live whether there was a large population in his district or a small one; and when gentlemen came to him for ordination, and in reply to questions as to their future prospects, stated that their expectations of clerical preferment were almost nil, he was frequently induced to warn them that although they might find the air and the scenery of Cumberland delightful, yet he was afraid that it would only tend to increase their appetite, and that a curacy of £50 a year held out very little hope of a comfortable existence. Clergymen in such a position, when called upon to visit the poor and the sick, must feel deeply their inability to afford them any temporal relief. It was most desirable that means should be found to enable these excellent, but unfortunate, because poor, clergymen to live in a manner becoming their position, and to contribute to the assistance of the sick, the sorrowing, and the dying. The funds of the diocese of Carlisle were absolutely exhausted; but that was not the case with that of Durham, nor did he think that sufficient grounds had been laid before their Lordships to induce them to make any change with respect to that diocese.

EARL GREY said, he had heard with considerable regret the speech of the right rev. Prelate who had just sat down. This was not the case of the comparative claims of the diocese of Durham as compared with that of Carlisle. The case brought before the House by the noble Viscount was this—that in Durham the property of the Church had been vastly increased in value by the working of mines. Large masses of people were brought together, by the labour of whose hands that property was made productive. An enormous income was derived from this source; and while private owners acknowledged the claims of their workpeople, and more or less provided for their spiritual wants, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners alone ignored those claims, and did nothing or next to nothing for the benefit of that large population from whose labours they derived so large an income. The principle for which the noble Viscount behind him contended had not only been affirmed by Select Committees of that House, but a Bill had been introduced on the subject, into which a clause, the object of which was to carry into effect that principle, had been introduced, and which failed to pass through the other House of Parliament simply because of the advanced period of the Session. The principle was, he maintained, one of undeniable justice, and he therefore trusted Her Majesty's Government would not lose sight of the question, but would, as soon as possible, endeavour to place it upon a more satisfactory footing.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to whose control was committed a large amount of Church property, were responsible for the religious instruction and education of the large masses of the population to whom the petition presented by the noble Viscount referred. He himself had, he might add, been intrusted with a large number of petitions, all praying their Lordships to take into consideration the necessities of the case. He had, for years past, but in vain, endeavoured to procure the recognition of the claims of the diocese of Durham on the consideration of Parliament. The result of inattention to those claims had been that the Bishop of Durham, in pursuance of his duty, had convened a public meeting in the town of Newcastle to which were invited all the principal landowners and proprietors of the diocese in order that he might lay before them the lamentable condition in which the population in his diocese was placed. No difference of opinion had been displayed by the laity on that occasion as to the propriety of the appeal which had been made to them; but it had been justly contended that so long as a large amount of ecclesiastical property continued to be vested in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and aid was refused by them towards the spiritual destitution which prevailed in the diocese, while its revenue was applied to other uses, it was unfair to appeal to the laity for assistance. He therefore demanded in the name of justice that a due proportion of that revenue should be devoted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the wants of the diocese of Durham, and trusted that Her Majesty's Government would take care to bring about that result.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, he did not desire to prolong the discussion, but wished briefly to refer to one or two points which had been alluded to in the course of the discussion. The annual amount paid from the fund of the Ecclesiastical Commission for the augmentation of small livings was £90,000; that amount was paid for this object last year. To this Common Fund of the Commission the diocese of Durham contributed £28,000. Of the Common Fund a considerable portion was appropriated to the augmentation of poor livings in the diocese of Durham, which had its full share of the Fund. As their Lordships were aware, the Commissioners could not, under the Act of Parliament, make any special application of the sums they received to the purposes of the district from which those sums were drawn.

THE BISHOP OF LLANDAFF thought, where there was a large population, and where property had been greatly increased in value by their labour, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were bound to consider the claims which that population had upon them as proprietors. His right rev. Brother did not make any claim on the part of any particular parishes; he spoke of the diocese of Durham as a whole, compared with other dioceses; and in reference to this he alluded to some parishes of large area and small endowments. In the first fifty years of the present century, from 1801 to 1851, the population of the diocese of Durham had increased in a ratio of 160 per cent. But this was exceeded by his own diocese, which included the whole of Monmouthshire and a large part of Glamorganshire. It appeared from the Tables in Mr. Chester's abstract of the Censuses that in 50 years, from 1801 to 1851, the population of Monmouthshire had increased by 244 per cent, and that of Glamorganshire 223 per cent.

Lord Ravensworth

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the diocese of London was much in the same position as the diocese of Durham; as they were, perhaps, on the eve of some legislation on the subject, he thought it should be known that London and Durham were united in feeling on it. He believed it would be impossible to raise any considerable funds to provide for the spiritual destitution of the Metropolis while the Ecclesiastical Commission received very large sums from rents of houses in the poorest parishes; the first duty of the Commissioners should be to recognize the claims of those who resided in these houses. He did not find fault with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for not having done what the law did not enable them to do. But the object of the petition was to request their Lordships seriously to consider whether the law ought not to be altered. It was well that those who might be engaged in drawing up a Bill on the subject in either House should understand how strong the feeling of the country was upon the subject. Changes were about to take place, by which large funds would fall into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and it was prospectively that the petitioners were desirous that a change should take place. Persons would no longer be willing to subscribe a poor pittance for the clergyman when ample funds were drawn from their own neighbourhood. He therefore trusted that in any future legislation regard would be had to the last Report which had been made on this subject.

Petitions ordered to lie on the table.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CRANWORTH, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said its object was to amend certain provisions of an Act commonly, but not very accurately, called the Mortmain Act. The object of that Act, passed in the 9th of George II., was to prevent dying or languishing persons from disposing of their landed estates by giving them to charity, it having been discovered that persons who had during their lives been neglectful of their duties to the poor were not unfrequently induced to endeavour to make compensation by giving away from their heirs and successors the property which they themselves had enjoyed. The Act forbade bequests of land to charitable uses by will, but it did not prevent persons from giving their lands to such purposes in their lifetime, provided such gift were made by deed executed at least twelve months before death, and provided the estate immediately passed out of the owner's possession. An exception was made in the case of lands which were purchased by the trustees of a charity with funds already in their possession—to these the twelve months condition did not apply. The Act itself had operated remarkably well; but there were certain provisions of a purely technical nature which were found extremely inconvenient. For instance, no conveyance of lands to charitable uses could be made, except by deed indented, as it was called, according to the old form; which entirely precluded any bequest of copyhold lands from taking place, as these could not be conveyed by any other mode than by surrender in the Lord's Court. In the Act it was also stipulated that in the case of any person bequeathing or parting with his land for charitable uses the conveyance should not be attended with any reservation whatever. This prevented a person who was willing to give land for a playground, or for the site of a schoolmaster's residence, from retaining even a right of way, which might be of great importance to the remainder of the property. There were other details of a similar character with which he need not trouble the House; he would merely state that the object of the present Bill was to retain all the provisions of the Mortmain Act which were matters of substance, and to get rid of those which were matters of form. In the Mortmain Act there were two classes of provisions—one relating to lands given, and the other to lands purchased. Different considerations applied to these two classes, but in both cases the Act provided that if anything were done contrary to the Act, the whole transaction should be null and void. With regard to lands given, this provision might be extremely reasonable and fair; but with regard to lands sold it operated in a way which was absurd, for the consequence was, that if the trustees of lands did not comply with the requisitions of the statute, the vendor, who had the purchase-money in his pocket, might claim the land also. In two or three instances—once in the reign of George IV. and twice in the present reign, Acts of Parliament had been passed making good conveyances where the trustees had not complied with the provisions of the Mortmain Act. He saw no objection, therefore, to making the remedy provided by this Bill retrospective in cases of purchase, though there was a great objection to making it retrospective in relation to lands which had been given. As the Bill stood it made the remedy retrospective in both cases, but in Committee he should propose to strike out the clause which made it retrospective in regard to lands given. In 1852 a Select Committee was appointed by the other House to consider the Mortmain Act, which recommended that, whatever else might be done, steps should be taken immediately to give a retrospective remedy in the case of purchased lands. Several Bills of this description had passed through the other House, with the general assent of all the legal authorities there, but up to the present time none of them had passed into law.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD ABINGER said, that in his opinion this Bill ought not to receive the sanction of their Lordships. He believed that this Bill, or another with the same clauses, and under a different title, had been rejected by their Lordships no less than four times. The Bill was evidently intended to repeal the Mortmain Act. But it would not remove the evils complained of, and if their Lordships passed the Bill they would be legislating in the dark. It seemed to him that if they assented to this measure they would render the law of mortmain wholly impracticable. He could not see why the Bill should have been brought before Parliament. Its purpose was to repeal the Statute of Mortmain, not directly but by a side wind; and therefore he begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out "now" for the purpose of inserting "this day six months."

LORD CRANWORTH intimated that he should not press the Motion for the second reading of the Bill to a division.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad that his noble and learned Friend did not intend to divide the House on the second reading; but he also rejoiced that his noble and learned Friend had introduced this subject, for it was one of infinite importance. The law of mortmain was in a most unsatisfactory state, and he wished extremely that his noble and learned Friend would take the whole matter in hand. It was a most difficult undertaking; but there was no Member of either House of Parliament who was more qualified to grapple with its difficulties than the noble and learned Lord. He (the Lord Chancellor) approved of the prospective clauses of the Bill; but, upon the whole, he thought it would be more prudent to postpone the further consideration of the measure.

LORD WENSLEYDALE agreed that there were considerable grievances to be redressed, and suggested that the best course would be to read the Bill a second time and refer it to a Select Committee.

On Question, That "now" stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^d this Day Six Months.

MILITIA (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they did not consider it expedient to postpone the training of the Militia in Ireland to a later period than that now proposed, in consequence of the backward state of agricultural operations in that country. The calling out of the Militia at the period proposed would be seriously inconvenient to the farmers of the west of Ireland; and as, moreover, it would occur at a time when labour was exceedingly well remunerated, it would also be injurious to the interests of the militiamen. Nothing could be more injudicious than to fix upon such a time for the training as it was obviously desirable to render the service as popular as possible with all parties concerned. By persisting in the course they had announced he was afraid the Government would lose a great number of the men. Many of the persons who had received the bounty had applied it to the purposes of emigration; and as an extensive emigration was now going on from the west of Ireland, the same result would probably happen again if the bounty were paid now and the men dismissed just before their idle time. He hoped that the Government would therefore give their best attention to this matter, and consent to a postponement of the period of training.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY wished to bear his testimony to the importance of this subject. The calling out of the militia at that time of the year, especially in the west of Ireland, would be attended with serious inconvenience, not only to husbandry in general, but to the operation of cutting turf. When labour ceased to be in demand there was great distress among the working classes; and at such a period there would be great advantage in having the able-bodied men called out to serve in the Militia. Moreover, it was desirable to increase the number of volunteers from the Militia to the line; and under the pressure of want, no doubt, many would apply for enrolment.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON explained the course which the Government had taken in this matter. The Militia Commission which sat last year gave it as their opinion that it was very desirable the militia regiments throughout the country should be trained as nearly as possible simultaneously, in order to prevent the practice of fraudulent enrolment first in one regiment and then in another. That recommendation was adopted by the Government and sanctioned by the Parliament, and the Secretary of State for War subsequently issued a circular calling the attention of Lords Lieutenant to the provisions of the Act, and announcing that the various regiments would be called out almost simultaneously—those in the South of England at the end of April or the beginning of May; those in the northern counties somewhat later. Communications on the subject were also made to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and his Excellency having consulted the Lieutenants of the counties, the larger number of them thought the time fixed upon for the training of the English regiments would likewise suit the Irish regiments, although a few of them suggested a later period for the purpose. In all those cases in which the later date had been recommended it had been adopted; and in some cases in which, though an earlier period was at first recommended, a postponement was afterwards desired, a postponement had been accordingly assented to. The intention therefore was to call out some of the Irish militia regiments on the 1st of May; some, again, on the 14th of May; and the last on the 22nd of the month; the effect of which would be that for a certain period the whole of the regiments would be out at the same time. He understood that but few representations had been made to the Irish Government that any serious inconvenience would result from the adoption of the plan determined upon. And as the date for calling out the regiments was now so very near, it was not deemed desirable nor necessary to make any changes in the matter.

DIVORCE COURT BILL.—REPORT.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented (by command) Copy of a Letter from the Lord Chief Justice of England, to the Lord High Chancellor: (being the same which his Lordship read to the House yesterday).

Amendments reported (according to order).

LORD REDESDALE proposed the insertion of the two following Clauses:—

“The Court shall not be bound to pronounce a Decree declaring a marriage to be dissolved in any case in which the wife shall be found to have been unchaste before marriage, and the husband shall not satisfy the Court that he was ignorant of her having been so at the time when he married her.”

“If a woman shall have married, being at the Time of such Marriage with Child by another Man, the Man she has married may petition the Court for a Sentence of Nullity of such Marriage; provided such Petition shall be presented before or within two Two Months after the Birth or Mis-carriage of any such Child; and if the Court shall be satisfied on the Evidence that the Petitioner was not the Father of such Child, and that he did not know that the Woman was with Child at the Time when he married her, the Court shall decree the Nullity of such Marriage, and no such Child shall be held to be the Child of the Petitioner although such child may have been born before the Decree of Nullity shall have been pronounced.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR objected to the proposed clauses. The object of the Bill before the House was not to change the law, but to improve the procedure of the Divorce Court.

Clauses negatived.

Amendment moved; and (by leave of the House) withdrawn; Bill to be read 3^d on Monday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, April 27, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Stock Jobbing.

2^o Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction.

3^o Church Rates Abolition; Jews Act Amendment.

OFFICE OF CORONER.

QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT said, that he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to propose to Parliament any measure to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee on the office of Coroner?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, he had a Bill now on the Orders of the House, giving an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench in cases of dispute between County Magistrates and Coroners. Since that Bill was introduced, the Committee to which the hon. Gentleman had referred had sat and made a Report. There were several of the recommendations of the Committee he should be disposed to adopt, either by bringing in a new Bill or by amending the Bill now before the House. But the main recommendation—namely, that the Coroners should be paid by salary and not by fees, he was not disposed to adopt. It appeared to him that if they were paid by salary, there would be no security for the adequate performance of the duties.

METROPOLITAN TOLL GATES.

QUESTION.

MR. INGRAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the notice of a public auction for the immediate letting of certain Toll Gates in the Metropolis, and also, whether he intends to take steps to prevent such auction, and to introduce to the House a measure to abolish the Turnpike Gates within the Metropolis? He was induced to ask the question, because that House had some two or three years ago agreed to an Address to the Crown for the issuing of a Royal Commission, with the view to the abolition of those gates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was aware that notice had been given accord-

late disturbances
over Bengal; and are in contempla-number of Euro-for improving the lual in accordance
tions of the late

By the last mail
ence had been ref the disturbances.

JEWELS.

ON.

FUJAR said, he te of the Lucknow
idency, and which ude; and whether
e been returned to

OD said, in reply
hon. Member for hat it was possible
arrived that morn-
a them, and there-
give any authentic object. He had,
ate letters contain-subject, and stating crease of the Police

question of the hon.
M. Farquhar) cerigned to the Prince
into the Residency
could not say what

But the King of d for some Jewels
m, and the Govern-
d them to be given whether they were

R IN THE PEIHO ON.

d, he would beg to ent, Whether there
port of the sinking
, the Dove and Al-
f the forts on the

'AGET said, that a sived from Admiral ng, March 15, in at the Sampson had day before she was
wo vessels reported
there was no reason ort in question was

On Motion that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday,

CONDUCT OF THE INDIAN CADETS IN EGYPT—QUESTION.

MR. MILD MAY said, that he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for India, to the statements published in The Times of the 23rd inst., which represented the conduct of the Indian Cadets in passing through Egypt as “systematically outrageous,” and to ask him whether there was any truth in the charge thus made; and if so, whether he was prepared to take steps for discovering and punishing past offenders, and for exercising more control over those young gentlemen for the future. It was alleged that the Cadets entered the great mosque at Cairo while a religious ceremony was being performed, and the Viceroy was present; and they misconducted themselves so grossly, that by the direction of the Viceroy they were turned out of the building. This was not a mere ordinary disturbance. It was most important for the safety of our Indian Empire that the privilege of transit through Egypt should be maintained; but could we expect to maintain it, considering the sensitiveness of Eastern nations in matters of religion, if such outrages were continued? If the officers alluded to in The Times were really guilty of such conduct, they showed themselves ill qualified for their future position in India, a country where it was essential that every respect should be paid to the religious prejudices of the Natives. If, on the other hand, the offenders were not officials, it was necessary that some special power should be given to our representatives in Egypt, by which they should be enabled to exercise some control over the English passengers. The question was not merely whether the transit should be made unpleasant to succeeding passengers—far more important results were at stake. The Mahomedans had the means of spreading, with extraordinary rapidity, any news relating to their religion; and who could tell that what was done out of contempt for Mahomedanism in Cairo might not produce a bad effect among the fanatical tribes on our north-western frontier? France had always been carrying on intrigues against us in Egypt, her object apparently being to render our tenure of the transit route precarious, and, upon a favourable opportunity, to interrupt it altogether. The Suez Canal was, no doubt, projected with this view; for a large number of Frenchmen would thereby have been brought into Egypt, and would have established for France a greater hold upon the country. Hitherto we had been able effectually to maintain the transit, owing to the friendly relations which existed with the Porte, and the profit derived by the latter; but, if these outrages upon the Mahomedan religion were repeated, the Porte might no longer be inclined to allow the use of this route by England.

COLONEL SYKES said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered the question, he wished to observe that gentlemen going to India had a right to complain of an anonymous accusation, charging them with the commission of systematic outrages. The account in The Times set forth that “we” had ascertained that the Indian Cadets were guilty of these offences. Who were the “we” here referred to? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would try to ascertain this, and, if necessary, would prosecute the accuser for gross calumny. As to the specific case mentioned, it was stated in a letter in The Times that at the moment when this outrage was said to have taken place at Cairo, the Bombay passengers had left Suez and were on the voyage to Aden. Under the old régime the Court of Directors were in the habit, when they sent out Cadets, of placing them in the charge of an officer who was bound to send a report to the Court of Directors of the conduct of the individuals under his charge, and if any one misconducted himself, the Court of Directors would send orders with regard to his disposal afterwards in India. In this way they were enabled to ascertain what was the conduct of Cadets after leaving this country, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Wood) whether he had received systematic reports from India on this point, and whether there was on record a single instance of outrages of this description?

SALE OF GAS ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. BYNG said, this Act had been passed at the fag-end of last Session, at a time when there was a thin attendance, and there were several points connected with its construction on which doubt existed. He wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether its provisions, which would come into operation on the 13th of next May, were compulsory or permissive; whether the magistrates at Quarter-Sessions would be allowed to defray out of the county rates not only the expenses of the inspectors, but the pay of sub-inspectors and of labourers, who would be required to assist the inspectors, the cost of stations, and of model gas-holders; and if so, whether the small remuneration (six-pence) to be allowed for stamping the models, would be increased by a Supplemental Bill? In Middlesex the cost of the new system would, it was estimated, amount to £2,000 a year; and if only sixpence were allowed for stamping the models, the result would be to throw a heavy additional burden on the ratepayers.

FRENCH SILK DUTIES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, before the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade answered the question of the hon. Member, he was anxious to call his attention to a subject of the greatest importance to some of his constituents. He was informed that at that moment negotiations with the Government of France were going on as to the basis upon which the 30 per cent duty upon our silk goods entering France was to be determined. He recollected the difficulty that had existed with the American Government upon the subject of those valuations. If the valuations were real, 30 per cent might be said to amount to something like a prohibition. He had seen the French accounts of the mode in which those valuations were made. The valuation of those goods was enormously higher than that which was put upon them at the Custom House on their arrival. The House would feel he was only doing his duty in calling the attention of the Government to this question, inasmuch as a large body of persons whom he represented were already plunged into deep distress by the execution of those Treaties. He trusted attention would be given to the subject, so that the valuation upon which an ad valorem duty was to be assessed in France should not be such as to enhance the duty beyond even the fair 30 per cent that was to be levied upon silk and mixed goods, so that, in fact, that 30 per cent would not be calculated upon the fictitious value that was usually put upon them by the French Government. If there was a mistake on this subject it would render the 30 per cent absolutely prohibitory on the whole produce of England in that branch of manufacture.

Mr. Byng

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that in answer to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex, he had to state that the Board of Trade was in no wise responsible for the Gas Act. In fact it was not a Government measure; and the Board of Trade possessed no authority under the Act. He was quite unable to give a legal explanation of the various clauses, or as to the mode in which the expenses incurred in carrying out the Act were to be defrayed. All that the Board of Trade had to do with it was simply this:—The Treasury wrote a letter asking whether the Act was a practicable one. The Board took it into consideration and consulted the Astronomer Royal, and their reply to the Treasury was, that it did not appear to them to be at all impracticable, and so the matter, as far as the Board of Trade was concerned, terminated.

With regard to the question of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, he must beg him to understand that the Commissioners were not about to negotiate upon any new basis or principle, but merely to carry the out details and the provisions of the Treaty already made between the Governments of England and France. There could be no doubt that it would be the earnest desire of the Commissioners to carry out these provisions in the most satisfactory manner.

MR. PHILIPPS said, that with reference to the Sale of Gas Act, another question arose than that put to the Board of Trade. That question was whether it was just or not; seeing, for example, that it contained a clause for taxing persons who were practically strangers to the use of gas. He (Mr. Philipps) was aware that theoretically speaking, every Member ought to know the contents of every Bill that came before the House; but everybody knew that that was impossible. But certainly no one would have expected to find in a Gas Bill provisions affecting the county rates. The Bill was introduced at the fag-end of the last Session—it was, in fact, the very last measure that was passed; and when he heard it had passed and became acquainted with its provisions, he wrote to his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire on the subject, who replied that it had passed without his knowledge. He (Mr. Philipps) put it to the House that if a measure passed without the right hon. Gentleman being privy to it, it must have passed in a surreptitious manner.

MR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he was anxious to put a question to the President of the Poor Law Board upon a subject that was just then of considerable importance. The course of the discussion upon the Reform Bill many doubts had been cast upon the accuracy of the Returns which had been obtained by the Government, and which had no doubt been taken as the basis for their Reform Bill. For instance, the right hon. Friend the Member for Warwick had stated it to be notorious that premises were very frequently rated at amounts below the rent for which they were let. The noble Lord the Member for Gillingham's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had told the House that these Returns made out the increase to the number of voters in that borough to amount to only 50 per cent, whereas, after a careful examination, he found that the actual increase would be for 100 per cent. As the noble Lord the Member for the City of London and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Home Department contended that the Returns were accurate, the matter was proxima questio, and an effort ought to be made to settle it. The instructions from the Poor Law Board to the proper authorities in the different boroughs were clear and precise, but they required, in addition to the Returns that had been published, a return of all those who paid rates from £5 to £6. Such a Return had accordingly been furnished, but the Government had determined upon a £6 franchise had thought it necessary to lay before the House the return of persons assessed at £5 and under £6, yet it was really important to have it, as affording information on a most material point. In reference to Hertford, one of his constituents, who was very well informed on the subject, in reply to an application from himself, had favoured him with a communication in which the whole matter was so conclusively stated that he would read it to the House. His respondent said:—

"In answer to your inquiry, I do not think that Parliamentary paper No. 124 shows the maximum increase that may be expected under the £6 franchise. The parish returns may, I think, be relied upon. The instructions from the Poor Law Board, on which they are founded, are so clear and precise that the parish officers could not misunderstand them; but the whole of them are not given in No. 124, and I think that, in order to obtain the maximum under a £6 franchise, the returns from parish officers in the column '£5 and under

£7, £75; £7 and under £8, 38; £8 and under £9, 98; £9 and under £10, 27; £10 and upwards, 541; but the '£5 and under £6' column is not given in No. 124. The number under that column is, you see, 135, and from inquiries that have been made, I am told that positively sixty of these are paying rents of £6 and upwards, and that probably more of them would come in under a £6 franchise. The error in the Government calculation, if an error it should turn out to be, appears to me to be that they have taken the 'gross estimated rental' of the parish books as amounting to the same thing as the 'clear annual value' of the Reform Act. Perhaps, in law it ought to do so, but certainly in fact it does not. As far as Hertford is concerned, part 2 of No. 124 gives 238 only as the maximum increase for Hertford under the £6 franchise, whereas the real maximum would be, for the reasons I have stated above, about 300. Again, part 1, No. 124, seems designed to show the excess which the £6 franchise would give over the number of electors now on the register. The column relating to the number of electors gives 613 for Hertford in 1858-1859, whereas that is the number of names on the register book: but the real number of electors, as was clearly stated in the Hertford return, was only 539; the difference of 74 arises from the fact of duplicate qualifications. Then take the last column, for 'excess over electors,' this gives 166 only for Hertford, whereas, if the correct number of electors had been given, the excess would have been 240; and, if we add to this the number that would come in from the '£5 and under £6' column, the maximum would be at least 300 of excess, instead of only 166. I merely state how the matter stands as to Hertford. I know nothing about other boroughs, but it seems to me that return No. 124 does not give the maximum under a £6 franchise."

That statement clearly showed that proper conclusions could not be drawn from the Returns which had been produced. His hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury had also received a communication from a gentleman at Aylesbury, who said:—

"Lord John Russell's notion that about 220,000 voters will be added to the borough constituency is incorrect, and I feel persuaded that the increase will be at least 400,000. The fact is, that he bases his calculation upon the returns from the poor-rate; but the words in his Reform Bill are 'value or rental,' and my own impression is that if you take the two columns in the rate-book and find a house with a gross value of £5 and a rateable value of £4, it will nearly always command a rent of £6, and will consequently confer the vote as I understand; but all these cases are omitted in Lord John Russell's calculations as to the increase, because his returns only included properties which have a value of £6 attached to them in the poor-rate book. Everybody who has had any experience in the mode of making poor-rates well knows that the gross value in the poor-rate does not represent the rent, and of course the rateable value is still less."

A gentleman had written from Windsor

in a similar sense to his hon. Friend the Member for that borough (Mr. Hope):—

"I enclose you an account of the number of houses rated at sums varying from £5 to £6 but not including any at £6, which I have personally extracted from the rate-book, and can, therefore, rely upon. The rateable value of houses in Windsor is at about two-thirds of the actual rent, and I have known several cases in which parties have claimed to be on the register as £10 householders, although only rated at £6 or £7."

As it was very important that the Returns upon which the action of the House was to be based should be accurate, he wished, for the sake of information, to ask the President of the Poor Law Board whether, in obtaining Returns of Male Persons resident within each Parliamentary City and Borough in England and Wales, or within seven miles thereof, assessed to the last Poor Rate made before the 7th of November, 1859, at £6, £7, £8, £9 and £10 and over, instructions were not issued for Returns, and Returns made, of Male Occupiers at £5 and under £6; and, if so, why such information was not given in the Return of Male Occupiers, No. 124, of the present Session?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in answering the question which had just been asked upon this subject, he should not enter upon a matter which belonged to the general subject. He was asked whether the instructions for a Return of the male occupiers did not extend to that of £5 occupiers. His reply was, that the instructions did so extend. The reason why that information was not laid before the House in the Return numbered 124 was that he (Mr. Villiers) did not move for that Return. In the first place, these Returns were not made on any Motion of the House, but were Returns made for the information of the Government before they decided on the measure of Parliamentary Reform to be submitted to the House; and when it was decided to limit the franchise to £6 occupiers, he did not think it would be interesting to the House to know the number of male occupiers of a lower denomination. A wish had, however, since been expressed in the House for that Return; a Motion had been made on the subject; and he believed that the document would be laid on the table that evening. Up to this moment not the least reason had been found, in the department with which he was connected, for doubting the accuracy of the Returns. Whenever an instance of inaccuracy had been cited in the House, a particular inquiry had been instituted, and the correctness of the Returns had been verified. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had stated, for instance, that there was a difference of 50 per cent between the numbers on the Returns and the real numbers in that borough, referring to the addition which would be made to the constituency. He thought that noble Lord must have had very precise information, and, in consequence, he directed special inquiries to be made as to the Return for King's Lynn, and the result of those inquiries was that the Return was perfectly accurate; therefore the statement of the noble Lord must have been made on somewhat inaccurate information. It was almost exactly the same with every other case of supposed inaccuracy which had been brought before the House. He did not pretend that the Returns in question were infallible; he did not say that there might not be some way of accounting for the discrepancy between the numbers stated by hon. Gentlemen and those which appeared in the Government Returns; but whenever an inquiry had been made, the accuracy of the Returns had been verified. The statement made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) had made a statement as to the inaccuracy of the Returns, offered no exception to this observation. He did not pretend to question the inquiries which his hon. and learned Friend said he had himself made, not only into the Return for his own borough, but into those of not less than eighty other boroughs to which he had extended his investigations. His hon. and learned Friend had stated the result of those inquiries very distinctly and emphatically to the House; and when any hon. Gentleman made a statement on his own word and honour, the House was bound to pause. He repeated that he did not deny the accuracy of his hon. and learned Friend's statement; but he did say that inquiries of the parochial officers had been instituted, and that up to that moment the Returns had been verified. He did not believe that a Return of those persons who were rated at £5 would prove of much more importance to hon. Members, because no one is likely to be placed on the rate-book at a higher valuation than the rent which he paid, and if he were placed on it at a lower value that fact would attract the notice of his neighbours, who would not allow him long to be favoured at their expense.

Sir Minto Farquhar

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I must

express my surprise at hearing the right hon. Gentleman state that he adheres to the opinion that the Returns are accurate. I presume that what he means is this—that they are fairly copied from the rate-book. Is that his reason? [Mr. VILLIERS intimated his assent.] If that is the right hon. Gentleman's meaning, I for one do not doubt it. I never imputed to the right hon. Gentleman that these are falsified Returns, or that the Government had any intention to deceive the House. What I have said is this—that these Returns convey to the House an erroneous impression as to the number of voters which will be added to the register under these respective amounts. And why? Because I maintain that the column in the rate-books headed "gross estimated rental" affords no accurate information as to the amounts of rental really paid. Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman correctly or not? Is that what he means when he says these Returns are accurate—that they are correctly copied from the rate-book? [Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: Yes.] I am very glad to hear that admission; the right hon. Gentleman has only told us what we never doubted; and I tell him that his answer is no answer at all to the point really at issue, and which is a point of immense importance in discussing this subject,—namely, what is to be the real addition to the constituencies. Since I brought this matter before the House I have had communications from, I was about to say, all parts of England; but, I may say, letters from many places containing local information as to what will be the real effect of a £6 franchise if adopted. They are unanimously to the effect that in the local knowledge of the parties writing, these Returns give no information whatever that can be relied on. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to what was said on a former occasion by my noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). He says he has caused inquiry to be made in King's Lynn, and that he finds the Return for that borough to be perfectly correct; that the addition will be 50 per cent and not 100, as my noble Friend says. But the two statements are quite compatible. The right hon. Gentleman has been to the rate-book, and finds the addition to be 50 per cent; my noble Friend inquires into the real state of the case and finds it 100. Among the gentlemen from whom I have received letters on the subject is one who fills the office of Revising Barrister. His letter is not marked "private," and I presume he has no objection to my repeating its contents. He says he revises the lists of voters for three of the most populous boroughs in Staffordshire, the Potteries, the town of Stafford, and Newcastle-under-Lyme; and that in those three boroughs he is in the habit of adding numbers of persons to the electoral roll who come before him and prove that they pay £10, or more than £10, rent, though they appear in the rent column of the rate-book at much lower amounts. I have no doubt the Returns are correctly copied from the rate-books; but that is no criterion; and the only complaint I make against the Government is this—that in making this Return to the House of Commons, professing as it does to be the guide as to what will be the real addition to the constituencies, they did not candidly state on the face of it that which is notorious to every person acquainted with these subjects, namely, that the "gross estimated rental" column of the rate-book is not a fair criterion by which to judge of the number of persons who pay a rent of £6. But within the last few days a little light has been thrown on the omission on the part of the Government. Every hon. Gentleman must have seen a very long letter which appeared in The Times newspaper a few days ago, signed "W. V. H." I read that letter because it bore on this interesting question, and I was struck with two things; first, that it was perfectly evident on the face of that letter that the writer of it, whatever he may know of the law, knows nothing of the practice of rating; secondly, that while he betrays his own want of knowledge on the subject, he indulges most indecorously and offensively in the abuse of every one who differs from him. But since I read that letter I have heard with surprise that the writer is a person who was employed by the Government to collect information for the purpose of compiling this very Return. I know nothing but common rumour for the authenticity of this report; but if it be true that the Government were induced by any reason whatever to intrust the collection of this information to a gentleman who, though he is a master of vituperative language, knows very little of the subject on which he writes, I am not surprised that the Government were misled, and that they did not convey to the House that information which it had a right to expect, but which it is quite clear that this gentleman was little calculated to impart.

LORD STANLEY said, he thought it right to take the opportunity of making an explanation to the House relative to statements which he had made a few evenings previous, when the accuracy of the Government Returns was under discussion. On that occasion he incidentally took part in the debate, and he then mentioned the fact that the Government estimates of the addition which would be made to the £10 constituency by the Reform Bill differed very materially from a private estimate which he had received. It would be recollected that on that occasion he carefully guarded himself from expressing any personal opinion as to which return was correct and which was incorrect, and that he contented himself with simply stating that the fact afforded a fair ground of inquiry. He felt bound, however, in fairness and justice to state to the House that he had that day received a letter from the gentleman who supplied him with that private estimate or return, in which he stated that, after having looked over and compared it with the official document they were now discussing, he was inclined to think that his own estimate was overrated, and that he did not doubt the general accuracy of the Government Returns. He hoped the House would do him the favour to bear in mind that he had expressed no opinion of his own on the subject, and he had now thought it his duty to state to the House what had since occurred with reference to the subject.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor-Law Board, if he had it in his power, would add to the Return a column, showing the number of persons who lived in houses between £4 and £5; because without that the House would not get full and accurate information on the subject. He begged to say he agreed with every word which had fallen from his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich. Every one conversant with rating knew that the column of gross estimated rental did not represent the actual rent paid to the landlord. They were, therefore, attaching different meanings to the same words. The President of the Poor Law Board had supposed that the accuracy of the Returns had been doubted. That was not the fact. The fact doubted was whether that Return represented the actual rent paid. He (Mr. Henley) confessed he was never more astonished in his life than when he heard the President of the Poor Law Board express an opinion that it did accurately represent the rent paid. He knew very well; and he (Mr. Henley) knew, that it ought to represent the rent, but whether it did or not was a totally different thing. There was another thing that ought to be mentioned. All who were acquainted with rating knew that the difference between the real and estimated value was much greater, as they went lower in the scale. For what was called cottage property the rent, which was usually paid weekly, was always estimated at a figure proportionally much lower than the rent of larger houses, the rent of which was paid annually. He believed that in order to come to a correct estimate on this subject, they must give Returns as far down as £4, or the House would be misled as to the number of voters who would come in under the £6 rental. He did not say that without consideration. He had recently had an opportunity of comparing in a place very recently valued, under circumstances of very sharp litigation, within the last few years; and he had an opportunity of comparing the persons in the register as £10 householders, and he found that many of them were rated at a much lower figure than £10. Parishioners would not be at the trouble of a revaluation, and certainly there was no tendency to deteriorate in rateable value. He further thought the Government might have an opportunity of testing the accuracy of these Returns by means of the Returns to Schedule A of the property tax. He thought that these Returns, if the Government possessed them, though they would tell them nothing about the tenements, would give them something about the rentals. But throughout the whole country he did not believe the gross estimated rental was anything like the rent actually paid.

Sir John Pakington

MR. PAGET said, he had made inquiries into the Returns for Nottingham and it might interest the House if he stated that the rate-book contained three columns—one for the rent actually received by the landlord, another for the net-rent, a third for the rateable value. The first column consisted, with regard to the houses which were compounded for, of the total payment by the tenant to the landlord for rent and rates; the second contained the net-rent, the point on which the House was seeking information; and then the rateable value was a calculated amount. He had received from several collectors of rents in Nottingham the actual amount of rent they rework, and the result was that the latter was found to be substantially correct, if correct in every instance. His own belief was that they were entirely correct; but, contrary to his expectations, he found that the additional constituency in the case of Nottingham would not be greater than had been stated by the Government.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he had made inquiries into the case of Liverpool, and was told that the Returns were correctly given by the Government. He thought, however, that they would give a very imperfect idea of the probable constituency owing to the wandering habits of the population, under £10 rental, and from the circumstance that so very few paid their rates. He believed the additional number of voters would not be higher than from 4,000 to 5,000. Under the present qualification there are 39,730 tenements, but there were so many occupiers who did not pay the whole of their rates, that although at present the constituency was considered to be 18,000, after making the necessary deductions it was not in reality more than 16,000. On the supposition that the Reform Bill passed, the number of the constituency, according to the information he had obtained, would not exceed 20,000, or about 4 per cent of the whole population of Liverpool.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he had taken considerable interest in the question of rating, and his belief was that in the rural districts the gross estimated value did not represent the real rent of house property. He did not see how the Government could have obtained any Returns as to the real rental in all the parishes of England, as the rent was entirely a matter between the landlord and the tenant; and the Government was obliged to take the best Returns they could get. There was another consideration, that at present the £10 franchise did actually exist with respect to those who were entered on the rate-books for £10. A large number of these would get themselves entered on the rate-books at less than £10, and these must be deducted from the gross estimated number of votes, whilst there must be added a certain number living in houses which were below £6 value, though rated at that amount. So that the result would be pretty nearly one on one side and half a dozen on the other. It was impossible to obtain strict-could be.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to call the attention of the Home Secretary to an observation he had made to the House. There was no person in the House whose authority was greater than the right hon. Gentleman's on that particular subject. He had been President of the Poor Law Board; he was now Secretary of the Home Department. It was well known that he paid great attention to the subject, and great weight had been attached to a statement he had made the other night, in his reply to the hon. Member for Leominster, that he believed the Returns which had been furnished to the Government of the gross estimated rental upon the whole represented fairly the number of persons who would claim under the £6 franchise. It was no doubt very difficult to obtain information from different parts of the country on this subject. In some places the Returns were very accurate, in others very inaccurate. In order to furnish himself with information relative to the mode of rating, he turned last evening to the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1850 on the Parochial Assessment Act, and to the most valuable Report made in 1843 by his hon. Friend the Secretary of State on local taxation. In the first the House would find it stated, on the authority of Mr. Lumley, the Secretary of the Poor Law Board, and of Mr. Hyde, the Inspector of Taxes, that the differences in valuation were very great, amounting, according to the former, to a large percentage on the estimated rental, and according to the latter, in one instance at least, to no less than 100 per cent. [Sir G. GREY: In rating?] In rating and rental both. The Report on local taxation stated that 4,400 tenements out of 15,000 had been valued, some by professional and others by independent valuers; that even when professional men made the valuation there was a difference between the real value of the tenements and the value as represented in the rate-book of 25 or 30 per cent; that when independent parties made the valuations, the inaccuracies were in some cases still greater—being, in some respects, greater than they had been before the valuation was made. The Report was signed by his right hon. Friend. It seemed to him that when a valuation took place under the Parochial Assessment Act, within six years of the time when it was

Rochdale, where he resided, and also with regard to Birmingham and Manchester and Salford, to make inquiries as to the accuracy of the Returns, and he found that there was no complaint whatever that they were inaccurate. There was another point in the Returns to which he would allude. The Government deducted 27½ per cent from the number in the Returns, and some friends of his in Manchester who were connected with a political reform association, not knowing in the slightest degree, any more than he did, what course the Government were taking in the matter, made some calculations based on the number of £10 electors which were produced by a certain number of £10 occupiers, and they came to the conclusion that, at least, 28 per cent was necessary to be deducted before the number of persons was obtained who were at all likely to have the franchise. It must also be borne in mind that all the causes which, above £10, diminished the number of electors as compared with occupiers, would have almost a redoubled force in the constituencies below £10 occupiers. He was therefore satisfied that the number of electors would be very much less than was feared by some hon. Members of that House, and, he was sorry to add, very much less than he wished.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he rose simply to state that so far from supposing the Returns were placed before the House by the Government in any unfair spirit, he actually said to the right hon. Baronet opposite that he only asked for information, and that he made his request in no hostile spirit.

MR. HORSFALL said, that his information as to the operation of the noble Lord's Bill in Liverpool differed very much from that of his hon. Colleague. His hon. Friend stated that the whole constituency of Liverpool under the new Bill would not exceed 20,000. Now, the constituency at present numbered 18,700, and, adding the 3,000 or 4,000 new voters admitted by his hon. Friend to be enfranchised, the number, on his hon. Friend's own showing, would be more than 23,000. He estimated, on the contrary, that the whole number, with the additions under the present Bill, would exceed 30,000. The value of houses in Liverpool was such that the suffrage under the Bill would be really and truly a household suffrage.

MR. KENDALL said, he had no doubt that this would prove an unpleasant question for the hon. Member for Birmingham.

His attention was called to the subject in consequence of what had taken place in the other House in a discussion which took place there the other night—

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well that he was incorrect in the course he was pursuing of alluding to what had taken place in the other House.

MR. KENDALL apologized, and stated that from inquiries he had made, he was satisfied that these Returns contained great inaccuracies. Having heard that the question whether or not the gross estimated rental and the actual rental were the same, had been raised in "another place," he wrote to a gentleman in Bodmin for information as to the state of matters in that borough. The answer of his friend was that he had very carefully gone over the whole of the rate-book, and as he knew perfectly well the rental of all the houses in Bodmin, he was prepared to prove that there was a difference between the gross estimated rental and the actual rental, varying from 15 to 35 per cent; and, as an instance, he gave a house of his own, which was let for £37 10s., while it stood on the rate-book for £28, and was rated at £21. He (Mr. Kendall) thought there could not be a stronger evidence than this that the gross estimated rental and the actual rental were two very different things. No one meant to insinuate that the Government, in giving these Returns, wished to mislead the House; but what they wanted to show was this—that the Government had no data before them on which they could construct their Bill. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary refer, in proof of the accuracy of these Returns, to the auditors of the unions. Why, the fact was that the auditors of unions know nothing whatever about the matter.

MR. BARROW said, he could not suffer the discussion to close without giving the house his personal knowledge on the matter. He had made inquiries on this subject from the overseers of a parish of moderate size, who told him that there were a number of houses in the parish not included in the Returns at all, because they were compounded for by the landlord as under £6, though the actual rental was above that sum. He was satisfied, therefore, that no dependence could be placed on those Returns. But he rose to suggest to the Government that they had gone to the wrong office for information on the tend the new constituencies to be registered, or become voters, until 1862; and he would tell the House why. He hoped that this Bill, though a mere skeleton, would pass in the present Session: but if it did so it must be too late for the coming registration, county claims being made on the 20th of July, and borough claims on the 31st of August. As the law stood, the registration of the year 1860 would last until the 31st of December, 1861: therefore, in the event of the Bill passing, and being too late for the present year's registration, the register of the year 1860 would be the register of voters until the end of 1861; and assuming that an election occurred next year, the new constituent body would not be on the register at all. By the 20th section of the Bill the new voters were to remain, subject to the conditions at present affecting voters, and were to be entitled to be placed on the county and borough registers, on and after 1860. But the register of 1860 was in force for the whole of 1861; consequently those not registered in 1860 could not vote till 1862. This being the case, he wanted to know whether the Government contemplated a dissolution on the passing of this Bill; if so, they surely could not mean the election to take place on the old constituency. What a manifest injustice this would be, and what alarm and confusion it would excite in the country. He did not ask the Government whether they meant to dissolve on the passing of this Bill; that was a question of policy for themselves to decide; but circumstances might bring about a dissolution in the spring without the Government intending it. The Government were just then in the heyday of their popularity; but in the height of prosperity calamities might sometimes happen; and the Government might be wrecked suddenly—

“Like ships that have gone down at sea,
When heaven was all tranquillity.”

A dissolution might take place in spite of them, and he hoped that the Government would state whether they meant to introduce a subsidiary Bill, or to rely on the law as it stood, by which the new constituency could have no votes till 1862.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Government were quite ready to go into Committee on the Reform Bill whenever it should please the House to read it the second time, but he did not think their debates on the Bill would be abridged by their proceeding then to discuss its clauses with respect either to registration or any other point. He trusted therefore that the hon. and learned Member would forgive him if he did not follow him through the somewhat long argument he had addressed to the House. He could only say that the clauses relating to registration which had been introduced into the Bill were not the result of oversight, but were deliberately considered by the Government, who thought they had a clear view of the effect which those clauses would have in the event of the Bill passing in time for the registration of the present year. The Bill of last year necessarily contained a number of elaborate clauses with respect to registration, because it introduced a number of new and peculiar franchises which could not have been dealt with under the existing law. But inasmuch as the present Bill merely proposed to extend existing franchises, and not to introduce any franchise of a new description, all the Government intended to do was simply to make the existing machinery for registration applicable to the extended franchises. The provisions of the Bill were quite adequate for that purpose; but if it should turn out that, owing to the lateness of the period at which the Bill might be passed, Amendments would be required in the clauses, he and his Colleagues would be glad to consider that question in the Committee. Before he sat down, he wished to refer briefly to a statement made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), with respect to a gentleman who was employed in the first instance to collect electoral statistics. He was glad to find that it was the general opinion on both sides of the House that the Government acted with good faith and sincerity in seeking to obtain the Returns in question, with the view of guiding their own decision and ultimately the decision of the House. They were uncertain, when they began their inquiries last autumn, as to the best mode of obtaining the information. The mode which first occurred to them was that of employing certain persons, chiefly barristers, to make inquiries in a number of selected boroughs, in the hope that those boroughs might serve as specimens for the entire country. Mr. Vernon Harcourt was the first of the persons so employed. He visited two or three boroughs, but he reported to the Government that it was extremely difficult, without going through the rate-books, and submitting to an amount of drudgery which barristers would not willingly incur, to obtain accurate results, and he added that, in his opinion, a partial inquiry into a limited number of selected boroughs would not be satisfactory. Thereupon the Government abandoned the mode of inquiry which they had adopted in the first instance, and determined to send instructions through the Poor Law Board to every borough in the kingdom. Mr. Vernon Harcourt had no connection with the second inquiry, but it was conducted entirely by the officers of the Poor Law, who received a small remuneration in order to insure greater accuracy. The Return on the table was obtained by the Poor Law Board. His impression, derived from all the information he had received on the subject, and confirmed by inquiries instituted for the purpose by the Poor Law Board, was that, in respect to boroughs, the column of gross estimated rental, as distinguished from the column containing the rateable value, represented on the whole with tolerable accuracy the rent paid by the tenant to the landlord. He was quite aware that in particular cases inaccuracy existed, but for legislative purposes it might be taken as an approximation sufficiently close to guide that House to a practical conclusion. It was clear that no statement of that kind could be strictly correct, and some discrepancies between the rent really paid and the gross estimated rental as entered in the rate-book must exist, though it was not likely that in any considerable number of cases a higher rental was entered in the rate-book than that actually paid. It might be presumed that, where there was a difference, it was something less than more than the real rent. Therefore, the error must undoubtedly be on the side of deficiency. The matter was one of fact, no doubt, and it was no imputation on the accuracy of the Returns if it should prove on inquiry that the gross estimated rental did not approximate closely to the real rental, for that was a question beyond the Return. If it could be shown that the belief of the Government on that point was wrong, he should be quite ready to admit, like the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, that he was in error. The Government had no particular object in the question except to ascertain the truth. A material circumstance, however, had been pointed out by the hon. Member the original author of the Assessment Act, that in the original estimates founded on these Returns credit had been given for everything between £10 and £6. If the hon. Member's arguments were correct it was clear that a large portion of those under £10 must in fact be existing voters; therefore, whatever was added from those between £6 and £5 must to a certain, if not to an equal, extent, be compensated by the deductions made for those between £10 and £9, or between £9 and £8, but as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had remarked, there might probably be a greater tendency to undervalue in the lower than in the upper strata.

Sir George Lewis

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should like to know if any application had been made to the Income Tax Commissioners relative to these Returns. He had heard of a case where the Commissioners had put 25 per cent on the gross estimated rental, and when remonstrated with, the reply was that the property of the parish was notoriously rated low to reduce the quota to be paid towards the county and highway rates.

MR. BOVILL said, there could be no doubt the Government had done their best to obtain correct information; but he believed a mistake had been made in addressing the returns to the poor law auditors, men who practically knew nothing about the subject, instead of the magistrates at quarter sessions, or barristers who had been at quarter sessions, and who knew practically what the fact was. He was in a position to inform the House, on the authority of the town-clerk, that the gross estimated rental in Guildford was in every case below the actual value, but that the proportion in which that difference existed was anything but uniform; and the town-clerk added that he noticed, on inspecting the rate-book, that some houses were put down to the gross rental at little more than one-half of the actual rent, and he thought that from one-third to one-fourth was about the average difference between the gross estimated rental and the actual rental. Under all the circumstances it was evident that more accurate information should be obtained.

MILITIA OFFICERS (IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the hardship and inconvenience experienced by Militia officers, called out for training in Ireland in places where there is no barrack accommodation, in not receiving lodging money where the troops were billeted. Militia officers in Ireland suffered under great disadvantages, and were charged most exorbitantly by the innkeepers upon whom they were quartered. He believed that very little good was derived from the mode in which the training of those regiments was conducted. The men were billeted apart from the officers, whose control over them was thereby greatly impaired. Great sums were spent on the Militia, and the force had been entirely remodelled during the last seven years, but he ventured to say that they were in no better condition now than when they were first remodelled, because although certain regiments had been brought into discipline, as they were disembodied many men were lost and never returned. By a Return dated March 6 last, he found that the actual strength of the Militia was 23,735, while the number to which they ought to have amounted was 32,523; therefore, if required for immediate service, a deficiency of one-third would be found. When last taken the number of the disembodied force present was actually 44,340, there being absent 30,507, or very nearly the same number absent as those present. The whole system at present adopted for keeping up the Militia was wrong, and required remodelling, for it was a force that could never be depended upon. He was himself enlisting men every day who it was well known would be never seen again after they had received the bounty. Commanding officers were compelled to enlist such men because they were told they must keep regiments up to a certain strength. If they did not obey these orders letters were written demanding an explanation of the cause; but at the same time that they were enlisting the men they knew that the money paid was thrown away, it being in many cases used to enable the recipients to pay their expenses to America. What was the use of keeping a regiment 1,000 strong in a time of peace? When a Line regiment marched out it was hardly ever more than 500 strong, and why might not Militia regiments be kept at that standard until they were called out for service, when as many men as were wanted might be procured? This plan would save the bounties now paid to men who never came near when they were wanted. Then, again, calling out the Militia for twenty-one days' training was a perfect farce. It was true that at the end of twenty-one days they were able to march past and to go through a drawing room field-day with tolerable credit. But they were not converted into soldiers. There would be time, in the event of war, to make just as great an advance in drill and discipline before the services of the Militia were likely to be required. If, however, it was thought necessary to call them out, every regiment ought to have its fair turn. For the present state of our army the Secretary for War, as well as right hon. and gallant predecessor, deserved great credit. According to a Return just presented to Parliament, we had now under arms 226,804 men of all ranks, of whom there were in this country 94,454 regular troops and 19,333 Militia, who had been embodied for two years, and might be considered equal to any average regiment of the Line. Thus we had in England, including depôts of Indian regiments, no fewer than 113,787 effective soldiers fit for immediate service. That was a most creditable army to keep up for home service; but what an army would it not be if we had in the Militia a properly organized reserve which might be immediately called out if necessary! He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take an early opportunity of devising some new scheme for placing the Militia on a proper footing, and meanwhile the junior officers ought to be recompensed for the delay and inconvenience to which they were exposed when called out.

THE CRIMEAN COLONELS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, that, before putting the question of which he had given notice, he wished to remind the House that, pursuant to the recommendation of a Royal Commission appointed in the year 1854, to inquire into the existing system of promotion, a Royal Warrant was issued, whereby it was directed that lieutenant-colonels, who had served three years in that capacity in command of regiments, should be promoted to the rank of colonel. On the 28th of November, 1854, all lieutenant-colonels who had then completed three years in command, or on certain staffs, were promoted to the rank of colonel, and subsequently as each lieutenant-colonel completed three years in those capacities, he became a colonel, passing over the heads of those lieutenant-colonels who had not thus qualified. In June, July, and November, 1855, twenty-three officers serving as lieutenant-colonels in the Crimea were promoted to the rank of full colonel for distinguished conduct before the enemy, and so intersected the lieutenant-colonels promoted under the new rule. In consequence, however, of the retrospective action of the Royal warrant in question upon those officers who had obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel before June, 1854, and who had thus, by a rule passed after they had obtained the rank, been superseded by their juniors—some of them by as many as 200—another Commission was appointed in 1858 by General Peel, which recommended, for the purpose of remedying this injustice, that the whole of the lieutenant-colonels, who held that rank before June, 1854, should be ante-dated on the 28th of November, 1854, and that they should all be replaced in the relative positions they held as lieutenant-colonels, before the new rule was issued. But in doing this they unfortunately overlooked the claims of gallant officers who had done good service in the Crimea, inasmuch as there were several who, not having the rank of lieutenant-colonel at that time, had junior officers placed over their heads. He would call attention to some of the gallant officers who were thus affected by the warrant of 1858. Their names were familiar to them all. Gordon's battery and Chapman's battery before Sebastopol were well known to every Englishman. These were two of the officers who were affected by the warrant of 1858. There was also his gallant Friend the Member for Ludlow (Colonel P. Herbert); the result being that those officers gained no advantage by the rewards which Her Majesty had been pleased to bestow on them. By the warrant of 1858, 136 officers of the army and ordnance were placed over the head of Colonel Gordon, and 122 officers were placed over the head of Colonel Chapman. That in effect amounted to a deprivation of five or six years' service in their approximation to the rank of general officer; and if the old system of brevet continued those officers would have been in a higher position than they occupy at present. In conclusion, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, if it is his intention to recommend Her Majesty to reinstate the officers who were promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished service in the Crimea, in an approximate numerical position to that which they attained when they were first promoted to that rank, and of which they had been deprived by their claims being overlooked when a revision of the lists took place, on the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1858?

Colonel Lindsay

THE 67TH REGIMENT.

QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, if there is any truth in the report that the Wives and Families of the Soldiers of the 67th Regiment, who were sent out to India to join their Husbands, have been ordered, on their arrival in India, to be sent back to England. He (Colonel North) hoped that this report was not true; but if it was true, he felt assured that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Sidney Herbert) must have had some strong reasons for giving those orders.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that in answer to the question of the hon. and gallant Officer who had just spoken, he had to state it was true that when it was understood that the 67th was to be one of the regiments to go to China, orders had been given to send back the women and children as a matter of course. Afterwards it was found that the 67th was not to be one of the regiments for the Chinese expedition, but was to return to England, and then a telegram was sent out to India countermanding the previous order. He trusted that that telegram reached India in time to prevent the embarkation of the women and children, but the authorities there, knowing that the regiment in question was coming to England, would no doubt have exercised their own discretion in the matter, as they had the power to do, in not sending the women and children back.

With regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay) who had stated the case of the officers referred to very fairly, the recommendation of the Commissioners was of course a general one, based upon simple principles, and could not have been made with reference to special cases. The officers referred to by the hon. and gallant Officer were no doubt gallant and distinguished members of the service; but whatever the effect of the rule in their particular case (and upon that he need not state his own private opinion to the hon. and gallant Member, who knew all the circumstances), to place them in any numerical position equivalent to that they held before would have rendered it necessary to antedate two commissions, a step which would have occasioned considerable military inconvenience, and was contrary to the rules of the service. If any plan could be devised by which the parties could be placed in the same relative position which they would but for the rule have enjoyed, free from such inconvenience, he should be happy to consider it with a view to its adoption.

Upon the subject of the militia organization, he differed from the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) who had put a question to him. One thing had been done. Circulars were issued, and the Adjutant received regular pay in order to prevent, as far as possible, any men from entering the Militia whose residences were not known and whose characters were not approved. He did not deny the existence of the grievance to which the hon. and gallant Officer had called attention as regarded the militia officers serving in Ireland, and in some instances a good deal of hardship. The recommendation of the Militia Commission was that where the soldiers were billeted the officers should receive lodging money provided the colonel recommended it, and reported that the quarters allotted were inconvenient. The only reason why that recommendation had not been acted upon was the expense it would entail. The cost of the military establishments this year was so large that he had been compelled to make reductions in directions where, under other circumstances, he should not have done so.

INDIAN CADETS IN EGYPT.—REPLY.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he rose to reply to a question put by the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Mildmay) at an earlier period of the evening. The hon. Gentleman had asked whether there was any truth in the statements that had been published respecting transactions which were alleged to have taken place at Cairo. He had received a Report from the Consul General of Egypt announcing an outrage of the grossest possible character. The right hon. Baronet read an extract from the Report of the Consul, stating that a party of from twenty-five to thirty persons, including two ladies, visited the Great Mosque, and, not content with being permitted to enter, sought to intrude upon the space set apart for the family of the Viceroy, and when there conducted themselves with great impropriety, ridiculing and mocking the genuflections of the worshippers. Nothing could exceed the kind and proper conduct of the Viceroy. He sent remonstrances, and when those were found to be unavailing a body of cavasses surrounded the offenders, not only to remove them from the Mosque, but also to protect them from the anger of a justly irritated crowd. The Consul, on receiving intelligence of the affair, called the next day upon the officers of the Mosque and offered them an apology, which they received very kindly. By that time the passengers had gone on by railway, and he had no certain information as to who were the parties. The Consul did not report that any of them were officers in the Indian service, but it might be inferred from some expression in the Report that such was the case. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had submitted the account to him (Sir C. Wood), and he sent out directions by the last mail that the senior officers who arrived by that steamer should be called upon to report the circumstances of the affair, and the names of those persons in the Indian service if any, who were engaged in it. Those directions had been sent to Madras and Calcutta, and would be sent to Bombay by the next mail. With respect to the future, he might say that the Consul in Egypt had been instructed, in case of a similar occurrence, to act upon the powers he possessed, and to arrest upon the spot every British subject that might be guilty of such conduct.

COLONEL SYKES asked whether the right hon. Baronet had previously received any unfavourable account of the conduct of Indian officers?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had intended to add that he should be very sorry to have it supposed that such conduct was habitual among Indian officers, and in respect to this case he hoped the House would suspend its judgment on the individuals until the details were known.

THE NEUTRALIZED PROVINCES OF SAVOY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, pursuant to notice, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as stated lately in the public prints, M. Thouvenel has informed the representatives of those powers who signed the Treaties of Vienna, that, as soon as the cession of Savoy shall have been sanctioned by the "universal suffrage of the inhabitants," and ratified by the vote of the Sardinian Parliament, France will take possession of those provinces, submitting only subsequently a limited part of the question to the consideration of the proposed Conference; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State intends to consent to the taking possession by France of the neutralized provinces of Savoy, until a Conference or Congress, or other joint diplomatic action, shall have previously determined on the whole question, of the manner in which due consideration for the independence of Switzerland, requires that the provinces placed in a state of peculiar and exceptionable neutralization by repeated Treaties, shall be ultimately disposed of. The subject of the annexation had arrived at a stage when he apprehended negotiation was almost illusory, and might was about to take the place of right. As far as could be learnt from the public sources of information, the French Emperor was about to take absolute possession of the neutralized provinces of Savoy; and, that done, he would then graciously condescend to submit for discussion to the proposed Conference some secondary matter, which would not at all affect the question of the disposal of those provinces. He disclaimed any intention to impute blame in the matter to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs or to the Government; but he must say it appeared to him that the expectations in connection with it which the noble Lord had held out to the House had, up to this point, in every respect, been disappointed. Notwithstanding that all along the House had shown a disposition to place confidence in the noble Lord in dealing with the question, the hopes in which he had indulged from time to time as to a satisfactory settlement of it remained entirely unfulfilled. He by no means underrated the difficulties by which the question was surrounded, but as the efforts of the Government appeared to have very little force, he thought those efforts should be supported by an expression of opinion on the part of Members of the House generally. The despatches of the noble Lord asserted the true principle of the neutrality of Savoy, as settled by the Treaty of 1815 and the necessity of securing the independence of Switzerland as against France, by transferring to Switzerland the provinces

Mr. Darby Griffiths

comprised in that neutralization; but it appeared that while he had been negotiating and writing despatches, the Emperor of the French had been acting, and had turned a deaf ear to all the noble Lord's remonstrances. If they considered the illusory and unfair manner in which the subject of the annexation had been put to the popular vote, it was not to be wondered at that in the larger towns of the country, where French cafés and gambling-houses abounded, such as Chambéry and Annecy, the valleys of which inclined towards the French territory, the inhabitants might be favourable to a union with France. He did not, however, believe that such was the feeling of the inhabitants generally. If the two valleys of the rivers Dranse and Arve running down to the Lake of Geneva were to be taken possession of by France, the aggression could not be too much reprobated. France was entering on a course that would lead it to the Lake of Geneva, and, if it once got there, that lake would be covered by French gunboats in less than three months, and Geneva would be cut off from the rest of Switzerland. If our alliance with France was worth anything, it should be an alliance that would give us influence with France on such questions as these; but, if it meant nothing more than submission to that Power, we were better without the alliance. There had been joint expeditions with France against China and other places; but if such expeditions are made use of by France only as a school for her navy, and as a means of learning our naval tactics, the fewer we have of them the better. He had been struck with an observation made in the Prussian Chambers, by the deputy for the city of Berlin, when speaking of the position of Prussia and the other European Powers with reference to the Savoy question. After referring to Russia as engaged at home, and Austria as meditating vengeance on Italy, perhaps on Germany, he said England had almost made up her mind to sell her birthright for a mess of pottage in the shape of a treaty of commerce. He (Mr. Griffiths) was very far from objecting to the most complete realization of free trade between ourselves and France, but it should not be purchased at the price of our complete independence on matters of the general policy of Europe. If this question was to be redeemed from the sphere of excellently written despatches, and debates in that House, England must take a higher stand than she had hitherto done, otherwise she would become a mockery to every country in Europe.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it appeared to him that the question of the hon. Gentleman was far too important an one to be discussed in an incidental or desultory manner. But there was one other question which, perhaps, the noble Lord would be kind enough to give the House information upon. He should be glad to know whether the House was to understand that it was finally arranged that this question was to be referred to a Conference of the Great Powers; and, if that were so, whether it was arranged what Powers were to be parties to the Conference; and, further, whether the information received was correct, that France had made a proposition to the effect that the question to be referred to the Conference should relate only to what means should be adopted to secure the neutralization of particular provinces in Savoy for the future, and that question should be raised by the Conference that might lead to what the French Minister called the dismemberment of Savoy. He wished to know whether any other propositions were to be submitted to the Conference. He begged to remind the noble Lord that he had asked him a few evenings ago a question which he was then unable to answer. He hoped that the noble Lord would be kind enough to give him now an answer to that question also.

THE ENGLISH GRAVES AT SEBASTOPOL.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ANNESLEY said, that before the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary rose to reply, he wished to bring a matter under his notice, for which he was sure he would receive the indulgence of the House. He meant the disgraceful condition of the graves of those British soldiers who had fallen at Sebastopol. On this subject a letter from an Englishman had appeared in The Times of that day, which he would take the liberty to read to the House. The letter said:—

“ Being on a short visit to this place, and feeling very desirous to see the last resting-places of our fallen countrymen, I called on Lieutenant-Colonel Gowen (American contractor with the Russian Government for raising the sunken ships in the harbour) for some information—he being the only person who knew their relative positions—who very kindly offered to accompany me. Our first visit was to Cathcart's Hill, where we found the beautiful large black marble cover on the tomb of Sir Robert Lydstone Newman, Captain of Grenadier Guards, had been removed by some sacrilegious hands, doubtless seeking for jewellery or other articles of value. We endeavoured to replace the cover in its proper position, but were unable to move it. Colonel Gowen proposed having it replaced in a few days. We also found the hinges on the gates partly hacked off, evidently for the paltry value of the copper. I also learned from Colonel Gowen that there had been previously a number of shot and shell placed over and around several of the graves by relatives and friends who had visited the spot; these, together with the large shot surmounting the corners of the wall enclosing the cemetery, and on each side of the gate, are now all gone. We next visited the Artillery graveyard, and discovered that they had also disturbed the tablet from the tomb of Captain W. K. Allix, Aide-de-Camp to General Sir De Lacy Evans. The walls around this cemetery were sadly broken down. We then proceeded to the graveyard of the Naval Brigade, where a ghastly sight presented itself. We found the slabs that covered the grave of Commander Lacon Usser Hammett, of Her Majesty's ship Albion, had been turned over and the remains of that lamented officer entirely exhumed, the bones as well as some remaining portions of the uniform being scattered around the grave, which evidently had been opened only a few days before. It was truly a heart-sickening spectacle to behold the last mortal remains of this brave officer lie bleaching in the sun. Colonel Gowen assured me that on the following Sunday he would have the remains carefully restored to their former peaceful state. We then visited several other graveyards, and found them more or less in a very dilapidated state—the walls broken down in many places, and in some instances so much so that even the cattle have been found grazing within the enclosures. Notwithstanding, however, the mutilated and neglected state of many of the graves of those brave men who fell in the Crimea, still the sincerest thanks of every true Englishman are due to Colonel Gowen for the truly Christian and sympathizing interest he has so disinterestedly taken in having, entirely at his own expense and trouble, already repaired and restored many of the English graves and cemeteries, as well as several of the French and Sardinian, and preserved them from violation and decay. It is sincerely to be hoped that our Government will take such speedy and necessary measures for putting our graveyards in a proper state of repair as to preserve from oblivion the last resting places of so many brave men who fell during the Crimean campaign.”

His object was to elicit the opinion of the Government on this subject, and to inquire whether there were any objections to make a diplomatic representation to the Russian Government. If there were, perhaps the Government would think it right to issue instructions to the nearest consular agent, who was, he believed, our Consul at Odessa, to make periodical visits to the cemeteries at Sebastopol, in order to protect the remains of our gallant countrymen from desecration.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Horsham

(Mr. S. FitzGerald) that this question of Savoy, and the neutralized parts of Savoy, is too important a matter to be discussed in the incidental manner in which it has been brought forward this evening. I shall therefore not refer to the statements I have made at various times to the House, only saying that they were founded at the time upon the declarations which were made by foreign Governments, or upon the despatches which I have received from Her Majesty's Ministers abroad. With regard to the immediate question, and which the hon. Gentleman opposite and the House regard with considerable interest, as to what is to be done now in regard to that part of the subject which remains open for consideration, namely, the neutralized parts of Savoy, I wish to give to the House such information as I can, but it is very far from being complete. It is proposed that there should be a Conference of the Powers of Europe who signed the treaty of Vienna on a particular subject, and that subject is, as it is stated by the French Government, to reconcile the 92nd Article of the treaty of Vienna, to which all the Powers of Europe who signed that treaty are parties, with the second Article of the treaty of Turin, which has lately been concluded between the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia. I do not believe that the French Government wish either to go any further in the way of stating what other questions are to be considered or to place any further restrictions on the questions to be discussed at that Conference. I do not certainly apprehend that the French Government mean to impose such a restriction as the hon. Gentleman seems to suppose. At the same time, from communications I have received, and from the declarations which the Emperor of the French has made from time to time, I conceive that to any measures that may be properly called the dismemberment of Savoy, we should find in the Conference that the French Government would be decidedly opposed; but it is obvious that there may be other measures which would not amount to dismemberment, but which would yet give a military frontier to Switzerland, which might be proposed by Switzerland. However, when Switzerland has made such proposal will be the time for Her Majesty's Government and the other Powers to consider it. With respect to the parties to the Conference, they are, as I have stated, the eight Powers who were parties to the treaty of Vienna, and I believe

Lord John Russell

there is no doubt that all these Powers will agree that Switzerland should be likewise represented at that Conference. With regard to Sardinia, there is some discussion still going on, and likewise as to the question in what manner Switzerland and Savoy are to appear at the Conference. The Conference in London in 1831-2 is cited as affording a precedent. According to that precedent, the parties not comprehended among those who signed the treaty of Vienna may appear at the Conference, either always, or only on certain occasions. That is a matter which, as I have stated, is under discussion. The time of the meeting of the Conference has been likewise a matter of discussion, but the French Government state on that subject that they consider a Conference cannot be properly assembled until the treaty of Turin is complete. That treaty of Turin is not complete until the Assembly of Turin shall have given their assent to the treaty. The King of Sardinia has no doubt given his assent to the treaty, but it is a part of the constitution of Sardinia that no cession of territory shall be valid until the treaty giving it is confirmed by the Votes of the Parliament of Sardinia. The French Government say that, supposing the Vote of the Parliament of Piedmont should not be in favour of the cession, and should be against the ratification of the treaty, there would then be nothing for the Powers of Europe to deliberate upon, and therefore they cannot be called together until that vote has been come to. It is understood that the Parliament of Piedmont is to consider the question about the first week in May, or the first ten days in May, and it is proposed that the Conference should meet after that time. Then there comes the question to which the hon. Member for Horsham called my attention the other evening, and to which we attach, as he does, considerable importance—namely, what shall be the state of possession of the neutralized portions of Savoy after the treaty has been confirmed, supposing it to be confirmed at Turin, and before the Conference has met? We have stated more than once at Paris, and Earl Cowley has stated it even since his return to Paris, that, in our opinion, it is most desirable that no civil or military occupation by France should take place until the Conference has considered this question of the neutralized parts of Savoy, and under what restrictions those neutralized portions shall be hereafter held, and in what manner they shall be disposed of. The French Government, however, I must say, on the other side, state that they see great difficulty in assenting to such a proposition, because it would seem to assume that the Treaty of Turin did not perfectly do what it purported to do—namely, transfer the whole sovereignty of Savoy from the King of Sardinia, its late or present Sovereign, to the Emperor of the French. They therefore raise this difficulty, without laying any stress, however, upon the practical objections to any other course. With regard to any practical result, they say that Her Majesty's Government may be assured that there will be no precipitation in taking possession of that territory, but that there must be some authority, and that the territory cannot be left without some authority during the Conference. That discussion between the two Governments is not yet concluded. It still appears to me, I must confess, that it would be more satisfactory that some arrangement should be come to by which the whole of that territory should not be in the possession of the French authorities during the time of the Conference, because, as from the complication of documents there arises every day questions of wounded pride or injured honour, it is desirable that the French authorities should not be required to withdraw from any portion of the territory of which they are in actual possession. This is a matter like other matters which depends very much on the opinion of the different Powers in Europe. I believe that the Government of Prussia takes the same view as we do on this subject. With regard to the other Powers, we have had communications on this particular point, and I can only say that it is not at present decided. I will not go further into this subject at present. I have only wished to give such information as I am able, and I do not think the question is one for discussion at the present moment.

With regard to the cemeteries of Sebastopol, I am sorry to say that I am afraid the statement of the hon. Gentleman is in conformity with the truth, since it agrees in every respect with the statements we have received. We have given such directions as we think may prevent any further continuance of such shocking outrages upon the feelings of this country and the relatives of the great and gallant men who are buried there; and I have desired Her Majesty's Minister at St. Petersburg to remonstrate in very strong terms with the Russian Government on the subject.

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

DEPORTATION OF IRISH PAUPERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose to call the attention of the President of the Poor Law Board to the circumstances attending the deportation of an aged Female Pauper from Liverpool to Dublin on the night of the third April, 1860. The poor woman to whom he referred had been 52 years in England, and had for 29 years been the wife of an Englishman, yet the moment circumstances obliged her to seek workhouse relief she was shipped by the union authorities at Liverpool for Dublin on a very inclement night. He did not blame any one, for the Liverpool authorities had only acted in conformity with the law, but the cause of humanity required that the right hon. Gentleman should turn his attention to the present very unsatisfactory state of the law of settlement. He was aware that the rules of the House would prevent the right hon. Gentleman from replying to him on the present occasion, but he sincerely hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not lose sight of so momentous a question.

MR. VANCE said, that as one of the representatives of the city of Dublin, he could bear testimony to the accuracy of the facts stated by the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. The case was not an exceptional one; for poor people who had spent their lives in honest industry in England were landed in shoals at the port of Dublin, and the burden of giving them relief fell upon the union in which the quay on which they were landed was situated. It was, he thought, not a matter with which a private Member ought to deal, and he trusted the Government would before long turn their attention to an improvement of the law on the subject.

MR. CARDWELL said, there could be no doubt of the hardship of the case, both as to the poor persons who were subject to removal, and also to the unions, on whom the burden of receiving them was chiefly placed. As to the particular case referred to, however, the hon. Member for Liverpool had requested him to say that he had received a statement to the effect that between the 1st and 8th of April no person was sent from that port answering to the description of an aged woman. He had himself been constantly in communication on this subject with the Poor Law authorities and others, and no one, he was certain, was more sensible of the hardship of the existing law than those who directed the machinery of the Poor Law in Ireland. His right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board had already communicated to the House his intention of moving for the renewal of the Committee to consider two important questions connected with this subject—first, the propriety of reducing from five to three years the period of residence necessary to acquire the privilege of irremovability; and second, the propriety of extending the area of residence for the same purpose from the parish to the union. His right hon. Friend would soon move for that Committee, and hoped on the termination of the inquiry, which would be of short duration, to be prepared with a measure on the subject. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite, that the removal of a grievance of this kind was the proper function of the Government. Former Governments had not been unmindful of that duty, but had been unsuccessful in their efforts to remedy the evil. He hoped, however, that his right hon. Friend would be more fortunate.

K

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

THIRD READING.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th April], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WHITESIDE: The hon. Baronet is entitled to a fair consideration of his measure this evening, and I do not wish that we should take leave of it for the Session without a parting word. I say for the Session, because, although the hon. Baronet has pursued this Question with industry and zeal, it has been with varied success. As far as I can understand the speeches of the hon. Baronet on this subject, which I have had the good fortune to hear him deliver in this House for some years past, he entertains the belief that there is some great practical grievance connected with church rates pressing on a large class of Her Majesty's subjects of which it is his duty to obtain the redress. While we have a Reform Bill, a Budget, a

Mr. Cardwell

Commercial Treaty before us, the hon. Baronet concentrates his energies upon a measure that is to strip his countrymen, in a Christian nation, of the power of imposing on themselves, if they should think fit, an assessment for the support of the fabric of the Church, devoted to the religion of the State. I have sometimes been disposed to ask the hon. Baronet at what period of our history did this injustice first arise? By what Sovereign, in a reign of ignorance and darkness, was the law enacted? By what Parliament was it passed? I find that the establishment of this right was not the act of King, Parliament, or even Bishop, but that it owes its existence to and springs from the common law of England. And what is the common law of England—for no country but England possesses such a blessing? If you asked any other European nation what was the law, they show you their code in a little red book that might be bought for half-a-crown, but might be dear at 6*d.*, as the laws it contained rest on the will of a despot who may abolish them by a word. But the common law of England has existed from time immemorial. It is the result of the wishes, the interests, the hopes, desires, and deepest convictions of the people. Such I understand and believe to be the origin of this rate. What is it? Not, as it has been described by the hon. Baronet, a tax that exists, and which he seeks to take away; but a power that certain persons, being the majority of a parish, possess, in conformity with the principle on which the whole constitution rests, to affirm a church rate that can be assessed on those who are summoned to attend and do not choose to do so. A petition in favour of the abolition of the rate has been presented by an active body, called a Society for Liberating the Church from State Control. This Society has been well advised outside the walls of this House. It has presented an elaborate statement by way of petition in which the church rate is represented as an ecclesiastical extortion, which could never be recovered before the common law courts, or by any common law process known in this country. That is very ingeniously put forward, and for a certain purpose. The society thinks it can appeal to those who are called—sometimes very erroneously—the friends of religious liberty. Here is a tax, imposed only by ecclesiastical power, that to certain classes is a grievance, and ought to be removed. Those views are put forward also in The Liberator, a paper devoted to the Liberal purpose of abolishing the Church of England. The other House of Parliament has instituted a very interesting inquiry into the subject of church rates, and one of the questions investigated by that Committee is the very one on which, in a great measure, the advocate of this Bill rests his case. Two witnesses were called before that Committee, to whose evidence I would ask the hon. Baronet's attention, because I believe him to be a candid man, and, though he has brought forward this Bill repeatedly, he says he is a Friend of the Church. I can hardly believe, after he has examined the question with the care and caution that become every man who seeks to overturn a law and custom that have existed for ages, he will not be convinced, withdraw his Bill, and leave the Church of England where he found it. The two witnesses examined were Mr. Toulmin Smith and Dr. Lushington. The last is one of the most eminent persons in the country, and was long an ornament to the Liberal party in this House. When I read the evidence of Mr. Toulmin Smith I concluded he had been put forward as a strong orthodox Episcopalian witness; but to my great surprise, I found that this learned and candid person is a Dissenter. I beg to acknowledge my obligation to him; I have been instructed by his learning, and he has convinced me that moderation, justice, and fairness may exist in the Dissenting body. I believe he is a religious, not a political Dissenter. But though a Dissenter, he has devoted his time and attention to ascertaining in what source this power of imposing a church rate took its rise. He differs in some respects from Dr. Lushington, but, substantially, scarcely at all. The main difference is that Dr. Lushington traces the rate up to Saxon times; Mr. Toulmin Smith thinks it less by ten years than 500 years old. He states that in 1350, 1376, and 1379, it was shown by the statutes and rolls of Parliament that complaints were made of endowments devoted to the church fabrics being diverted from their purpose, and as a consequence the churches were in ruin. In the old year books he found that in 1370 "a suit was brought against one A. touching goods taken by way of distress for a rate." A. avowed the taking, for there had been a meeting of the parishioners of the church of E. to repair defects in their church, and because there was a defect in the roof they made a tax upon themselves of the sum of £10 to repair the defects. What did this prove to any candid man? That nearly 500 years ago, it was an ancient custom for the parishioners to be summoned together, and for those parishioners, when assembled, to impose a rate, which rate was levied from even a reluctant parishioner, who was bound to pay it. Mr. Toulmin Smith observes that this case was a very important one with reference to one objection—namely, that based on the supposition that church rates could be levied only through the Ecclesiastical Courts. This opinion he pronounces to be "a complete mistake." It is, perhaps, true that in modern times there have been some encroachments, and that the Ecclesiastical Courts have got possession of the means of enforcing the rate; but that does not disestablish that for which I contend—namely, that church rates took their root in the common law of England, and were capable of being enforced by the principles of common law. The learned Gentleman proceeds to say that the parish had a right to bind the parishioners for other purposes connected with the parish just as effectually as if a rate were made for the purpose. The answers of Dr. Lushington are full of kindness, courtesy, and good feeling towards the Church of England. He will not resign his privileges as a member of that Church; he does not wish to be exempted from the payment of the rate; he has satisfied himself of its legality and justice; he has proved its antiquity, as springing from the old common law of the country; and I cannot conceive a piece of testimony more interesting, or that commends itself more to the impartial consideration of the Legislature. Some person has said that, except by vote, the parishioners could not apply the church rate to any other purpose than the repair and maintenance of the church fabric and the preservation of the churchyard. But that question has been investigated by Mr. Toulmin Smith, who says that, if the parishioners have notice of the purpose to which the rate is to be applied, and, knowing it, approve its application in that manner, the proceeding is as good and valid as if a rate were specifically raised for repairing the roof of a church. Dr. Lushington, in his evidence, says he has no doubt whatever this privilege arose in Saxon times. I stop at that word "Saxon," because I think it has a great bearing on the argument. Those who laid the foundation of our liberties, of the constitution under which we live, and of our common law, had no notion of the existence of a State without having in every district a church that might be suitable, in which the nation acknowledged the God that conferred such blessings on it. They had no idea how a nation was to be governed and to prosper if the men who enjoyed the fruits of the earth were not to have a building in which to give their Creator thanks for the blessings he showered on them. But, if they were to have a national worship, it was also necessary that they should have a fabric in which to render it, and therefore it followed that they got power to make assessments which were to be applied to the sustentation of that fabric. Dr. Lushington says the Saxons decided in ancient times by the vote of the majority, and all that the minorities could do was to submit and to turn themselves as speedily as they could into majorities, which is sometimes a difficult matter. I do not see any difference between a member of the minority in old times refusing to pay the rate, and a Quaker who refuses to pay taxes in time of war. In fact, it would be much more reasonable for a man conscientiously opposed to war to refuse to contribute than it would have been for any well-regulated mind to refuse to pay his penny in the pound in support of the old parish church. Dr. Lushington explains the case referred to so much of late, and shows the error of the decision had its origin in the neglect of the law of the majority, for the churchwardens having only the minority to support them failed in their attempt. Consequently the decision of the House of Lords affirming that the majority only can bind the minority has only brought the matter back to the rule laid down by the old common law. The hon. Baronet says the church rates have ceased to be collected in many parishes; that is a matter to be regretted; but he follows that up in the preamble by saying that they should not be collected in any place. I confess I do not perceive the sequence of the conclusion to the premises in that argument. Because it is not paid in some parishes it does not follow that it should be refused in all. It may be said that the progress of enlightenment, of reason, and of liberality has a tendency to change all those old ideas. Listen to the opinion of one who has written many things with which I do not agree—and I only quote a writer where his sentiments agree with my own—but whose name will possibly carry weight with some. Mr. Cobbett, writing of the prosperity of England, and of one of its most flourishing counties, says,—

Mr. Whiteside

“Suffolk is the crack county of England; it is I think the best, the most carefully, and the most skilfully cultivated piece of land of the same size in the whole world. Labourers are most active in the culture of the land; the farmers’ wives and women employed in agriculture are as frugal, adroit, and cleanly as any in the world. They are a most frank, industrious, and virtuous people”—[we really ought all to settle in Suffolk]—“and their houses are models of cleanliness, neatness, and good order.”

Then Mr. Cobbett puts the practical question—what is the reason of all this? The reason is this:—

“There is a parish church in every three square miles or less, and the district is divided into such numerous parishes that the persons residing in it may be said to be constantly under the eye of the resident parochial minister.”

I want to know whether, in proceeding against church rates the right hon. Baronet intends to subvert the parochial system. We must understand the steps of this social revolution, which comes in a new light before us since the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Lords. Does he intend that, the parochial system being upset, we shall have the country divided into districts in which roving clergymen shall get together congregations wherever they may find persons willing to attend to them? I confess that I have been puzzled to understand the meaning of this Bill. When were church rates first complained of? By the old Dissenters, who differed, I deeply lament, from the Church on religious grounds? Never! I could quote authority after authority among eminent Dissenters, all showing that the Dissenters as a body were in favour of maintaining the Church, from which, on certain grounds of conscience, they did dissent; but they were too candid, too learned, and too just, to invent a pretended scruple of conscience in order to carry out a deep political design. Their Lordships seem not to have understood the character of some of the men whom they were dealing with, and to whom they gave credit for liberal and enlightened views. These witnesses said, “We desire to think as we like.” Good; but they added to that, “We desire to make every other man think as we like also.” They were asked, “Supposing we abolish church rates altogether from Dissenting congregations, will you be satisfied?” “Certainly not,” was the reply,

"because, though you prevent Churchmen from imposing payment on Dissenters, you would still give to Churchmen the power of making rates on Churchmen, which we cannot submit to." But when did these objections commence? Certainly not with John Wesley. I am not going to trouble the House with statistics. I think for the last twenty years we have suffered under a load of statistics. The Wesleyans constitute half the orthodox Dissenters in England, but no man will now be justified in saying that the Wesleyans as a body have taken up this movement against the Church. Such an allegation has been put an end to by the testimony of Mr. Bunting—a name that ought never to be mentioned without respect—and the Rev. Mr. Osborne. Mr. Bunting was examined before the Committee of the House of Lords, and the evidence which he gave is of the most valuable character. He confirmed entirely the evidence of Mr. Osborne, an eminent member of the Wesleyans, as to the favourable light in which that body regards church rates and the Established Church, and the very small number of persons belonging to the body who had ever objected to the rate or refused to pay it. As to anything like concentrated action against the rate, he states in his evidence that if it were attempted seriously it would meet with resolute opposition, and probably imperil the unity of the body. During the agitation which took place in 1857 against the rate, Mr. Bunting states that a minister of the connection, of considerable influence in the body, wrote a letter against church rates and circulated it, but his conduct was noticed at the ensuing Conference, and a vote of censure passed on all such proceedings. In Mr. Bunting's opinion, judging from the tone of the discussions in Parliament and of the public press, there is considerable misapprehension existing as to the number of Nonconformists who entertain any conscientious objections to pay the rates. The opposition, he told the Committee, proceeds principally from three bodies—the Baptists, the Independents, and the various sects of Methodists who have seceded from the original body; but they are a minority of the whole Nonconformist body, and even among them the number of opponents to the rate is comparatively small. This shows that Parliament has mistaken noise and bluster for something substantial and real. It turns out, according to the testimony of these good and excellent men, that a large majority do not object to church rates. The reason why the Wesleyans look with favour on the rate, according to Mr. Bunting, is, that they would be sorry to see any injury done to a great religious agency. To use his own words—

"There is a general feeling that the Church of England is a power of essential importance to the religion of the country, and increasingly so, and we should be sorry to destroy anything in which there was a blessing."

The whole tenour of this gentleman's evidence proves that the influential community to which he belongs would be unwilling to strike a blow at the Church of England. He acknowledges most frankly that the Church of England is the only Church which makes any permanent religious provision for the poor. The tests of Christianity were, I may remind the House, that the blind saw, the deaf heard, the leper was cleansed, and even the dead raised; but the climax of the whole was, "that the poor had the Gospel preached to them." Again, when questioned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, whether the Dissenting body generally sufficiently provided for the maintenance of religion in the rural districts, and the less populous parts of the country, Mr. Bunting replied—

"Certainly not. I think all experience is against that. I am glad to say that the Wesleyan Methodists do all in their power; but it is impossible for us to provide for populations as the Church of England can do. I should extend that observation also to large towns. I think that portions of large towns will never be provided for except by the parochial system. Dissenters never have done this; and I think there are insuperable difficulties in the way of their doing it."

Then he was asked when the last church rate contest took place in Manchester. He replied:—

"About two years ago. It was a serious contest, and the powers of both sides were put to the test. The Methodists, generally, supported the rate; and the result was a majority for the church rate. I am inclined," he added, "to think that church rates have failed from neglect rather than anything else. If Manchester were now polled," [and this raises Manchester vastly in my estimation] "I think, the Church having exerted itself there so much of late, that the result would be in favour of church rates."

And why was this? Because an active minister of religion, sincere, zealous, not indulging in vagaries, but adhering to the doctrines and practices of the Reformed Church, is always respected. And it is on such grounds that this gentleman is of opinion that if a church rate were now proposed in Manchester it would be carried. Having, then, proved the antiquity of church rates, and the feeling of the Protestant Nonconformists, such as John Wesley, one of the best men that ever lived, I proceed to inquire, where did the opposition to church rates begin? The opposition originally began at Birmingham, in a political union, very much about the same time as the Reform agitation was urged by these unions. That political confederacy was very formidable. About the same time that church rates were to be abolished the constitution of the country was also to be abolished. It happened to me to be engaged in a trial for high treason, and one of the most distinguished soldiers that England ever produced—the late Sir W. Napier—appeared as a witness. He had declared that if any man were prosecuted for high treason he would state that it was proposed to him at the time these political unions existed that he should march on London with 100,000 men to intimidate and overawe the House of Lords. The Judges thought the evidence not relevant, and Sir William Napier was not heard; but that did not alter the fact he was prepared to prove. My argument is, that the movement against church rates was not on religious, but on political grounds. The first movement was not against the existence of the rate, but against the amount of the rate. Other unions were formed, opposition was fomented, and so it went on until the agitation was changed into an Anti-Church and State Society, for the avowed purpose of destroying the Church and breaking down the connection between Church and State. The name was an awkward name, and it was therefore altered to a Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Control, under which it now flourishes. It has its newspapers, its pamphlets, its collectors, its Parliamentary committee, active agents outside and innocent instruments within the walls of this House. Complaints have been made against the manufacture of petitions, and when a debate was about to take place, the society issued a document of this kind:—

[Second Night.]

“ ‘Up, friends, and at ’em!’ is the word. The moment for action has arrived. Pass the summons round through every district to the remotest corner of the kingdom! Be quick—let no grass grow under your heels! Lose not a day—if possible to avoid it, do not postpone your preparations for an hour. In towns assemble forthwith for concerted movement. In villages draw up your petitions without a moment’s delay. From every separate congregation let two petitions be sent up within the next fortnight—one to the Commons and one to the Lords. Both will be required. Two petitions—short, sharp, and decisive—praying for instant, uncompensated abolition. Get every signature to them that can be got by industry and zeal—real, bonâ fide, legitimate signatures. Don’t be content with merely letting the petitions lie in the vestry on Sunday—sweep the congregations for signatures—male and female.”

Mr. Whiteside

The petitions are of one stereotyped form, prepared by the same hand, and in favour of unconditional repeal. From some places too, there are more petitions than there appear to be inhabitants. I hold in my hand a set of instructions in the form of a circular marked immediate and important, in which it is directed that petitions should be sent to Conservative Members of Parliament, with a view to influence their personal feelings. It is a mistake to suppose that these people petition of their own accord, or that the petitions express their feelings in the exercise of a great and noble privilege. It is another man who thinks for them, and concocts the petition for them. Among the instructions one is that the person who gets up the petition may ask adults of both sexes, and others besides ratepayers, for their signatures. Two letters from clergymen have been handed to me by my noble Friend behind me, who is unable to speak in this debate, which show how these petitions are manufactured. In one case the names of all the members of a congregation were entered without their being asked by the person who had the care of the petition. In another the congregation were requested to remain after a prayer meeting to sign the petition. The names of men, women, and infants were entered indiscriminately. One woman had a child at her breast. She was asked his name. She said, “John.” “Then,” said the agent, “let John’s name be put down.” An old man offered to sign, but was told his signature was already affixed. In another instance the petition was signed in a great proportion by children of both sexes under ten years of age. One of these gentlemen who wrote to my noble Friend found a man very busy under a railway arch getting signatures to a paper, and he found it was likewise a petition against church rates. There is now a petition before the House from the parish of St. Simon and St. Jude, Manchester, complaining of the abuse of the right of petition. The petitioners state that they have seen a petition signed by boys of tender age in the public streets, and they feel it their duty to bring it under the notice of the House. The Committee who investigate petitions have also drawn attention to the fact of the great number of those petitions which are manifestly the concoction of the same hand. In this way it is possible to get up almost any number of petitions. Since the Church has been provoked by this agitation a committee of laymen has been formed, and now we have petitions in favour of power being reserved to impose church rates equal in number to those against the existence of that power. The number of signatures to the latter is greater, but it arises from rectors and churchwardens supposing they could sign for those who authorized them, and in another year that error will be corrected and we shall see a different result. The committee of laymen have handed me the following statement, with permission to lay it before the House, as the question of church rates is not a clergyman's question. It is a question for all members of the Church; and I hope the laymen of that Church will be as enthusiastic in preserving the institutions of the country as some are in their desire to destroy them.

"The committee of laymen, immediately on its formation, in the spring of 1850, applied themselves to an analysis of the existing Parliamentary Returns, with a view of ascertaining in how many of the parishes of England the rates had been actually refused. Up to this time an opinion had prevailed that a very large proportion of the parishes were in this condition. The Returns analysed were those of Lord Robert Cecil and Sir William Clay, made to the House in 1856. Parishes not included in the former being searched for in the latter. By this means as many as 9,672 parishes were reached with the following results: Parishes in which the rate has been granted, 8,280; parishes in which there is no provision by church estates and otherwise, 544; parishes which have given dubious replies, 440; parishes which have refused church rates, 408."

With that state of facts it baffles my comprehension how any Gentleman can argue that the people of this country are in favour of the abolition of church rates. I can understand how in some large towns, where there are active agitators and complete organization for political purposes, the rate may be refused; but here is decisive proof that the majority of the thousands of parishes in the country are in favour of church rates. The tactics of the opponents of church rates, as Mr. Osborne stated before the Committee, are to reduce the rate when they cannot overthrow it. They say that in places where there may be only a few dissentients they make it their business to worry the clergyman of the parish, to disturb the vestry, and to perplex the parishioners, and they give as their reason that it often happens that a small and active minority, by steady and persevering efforts, overrides the opinion of a majority, which is perfectly true of more places than a parish. In 1859 a Return was obtained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University, who was then at the Home Office and endeavouring to settle the question, he having the true interests of religion at heart. Replies were received from 10,749 parishes, showing that in the disturbed state of the law some increase had been made in the parishes dependent on voluntary rates. These amounted to 835, no doubt including parishes formerly returned dubious. The parishes returned as supported by endowments alone amounted to the number of 451; and parishes in which were endowments, voluntary rates, and subscriptions, were returned at 320, amounting in all to 771. From 504 particulars were not clearly stated, but it was reported that church rates in 1859 existed in 80 per cent of the entire parishes. It does not follow that there was a material increase of rates refused, though churchwardens had accepted voluntary rates pending a more distinct confirmation of the law. It may be remarked, too, that voluntary contributions for church restoration, repair, and otherwise, may safely co-exist with rates. The parishes of England and Wales are estimated at 12,000. In 1856 rates had only been refused in 408 parishes, which is less than 5 per cent. Mr. Walpole's Return of 1859 shows that there were 835 parishes dependent on voluntary rates and subscriptions alone. This would include parishes where the rates had been refused; but, still, making allowances for that increased number, the fact remains that upwards of 9,000 parishes approve the rate, and that only a small minority disapprove it. Upon what principle, therefore, is it that hon. Gentlemen contend that they have a right to ask this House to abolish the rate? They represent, I admit, very active and intelligent communities; but what is the actual strength of those communities? It is of the greatest possible use to ascertain this, because the grossest delusion ever entertained is that of supposing that a majority of the people belong to those particular bodies of Non-conformists who are against the rate. I have already disposed of the Wesleyan Methodists, and there is a Return which shows that all the denominations of Dissenters who are the objecting parties to the rate, do not, taken together, represent more than 15 per cent of the sittings provided for Christian worshippers in this country. According to the analysis of the Census Return of 1851 by Mr. Mann, the total provision for the population by sittings amounted to 57 per cent. The provision by the Church of England is given as 29.7 per cent, the Wesleyans as 12.2 per cent. This portion of provision may be considered as favourable to the rate, and the principle of the Church of England. The Baptists furnish sittings in the proportion of 4.2 per cent; the Independents, 6 per cent; Scottish Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, and all other sects, including Calvinistic Methodists, 4.9 (say 10) per cent—equal to 15 per cent. This sum of 15 per cent may be taken as a near approximation to the total of the entire bodies—men, women, and children; and of the heads of families, ascertained in the usual manner by dividing by 5, the total would be 3 per cent. This is the entire religious section taken up by the Liberation Society, and on whose behalf Great Britain had been agitated with a call for church rate abolition. But is it true that what is wanted is merely to get rid of the church rate? That, in truth, is but a small part of the question before us. Some years ago, when the noble Lord the Member for the City of London was more mindful of the course that, as a Minister, he ought to pursue, and of the principles that formerly were supposed to actuate his conduct, he was asked to vote for a Bill for the abolition of church rates, and he refused to do so, saying he could not understand a general surrendering the outworks if they were to be surrendered only to be made the prelude to an attack on the citadel. The real objects of our opponents have been more fully developed since the noble Lord used that expression. It is a fact that the members of the Church Liberation Society are the concoctors of the petitions in favour of the present Bill, the active agents by whom the anti-Church agitation is conducted, and what is it they aim at? They say, "Let no one mistake the church rate question for the Church question. The Church question is not yet mooted; but we give notice to Churchmen that as far as we are concerned we shall not the less earnestly seek for the separation of the Church from the State because we have got rid of church rates. We want the Church of England to be reduced to what she is, one of the sects, because we believe it will diffuse a greater amount of truth and righteousness." I do not want you to believe the latter part of that passage. The first part I do believe. They go on to say, "Radical politicians dislike spending their strength on ecclesiastical questions. They will have to conquer that dislike, for ecclesiastical questions will furnish the chief subjects for popular conflict for years to come. But for the strange and anomalous position occupied by the State Church, its hatred of all change, its tenacious adherence to all abuses, its monopoly of honours, its indifference to justice, its encroachments and exactions, we question whether the middle classes could be got to take an interest in politics. Upon no other subject can excitement be so easily awakened!" They conclude by stating that the Liberation Society pledges itself always to labour for the separation of the Church from the State. I have other evidence to the same effect. Dr. Foster, the Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Liberation Society, was called as a witness before the Select Committee of the other House on this subject. Upon being asked what the objects of that Society were, he replied that they wished to separate the Church from the State, to take away all the funds and property with which the State had endowed any religious denomination whatever, and to free all denominations of persons who might happen to be under special legislation on religious grounds from such special legislation. He explained that they wished to take away, for instance, that property which belonged to the Church at the time when this country was Roman Catholic, and which by virtue of the Reformation was vested in the Church since it became Protestant. That is a fair slice. He also stated that he included tithes. Well, if you abolish church rates, seize the tithes, and confiscate the landed property, what remains? The edifices; and accordingly Dr. Foster was asked what he and his friends intended to do with the edifices, whereupon he replied that the edifices of the Church are likewise to be considered national property, and may be diverted from their present uses to some business of public utility. That is the nature of the evidence, which shows the design of the Liberation Society, and I dare say the members of that body represent the political opinions of that great Puritanical party which formerly overthrew, not merely the Church, but the Crown, and which so abused the power they acquired that they were more cordially hated and detested than any other class of men who ever governed in England. But it has been said that the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock is no party to the machinations of this revolutionary confederacy. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne), in a recent speech, sought to rescue the hon. Baronet from the imputation of having any connection with the Liberation Society. He stated that he had himself voted for the abolition of church rates, not, however, from any hostility to the Church, because he was himself a Churchman. He stated that the last division exhibited the largest minority that had ever voted against the question for some time. I hope that that will not continue to be the case, but that there will be a still larger one. He tells us that the hon. Baronet had lost ground; but the reason was evident, because, before the Committee of the Lords last year, some evidence was given by highly respectable and conscientious men connected with the Church Liberation Society, of their intentions, and they went further than the abolition of church rates, stating that they wanted to do away with all tithes, and desired the separation of Church and State. He then declared that the hon. Baronet, the Member for Tavistock, was altogether disconnected with that party; but since that speech was spoken, the recognized organ of that party has published the speech with a commentary, remarking that the hon. Member for Tavistock has been aware of the objects of the Liberation Society for years, and long before he consented, at the instance of the Society, to take up the church-rate abolition question in Parliament, and that party abide by their opinions. The hon. Baronet, therefore, is in this position—that he has, innocently, no doubt, brought forward a measure to strike down church rates, it being avowed by the political body, whose agent he innocently is, that their object is to proceed steadily and energetically until they can lay their hands on all tithes, appropriate the land belonging to the Church, and finally the edifices of the Church. As the matter now stands, the House has now to determine a very different question from that which was originally brought forward. It was then represented as a teasing question of a penny in the pound levied in parishes where the majority was in opposition to the church rate; and that it would be a service to the best interests of the Church to get rid of that grievance. But when the matter is probed a little more deeply, and when the instigators of the movement are brought up as witnesses, then the whole truth is disclosed; and now you understand what their object is. They say they throw down the gauntlet. Then we had better take it up, and fight the battle out bravely. However the Ministers may shuffle off their responsibility, I believe that the great body of the Protestant people of the country are attached to the Church. In answer to the idle and hypocritical pretence that the abolition of the church rate would be of service to the Church, I will refer to certain parishes mentioned in the blue-book. I will take two large Metropolitan parishes densely inhabited by the poor, while the rich men, who draw their wealth from them, go elsewhere to inhabit better houses and to breathe purer air, leaving the parochial minister to struggle with the difficulties of his position as he best may. I will take first the parish of Whitechapel, containing a population of 30,000, chiefly of the poorer classes. What does the minister of that parish say? He gets the church rate. This is exactly one of the cases which the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury was intended to meet. The church rate there is collected along with the poor rate, by Act of Parliament; and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury was intended to take it away, though it is at present collected without difficulty and without objection. That church rate amounts only to £850 a year, and it is applied to the best purposes to which it was possible to conceive that a tax could be applied. If it were not collected the expenses of the churches must be defrayed by local contributions. But as the church rate covers that expense, the local contributions are applied to the keeping open of six or seven other churches, for which, by the zeal and vigilance of the minister, contributions are received from those manufacturers who have left the district; and they are thus maintained for the poor residents, for whom the church exists as their consolation, their blessing, their birthright; though now it is proposed to deprive them of its advantages; advantages which the church dispenses not in religion only, but in education, and all the blessings of good order in society. Take next the parish of Rotherhithe. The churchwarden of that parish is a nonconformist Wesleyan Methodist. He stated before the Committee that his parish contained a population of 20,000 chiefly poor, and that the rate was levied with very slight objections. How was it applied? he was asked. "For the benefit of the Church." "But you are a Dissenter?" "Yes, but I am in favour of the Church and of the rate." "Can you collect it?" "Yes, with very slight difficulty; for the religious Dissenters, when they are fairly dealt with, and the case is fairly stated to them, withdraw their opposition and consent to the rate." And never was money more wisely laid out, or applied more to the benefit of the people. Though there are a number of persons in the parish who are not members of the Church, yet the rate has been levied without disapprobation up to the present hour, and it is applied to the purposes of education and religion. But, it is said, if the rate were abandoned, can you not fall back on local contributions? All the witnesses answer no. They say it is a very different thing with some persons to pay a legal demand, and to comply with a call for a voluntary contribution, and they all state that if you take the money away you take from the usefulness of the Church. There are many parishes in which the poor exclusively live; there the money is paid, not by them, but for them, and if you deprive them of it you deprive them of that which administers to their comfort and consolation, and you would do for the Church what its bitterest enemies desire. It is said that the opponents of the present Bill ought to propose some plan. I have no plan to propose, and I think with Dr. Lushington that the existing law is both an old and a good law. When the advocates of abolition say that they will not be satisfied, although Dissenters should not be called on to contribute, and that they will refuse to allow Churchmen to have a law whereby Churchmen may be enabled to assess each other, then I must, however reluctantly, say that there is no middle course, and that I am compelled to vote for the Bill or against it. But a greater question remains. I have read the papers of this society very attentively, and I am bound to say that I do not believe in their opinions, or that the history and experience of the world bears out their assertion that the State ought to have no connection with the Church. What State ever existed in power, greatness, and glory, that did not as a nation acknowledge an overruling Providence? Look to the people of antiquity. Not a ceremony, procession, or triumph, took place in ancient Rome that was not consecrated by religion; and we now look with delight at the remains of the temples which they built to their gods; nay, more—so far is history from proving that separation of religion from the State to be the advancement of liberty and of morals that we find a great but indignant patriot, when he would recal the glories of ancient Rome, saying, "While your forefathers were wise, free, and virtuous, they lived in modest habitations, and spent their wealth in decorating the temples of the gods. You now, being corrupt and contemptible, live in luxury and riot, and you refuse to sustain the edifices of religion." The same rule holds good in modern history. France, in the hour of her revolution, ceased to recognize a national religion, and set up a goddess of Reason. What became of her? I will answer the question in the clear and forcible words of one of our ablest divines:—"When the rulers of a nation desert the national recognition of Christianity, the God of the Christians will desert them." That conveys his reason for maintaining the national Church, and it is a sound and a sufficient reason. The forms of our indictments and the proceedings of our public bodies prove that the principle of Christianity pervades our laws and our institutions; the Established Church is intertwined and inseparably connected with our political system, and to separate them is not to reform or amend, but to revolutionize the State while you destroy the Church. When revolutions have occurred in other countries we have been quiet, because the people of this country are a believing, and in the main a religious people, because they are taught daily and weekly all the duties of life by ministers of religion who are supported by the State, not merely because they teach the moral duties and preach the Scriptures, but because they promote order, peace, and security throughout the country. I oppose this Bill, not only on the ground that it is a bad Bill, but because there is at stake a much greater question, as avowed by the witnesses examined elsewhere—namely, whether or not the Established Church shall continue to exist in this country. The Nonconformists have asserted that the Church is careless upon this question. The Church has now copied from them, and will now call on the people to express their opinions. When mischievous men combine good men may unite, and I have little doubt that in the struggle which awaits us the Church of England will come out of it stronger than she has ever been before, stronger in the opinion of the people, stronger in the affections of the nation, and stronger in the support of a Christian Parliament. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

[Second Night.

Mr. Whiteside

[Second Night.

Mr. Whitelocke

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I feel somewhat indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for having come forward as a new advocate upon this Question, as he has infused, by that physical force oratory, of which he is so great a master, some new light upon a question which has been worn almost threadbare. But I do not think that when his speech is read to-morrow it will satisfy that great portion of the people of the country who object to church rates, that the system now existing should be permanently continued. I was not present at the opening of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, but when I entered the House he was telling the House that the Nonconformists of the olden time were a much better class of men than the Dissenters of the present day; that they made no objections to the equity of church rates. That was a sentiment which was received with great enthusiasm by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who for the first time have appeared as decided admirers of the Nonconformists of that time. In answer to that it may be said from the time of Queen Elizabeth down to the Act of Toleration the principles of religious freedom were little understood in this country. We know that not the Church only when it had the power, but many of the Nonconformists themselves, admitted that it was right not only to raise taxes for the support of a particular Church—their own Church—but that it was positively right to coerce those persons who held religious opinions different from their own. They had not advanced as far as the great body of the English people, including hon. Gentlemen opposite, and the party they represent, have now advanced, and therefore the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument goes for very little. But he has treated the House to a public reading of a large portion of the evidence of, I think, two gentlemen who were witnesses before the Committee of the House of Lords. I shall refer only to the evidence of one of these Gentlemen—Mr. Bunting. I suspect that when the name of Bunting was mentioned there was a general impression that this was the evidence of a very distinguished man who, although not nominally, yet actually, was Bishop or Archbishop, and almost Pope, in the sect of which he was so distinguished a member. But that is not the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, not for the first time in his life as a counsel learned in the law, has been beholden for his brief to an attorney practising in Manchester. Mr. Bunting is not a minister of the Methodist Church, as I understand, but is in the profession of the law, and therefore I must strip him of any authority he has upon this matter in connection with the Methodist Church in consequence of his bearing the name of Bunting. I must say, further, that this Gentleman, although in some sort a Nonconformist, inasmuch as I presume he attends a Methodist Chapel, is a politician of a peculiar kind, such as is not found very frequently among the dissenting body. I dare say he agrees with the most obstructive, if I may use the term, Conservative or Tory among hon. Gentlemen opposite, and if we had taken his opinion upon all those questions of policy which this House has decided in favour of popular rights and justice to the people of this country during the last twenty years, I have not the least doubt that Mr. Bunting would have been as conclusive against all those concessions as he appears to have been upon the question of church rates. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not treat the House quite fairly in stating the evidence of this Gentleman, because he did not feel himself courageous enough to say that the Wesleyan body was in favour of church rates. I find he says, in answer to a question whether there was any likelihood of petitions being sent by them:—

"No: from a fear on the part of those who sympathize with the Church of England of eliciting an opinion to the contrary. There is among us a general agreement not to disturb questions which we do not consider essential. The opposition would, I believe, be from a minority in our own body."

"A distinct minority?—I think I should call it so."

The House will see from this that although Mr. Bunting is not remarkable for great hesitation generally in his opinions upon this matter, yet he does hesitate to say that the Wesleyan body was with any sort of unanimity in favour of church rates. And I can give my testimony, living as I do in a neighbourhood where they are very numerous, and where their services have been very great, to the fact that when the question of church rates is mooted and contests take place, although a few leading men are anxious to keep the question quiet, because it is one which might disturb their body, as far as my observation goes, a very large number—I think a majority—who attend their chapels, have generally acted with the party by which church rates were opposed. But it must be borne in mind that the Wesleyan body is of a peculiar character, that its government is more strictly priestly than anything that exists in the Church of England and almost beyond anything in the Church of Rome. The Conference, composed of 100 ministers, dominates not only over the private opinions and individual action of the members, but also over what I may call the corporate or sect action, and throughout their numerous chapels in this country, unless the Conference were to give the order or its permission, we should not find from any of these congregations petitions presented to this House. But from this fact may be traced an important series of circumstances—that there have been from that body numerous secessions of very noteworthy character, secessions which have not arisen from any difference as to the doctrine, but simply as to the absolute Government of the Conference. Notwithstanding all this, as I have said, great numbers of them—I believe a very great majority—vote in opposition to church rates whenever a contest takes place, and do unite in sympathy upon this question with the great body of Dissenters belonging to other sects. I should not have said so much about this particular body had it not been for the extraordinary importance which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given to this part of the subject. I find, however, that even from the Conference Methodists there have been 135 petitions presented lately to the House: from the Methodist New Connexion 97, from the Methodist Free Church 164, from the Primitive Methodists 265, from the Calvinistic Methodists 108, from the United Methodists, the Methodist reformers, and the Wesleyan Association, 47; making a total of more than 800 petitions which have been presented from that body in favour of this Bill. Now, as to the other sects of Dissenters, I believe the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not been able to make out any kind of case or to show any difference of opinion among them upon this question. I think he will admit that they are, with as much unanimity as can ever be expected upon public questions, in favour of a repeal of church rates. But if it be, as he says, that this movement is merely the movement of a few busy, meddling agitators belonging to those sects—whose numbers by the way he has not given very accurately—if that be so, how comes it that throughout the country and in this House they have obtained so large a share of support? That fact is a very ugly one, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman passed it over. Even the Church, on whose behalf the hon. and learned Gentleman professes to speak, is itself not unanimous upon this question, and in all the parishes in towns and cities where church rates have been abolished, every Member who has been engaged in this question will admit that no inconsiderable number of those who regularly attend the services of the Church have joined those agitating, meddling Dissenters in their attempt to put an end to the system of church rates. I should say in those districts a large minority—I will not say a majority—of Churchmen have been as willing to get church rates abolished as the Dissenters themselves. I live in a town in which contests about church rates have been carried on in past years with a vigour and determination, and, if you like it, with an animosity which has not been surpassed in any other part of the kingdom. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, who profess to be in favour of what is called a stand-up fight, will be glad to hear that nothing could exceed the activity of their friends in that parish, nothing could exceed the profuseness with which they were willing to pay for a contest, in order that all might have to contribute to a Church which at that time they themselves were not willing adequately to support. The very last contest of this kind cost the Church party in the parish as much money as, if invested at the common rate of interest, would have supported the fabric of the church for ever. [A cry of "How much?"] I can tell the hon. Gentleman what was the estimate formed, which I believe was never disputed, and which, judging from the expenditure on the other side, was not, I should say, very inaccurate. I believe that the expenditure would not be less than from £3,000 to £4,000. It is a large parish, probably ten miles square, and contains nearly 100,000 inhabitants; and I need not tell hon. Members that there is no class of people in England more determined and more unconquerable, whichever side they take, than are the people of the county from which I come. What was the result of that struggle? The result was that the church rate was for ever entirely abolished in that parish. I have since seen several lists of candidates for the churchwardenship put forth by Churchmen, each of which claimed support upon the ground that they would never consent to the reimposition of a church rate; and the parish has been for many years upon this question a model of tranquillity. It would not be enough that it should be a model of tranquillity if the result had followed which the hon. and learned Gentleman foretold in such dolorous language, that religion would be uncared for, and that the Gospel would no longer be preached to the poor; but I will undertake to say that since this contest that venerable old parish church has had laid out upon it, in repairing and beautifying it, from money subscribed not altogether, but mainly by Churchmen, ten times, aye, twenty times as much as was ever expended upon it during a far longer period of years in which church rates were levied. During that period there were discussions about the graveyard, about the hearses, about the washing of the surplice, about somebody who had to sweep out the church. There were discussions of all sorts, of a most irritating and offensive character. The clock which was there for the benefit of the public no longer told the time, and, in fact, there was evidence of that sort of decay to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has pointed as the inevitable result of the abolition of church rates. Since the rate ceased to be levied the clock has kept time with most admirable fidelity, and to such an extent has the liberality of Churchmen gone, that very lately they have put up another clock in a neighbouring church. I believe that in the parish of Rochdale the Church people have received far more benefit from the abolition of the church rate than the Dissenters have. They have found out, what they never knew before, that when placed upon the same platform as Dissenters, and obliged to depend upon their own resources, they are as liberal and zealous as other sects. I wish that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had told us, and I hope that some one who follows him will do so, how it happens that year by year there has been growing in this House a power in opposition to church rates, while at the same time there has been less animosity throughout the country upon this question. I believe it has arisen from the growth of a better feeling on both sides, and from the fact that year by year there have been secessions from the supporters of church rates throughout the country, and that more and more without the action of Parliament the principle embodied in the clauses of the Bill of my hon. Friend has come to be acted upon. Now what is the real point between us?—because I believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite will agree with me that if it could be done it would be better that this question should be for ever disposed of. What is the question at issue between us? Does any man dispute the evils that have arisen? The right hon. and learned Gentleman has, in a speech of great vigour, endeavoured to throw ridicule and contempt upon the great body of the Dissenting population of this country. [“No, no!”] Well, at any rate, he has not refrained from expressions of harshness towards those whom he charges with being the movers in this question. But does he believe, or do any of you believe, that if those persons did not in the main possess the confidence of the great body of the Dissenters, they could in a week, a fortnight, or a month, stir them up from one end of the country to the other, and bring to your table the signatures of 500,000 of your countrymen? [Cries of “600,000.”] I am reminded that the number is 600,000, but in a matter of this kind I am not particular to 100,000 more or less. I say, then, is there any one here who disputes the evils which have arisen from these discussions? I confess that I have sometimes wished that I could speak in this House, even if it were for only one half hour, in the character of a Member of the Church of England. If I could have done that I should have appealed to the House in language far more emphatic and impressive than I have ever been able to use as a Dissenter, in favour of the abolition of this most mischievous and obnoxious impost. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has no plan. I think he was right in making that admission. I believe there are only two courses which can be pursued. One is to leave the law exactly as it is, a course which if this matter did not touch a ques-

[Second Night.]

Mr. Bright

[Second Night.]

Members more frequently taking in the discussion of questions affecting England and Wales than they do, I am surprised to find that the right hon. learned Gentleman made no reference whatever to what has taken place in the country from which he himself comes. In the year 1833 you abolished the vestry system in the church rate of Ireland; you abolished one-fourth of the tithe—that is, you took it from the Church and gave it to the lay lord; you did a good many things for the Irish Church at that time which any Gentlemen of the same party as the right hon. and learned Member denounced, as you denounce the present Bill. Of course it will be said that the Earl of Derby has since then changed his opinions, and therefore the views he held at that time will have no authority with his followers now. But what has been the result on that Church? Is there a man in this House with the slightest knowledge of what has occurred in Ireland during the last thirty years, who will not admit that the Irish Protestant Establishment would have been absolutely uprooted and separated from the State for ever long ago but for the large measure of patronage—I will say of reform—to which the Earl of Derby, as a Minister of that day, was a party? If that be true, what has anybody to charge the hon. Member for Tavistock with a deadly hostility to the Church of England? I do not believe there is a man in this country at the present moment who has any hostility to the Church of England as a Church. I never learned it with such a man. The right hon. learned Gentleman has referred to a friend of mine who not long ago had a seat in this House, although he did not mention him by name. I allude to Mr. Miall. Why, there is no man in England whose character for religion, morality, intelligence, or a persistent devotion to what he believes to be right stands higher than that of Mr. Miall. But Mr. Miall has not the smallest objection to the Church of England as a religious body, any more than he has to the Methodist Conference or any other denomination which teaches its own peculiar views of Christianity. What he objects to is that the Church should be, as it has been, so much of a po-dom at this moment a deep sentiment at work which, altogether, apart from Mr. Miall and the Liberation Society, is destined before many years are over to make great changes in the constitution and condition of that Church. And I undertake to say that, if their views, or those of Mr. Miall, were carried out by Parliament, the Church would still be a Church at least as great, as powerful, and as respected as it ever was at any period of its history. I believe it would, as effectually as it ever has done, raise to life those who are religiously dead, and, at the same time, more extensively than it does now, preach the Gospel to the poor. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman might have given us another lesson from Ireland. There the great body of the people—not the possessors of wealth—are in connection with the Roman Catholic Church. Many of us have been in Ireland. I have myself spent several weeks there, travelling from one part of the country to another. I saw chapels everywhere, that great cathedrals had been built, that there were evidences of great zeal and wonderful liberality among a people at that time poor and dejected, and in a lower physical condition, I undertake to say, than could have been found in any other population in any Christian country of Europe. The Irish Catholics, without any assistance from the State except a paltry grant, which I believe many of them would gladly forego, have provided amply for all the religious wants of their people. And I venture to assert that religion—not now speaking of particular doctrines or forms—has there permeated even to the lowest class of society in a manner that is not equalled in this part of the kingdom, where your Church Establishment has for ages reigned almost supreme. But if you are not satisfied with the case of Ireland, let us go to Wales. There you have a poor population of Methodists. The Welsh Dissenters do not own the great estates. They have no ancient endowments, no grants from Parliament. They do not even send representatives to this House—["Oh!"]—representatives I mean of their peculiar views. Eight-tenths of the people of Wales have no connection with the Established Church. Yet, poor as they are, compared with the population of England, there is not a nook

[Second Night.]

contest and discussion which are inseparable from the continuance of these rates, the more probably, for a long period of time, you will consolidate your Church; and I am inclined to believe that its fall as a State establishment will never come from the assaults of those who are without it, but will rather come from the strong differences of doctrine among those within its pale. I should like to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to look to a point in respect to which their Church is at a great disadvantage as compared with Dissenting congregations. I am in a position to observe both of them with great impartiality, because I belong to a sect which is very small, which some people say is decaying, although I believe its main principles are always spreading. I have no particular sympathy with Wesleyans, Independents, or Baptists, any more than I have with the congregations which assemble in your churches. But have you not observed in London, and more particularly in the country, where you are more minutely acquainted with circumstances—have you not observed, that among the congregations of Dissenting bodies there is a greater activity in all matters which belong to their Churches, and to objects which they unite together in promoting as a religious community? Don't you find that from the richest and the most influential man who enters a chapel on a Sunday to the humblest of the congregation there is, as it were, a chain of sympathy running through them all, which gives to them a great strength, which combines them together, which influences the humblest and the highest for good, and which gives to that congregation a power which is found to be greatly less existent in a congregation of the Established Church? I have spoken of this to many persons who differ from me on all those questions of church establishments, church rates, and the like; but I never spoke to any man in the habit of attending the Established Church who did not admit to me that it is one of the things they most deplore, that among the 500 persons more or less who attend any particular church there was infinitely less sympathy, co-operation, union, and power of action than was evidenced among the various Dissenting communities in this country almost without exception. But if you had none of these rates to levy by law you would be placed—and it would be a most material advantage—in the same position as are the congregations of Dissenting bodies. You would be obliged, of course, in the management of your congregational affairs, to consult the members in general; you would have your monthly or quarterly meetings; and thus you would know who were your neighbours in church, and you would be united together, as Dissenting congregations are. And I maintain that your religious activity and life for all purposes of missionary work at home and abroad would be greatly increased and strengthened; and so far your congregations, your ministers, and your churches would be great gainers. Some hon. Gentlemen will say that I am a violent partisan on this question, and that I have partaken of the animosity which I stated to have existed in the parish in which I live. I do not deny that in times past I have taken a warm, and it may be, occasionally, a too heated part in the contents and discussions on this question; but, so far as I am concerned, the feelings engendered by these strifes have been swept away; I am older than I was then; I make great allowance for men's passions, as I ask that they should make allowance for mine. This question has come to a crisis; and I ask the House to consider whether it would not be to the advantage of the Church, of morality, religion, and the public peace, that this question should now be set at rest once and for ever. The right hon. and learned Gentleman—it is one of the faults of a high classical education—following the example of the right hon. Gentleman who delighted us all with a most brilliant but most illogical speech last night, affrighted us with an account of what took place under the democracies of Greece, and asks us to follow the example of those who were believers in the Paganism of ancient Rome. He says, did not the Roman emperors, consuls, and people go in procession after the vile gods and goddesses which they worshipped? It is true they did, and I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman feels sorry by this time that he asked us to follow an example of that kind. Rome has perished, and the religion which it professed has perished with it. The Christian religion is wholly different, and if there be one thing written more legibly than another in every page of that book on which you profess that your Church is founded, it is that men should be just one to another, kind and brotherly one to another, and should not ask of each other to do that which they are not willing themselves to do. I say that this law

le. That petition, in s, was presented four
Mr. Muntz, and it clergy of the rural
am. It states that,

had painful experience
long suspension of the ing and repairing the fa-
as well as of providing of Divine service, and the voluntary system, after s, has proved inadequate
the church."

n from the evidence of Lords that several irmingham are in a and dilapidation. It to refer to the cir-
the hon. Gentleman
it on the individual

I do not want this decided on mere in-
and there; but when
of the ecclesiastical own, I think I have
state of the fabric system in the still wn which the hon.
and if any conclu-
estion of such gravity
the circumstances, I agree with me that must be more on tate of the churches
on that of the hon.

single instance he
e town of Rochdale.
the hon. Gentleman
an argument, but a
he voluntary system;
the question before Gentleman, as al-
has dealt in views
eculative, and must referring as they do lety which does not
y; and he has et-
and prove his ass which I can show
ious. For, after all,
man at such length
of the voluntary sys-
the non-necessaty of tion in order to sup-fabrics in that counount to? Why, to t, there has been a m a feeling of relid in favour of new es, and new endow-

ments; but the hon. Gentleman quite forgot that all this time, simultaneous with this great burst of religious feeling, and this remarkable investment for spiritual purposes without compulsion, there is an established Church of Scotland, maintained by the most rigid and inflexible church rate that can be devised—not the church rate that exists in this country, which depends on the decision of the majority, but one which no majority can influence, and which, under every circumstance is raised. All the time this remarkable investment was taking place, and this ebullition of religious feeling was evinced in Scotland, he forgot to remember that a church rate was not only in existence but levied with the utmost rigidity and strictness. So, with the picturesque view the hon. Gentleman gave us of himself when mounted on an elevation in the neighbourhood of a large town, and taking a survey of the ecclesiastical architecture, which he was careful to tell us did not always accord with his own taste; whenever he sees a new church, he says all this is done by the voluntary principle, why do you adhere to the ancient and barbarous principle which I recommend you to abolish? But he forgets that such exertions of the voluntary principle in the raising of churches are not of new introduction. The voluntary principle has been always at work in raising churches; and it would be very difficult to fix on any church in England that has not been raised by that same influence. The question is, whether the voluntary principle will keep churches in repair. The two illustrations, therefore, which the hon. Gentleman took from the present state of Scotland and England, in so far as we find a great expenditure in favour of sacred objects which the law does not compel, are really quite illusory, and do not in the least enforce the argument he wishes to impress on the House. Then, Sir, the hon. Gentleman says if there be such a feeling in favour of levying church rates in England—if there be among the Dissenters such a partial adhesion to that system, why has there been of late years so much interest on the subject in this House, and why is there a considerable party in it anxious that some legislation should take place on the subject? Now, I think, I can tell the hon. Gentleman the reason. No doubt there has been on both sides of the House a great unanimity to meet this subject, but that has arisen from an impression very prevalent in the country and in this House that there had been vexations complained of which might be remedied; that there have been scruples of conscience which have been urged, and which like all scruples of conscience have been at once listened to with sympathy and respect; but during all the period when there has been a considerable interest and even excitement on this subject in this House, the object has not been that which the hon. Gentleman now frankly confesses to be his object; but it has been an anxious desire of Gentlemen on both sides of the House to meet a complaint which they thought might efficiently be met, and to remove a grievance which they thought might be practically encountered. But, Sir, thirty years have passed since this matter of church rates has been a public question of large interest; and how have these thirty years been occupied? Why, Sir, they have been occupied in pleas which time has proved to be insincere, and in plans and projects of adjustment which, because the pleas for abolition were insincere, have necessarily proved fallacious and inadequate. That is the reason why there has been so much interest in this House, and why all our efforts have been futile. But the hon. Gentleman, the self-appointed representative of the school of abolition, has, in his speech to-night, told us frankly what is his object, and we cannot help observing that the object he now eulogizes is not that we have been considering and desiring to remedy during the last thirty years. He tells us that the Church of the nation ought not to be supported for merely a portion of the nation. He tells us that this is only an abstract opinion, but, if only an abstract opinion, we demur assenting to a Bill the object of which is to convert a mere abstract opinion into a very definite and practical policy. He says that the Church of this nation is supported only for a portion of the nation, and that is a state of affairs that ought not to be endured. We have brought the question, then, to a very clear issue. I do not wish at all to diminish its importance, but it is a very great advantage that we have it clearly expressed in language no one can misunderstand, and that we know really what we are about. Well, then, before we assume that it is a verity on which we are called to legislate, let us be at once sure that we are acting safely in accepting the dogma of the hon. Gentleman as an axiom. The Church of the nation, he says, is only the Church of a portion of the nation, because there are some dissenting from its doctrines and discipline, or not within its pale. Let us consider who those persons are. It is of great importance that we should treat this subject with calmness. It is not a subject of the moment only, it will affect the future, and it is imperative that every step we take should be a safe one. Let us examine briefly the position of the Dissenters. The Dissenters of this country range under two heads—there are first the descendants of the old Nonconformists, persons exercising considerable influence from their property, and, I willingly admit, from their high character and integrity. Well, these are the descendants of generations back which had a decided quarrel with the Church. They separated from the Church because the Church in the days of their separation was, as they alleged and believed, conducted in a spirit of superstition and oppression. But we must remember this—the hon. Gentleman has reminded us to-night of the circumstance—that there is no difference between the descendants of the old Nonconformists and the members of the Church of England in doctrine. The Church of England is otherwise as much changed from the Church of the days of the quarrel with the Nonconformists as the Nonconformists themselves are changed. There is, in what venerable Hooker would call Ecclesiastical Polity, something which, if conducted with temper and due humility, recommends itself to tender and refined minds. It is perfectly true, as the hon. Gentleman has represented, that many of the most distinguished Nonconformist families are absorbed in the national Church at the present moment, and therefore the hon. Gentleman can hardly contend that the old quarrel with Nonconformity is in the 19th century a ground on which you should put an end to the Established Church of England. Then there is the second class of Dissenters more considerable in numbers, but more recent in origin and growth. They are Dissenters who have become so from the circumstance that the population of this country has outgrown the Church of the country. It is not superstition or oppression that has driven this considerable body of men from the Church; at the worst, it was negligence. But if you admit the principle of an established national Church, if you admit the fact that, during the end of the last century and the beginning of the present, the population of this country greatly outgrew the Church, will you, as a consequence, adopt the conclusion of the hon. Member for Birmingham that the Established Church ought to be abolished, because from negligence and inefficient means it has not met the spiritual requirements of a vast population? That would be hardly a wise and statesmanlike course to pursue. On the contrary, you should rather increase the means and extend the influence of the Church in such circumstances, than reduce its power and diminish its efficiency. When we recollect—what no one can deny—that the exertions of the Established Church of this country during the last quarter of a century, and especially at this moment, show that it is mindful of the population which had so much outgrown the sphere of its influence, and that it is endeavouring to compensate for this want of diligence and efficiency, that is an additional argument why we should not follow the policy of the hon. Gentleman. There is a third portion of the population not under the influence of the Church, but it is a portion that is not under the influence of any other religious community; and that is a consideration which, when questions of this kind are under the consideration of Parliament, we must meet. If there be a considerable portion of the population that are practically without the pale of the National Church, can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether any of those sects he admires so much, are acting in a missionary spirit towards that population? He cannot pretend to say so; and are we, who in this House desire to maintain the Constitution of this country, to lay down the principle that because there is a considerable portion of the population over whom no religious body is exercising any spiritual influence, therefore we are to abolish the National Church, which is the only corporation that can offer us any means by which that want may be supplied? I say, therefore, that the argument of the hon. Gentleman, that if the Church of a nation is supported only by a portion of the nation it ought not to be maintained, is not an argument that the Members of this House can accept or sanction. That appears to me, totally irrespective of all higher considerations, to be the most imprudent and impolitic course that we could pursue. The hon. Gentleman has spoken to-night sometimes, apparently, in a tone of derision, and sometimes with considerable respect and appreciation, of the influence of the Established Church. [Mr. BRIGHT: Not with derision.] I certainly thought that the churches supported by church rates were made objects of derision by the hon. Gentleman, while he spoke of those supported by the voluntary efforts of the communicants in terms of respect and commendation. But I have no wish to misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, or to offer to the House anything but serious argument, of the truth of which I am convinced. One observation on this subject of the influence of the Church. It appears to me that the very marrow of this question, so far as Parliament is concerned, lies in a due appreciation of that influence. We have been of late years very unwilling that questions connected with the Church should be introduced to the consideration of this House, and, in a certain limited point of view, that was a very proper and reasonable course. No doubt, after the great changes that have taken place in this House during the last thirty years, after you admitted Roman Catholics, Dissenters, Jews, and indeed all subjects of Her Majesty, without reference to their religious opinions, the position and character of this House, as regards the Church of England as a religious body, had considerably changed. Before you consented to these changes in the elements of our assembly the House of Commons was a species of lay convocation; and it was very natural and reasonable that we should have before us the condition, discipline, and even the doctrines of the Church of which all were members. But when this great change in our character occurred I can easily understand why the doctrines of the Church should never be brought under the consideration of an assembly, the members of which did not belong to that Church, and even the discipline as rarely as possible. But though the spiritual influence of the Church of England is not a matter that should be introduced into our debates, it is impossible to shut our eyes to the social and political influence of that Church. And any man who attempts to shut his eyes to the social and political influence of the Church of England will, in his speculations on public affairs, omit one of the most important elements that can enter into the government of the country. I will not merely say that the social and political influence of the Church of England must necessarily operate beneficially for the community, for that may be said truly of every Church. I will not merely say that the tenour and character of its doctrines naturally lead to tranquillity, peace, and order, for that may be said truly of every Church. That may be said truly of the Church of France. No one doubts that the 36,000 curés of France are men generally devoted to the welfare of the people of that country, and that they exercise a beneficial influence on society. No one doubts that the general tenour, character, and tendency of the higher members of the hierarchy of every Church on the Continent are favourable to tranquillity and order. But there is one peculiarity in the Church of England which we should take into consideration when the opinion that we ought to separate Church and State is enforced, not merely as an abstract position, and it is this—that though the Church of England is connected with the State, it is independent of the Government. It is the boast of England that though our Government is weak our society is strong. It has been said of continental nations, and very truly, that there Governments are strong, but society weak. The consequence of having a strong society is, that you have local government and public liberty. You have that national character, which is the peculiarity of England, and which is a consequence of local government and public liberty. I cannot contemplate without apprehension the consequences to our society if you were to withdraw the influence of the Established Church, as one of its most important elements. The change that it would produce in our peculiar society and in our national character would be such, that I doubt whether the most far-seeing and profoundest men most versed in public affairs could possibly anticipate it. What would be the result of following the policy now recommended in so off-hand a way? If hon. Gentlemen believe, as I believe, that this Church, which, though connected with the State, is independent of the Government, is one of the strongest elements of our society, and one of the best securities for local government and public liberty, they will hesitate before they sanction with such facility as heretofore the theories which are recommended by the hon. Baronet who promotes this Bill. Is this a time of all others when it can be the interest of Parliament to weaken the social elements of this country? I do not want to indulge in alarming views of the future. They are so serious that there is no man in this House and no think-which did the same. He maintained that it was not only a robbery of the poor, it was a fraud upon the law itself, and it was with that conviction that he wished to propose the clause. In point of fact, the clause would not effect the abolition of church rates unless such a clause were introduced into it. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) had stated that it was the Birmingham Political Union and the Liberation Society which had produced and sustained the church-rate agitation throughout the country. He did not know whether he should shock the right hon. and learned Gentleman or not by making the proposal, but he could only say that in 1831 he was a Member of the Birmingham Political Union, and he was at that moment a Member of the Liberation Society. He would take upon himself to say that the Birmingham Political Union never interfered with the question of church rates at all. The real cause of the agitation lay in the stringent measures which were taken to enforce them some years ago. The imprisonment of Messrs. Thorowgood and Chelmsford called the attention of the public to the matter. The former was imprisoned in Chelmsford gaol for three years, and the Bishop of London would not release him until he had purged himself of his contempt of the spiritual court. The Member for Oxford at that time (Sir R. Inglis) would hardly believe that Mr. Thorowgood could be sincere and conscientious in the matter, but having gone down to Chelmsford gaol and seen him, he was convinced to the contrary, he came back to the House and stated that he believed the man's imprisonment to have been caused by a conscientious objection to the payment of church rates, and the consequence was, that a Bill was brought in to prevent people who refused to pay them from having to purge themselves of their contempt of the spiritual court.

Mr. Disraeli

[Second Night.]

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 235; Noes 226; Majority 9.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

STOCK JOBBING BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BOVILL said, he rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill to repeal so much of the statute relating to stock jobbing as prevents persons selling and disposing of stocks or other securities, of which they are not possessed. He did so in order to raise the question whether there should be a total or only a partial repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act. It was uncertain what the intentions of the Government, with respect to Sir John Barnard's Act, were, for they had given no less than three versions of what were their intentions upon the subject. The Secretary of the Treasury had stated that what Government desired to legalize were simply those transactions which were bona fide dealings in stock; but that seemed to be already sufficiently done by an Act of Parliament then in force, and passed in 1845. He desired to retain the principle of the Bill of 1845, the provisions of which were very stringent against gambling on a small scale, while he did not wish to relax those provisions of Sir John Barnard's Act which were directed against gambling on a large scale. The question he wished to raise must, he understood, be decided before the second reading of the Government Bill for the entire repeal of the Act in question, because, after it had reached that stage, it would not be competent to introduce a Bill for partial repeal. If his Bill were carried forward, the House would have before it two propositions, one for repealing the whole, and the other a portion of Sir John Barnard's Act, and the House would then be able to decide between them.

MR. LAING said, that the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be the same as that of the Government in wishing to repeal Sir J. Barnard's Act. There was, therefore, no objection on the part of the Government to the first reading of the Bill.

Leave given.

Bill to repeal so much of the Statutes relating to Stock Jobbing as prevents persons selling and disposing of Stocks or other Securities of which they are not possessed, ordered to be brought in by MR. BOVILL and MR. MACAULAY.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

PARLIAMENTARY BOROUGH.— (ASSESSED TAXES, &c.)

RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. MACAULAY said, he wished to move for a Return from every Parliamentary city and borough in England and Wales, showing the total number of male persons in each who were charged to any of the assessed taxes, or to the income tax under schedule B and D respectively, for the year 1859-60; how many of such persons were assessed to the poor's-rate upon a gross rental of £20 and upwards; how many upon a like rental of £10 and under £20; how many on a like rental of £6 and under £10; how many under £6; and how many were not occupiers of tenements rated to the poor. They had already Returns of the total amount of direct taxation paid by each borough, but no return showing the number of persons by whom it was paid, or how many of them were on the registry, or were tenants or occupiers. He understood there would be some difficulty and expense in obtaining the Return; but the information would be so valuable that a little difficulty and expense ought not to stand in the way. These classes of taxpayers were very numerous in all large towns; and, when adding to the constituencies, they could not decently omit them.

MR. LAING said, the only difficulty in acceding to the proposition arose from the fact that the Return from the collectors of the Inland Revenue would occupy a considerable time, and the Revenue officers were not in possession of the poor-rate books or the registry. Still, the Government would not offer any opposition to the Return, believing the information important. Every effort would be made to obtain it as soon as practicable.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the Return would be perfectly fallacious; it would not identify the recipients of dividends from the Funds, shareholders in public companies, or those who received incomes from personal property. The Return would lead to most erroneous conclusions.

MR. BOUVERIE contended that the procuring of these Returns would involve a great amount of labour, and necessitate an expenditure of considerable magnitude. Moreover, such delay would necessarily take place that before they could be presented they would be practically useless. He spoke from experience when he stated that it was impossible ever to procure satisfactory Returns of this nature from unpaid officials.

MR. MACAULAY explained that he had no intention to ask for a Return of the names of shareholders in a company. All he wanted to obtain was a list of the persons who were actually visited by the tax-gatherer, from which a comparison could easily be made with the rate-books by experienced persons.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID thought that the Return would involve very considerable difficulty and expense, and that it would not be satisfactory when made.

Mr. Macaulay

MR. MOWBRAY said, if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had spoken as the representative of the department which had more immediate cognizance of the matters referred to in this Return, his opposition to the Motion would rest on intelligible grounds; but, as the Government had intimated no reluctance to the ordering of these Returns, he thought the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman was somewhat uncalled for. No objection whatever had been made on the question of church rates to the collection of information which was procured by unpaid officers; and even if a trifling expense were now incurred by the same course, he did not think the country would be deterred by that consideration from obtaining the fullest possible intelligence with respect to the probable results of the great change which was to be made in the national institutions.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think it is clear that the production of the Return which the hon. and learned Gentleman has called for will be attended with much difficulty and with a considerable lapse of time; and it is possible, also, that when it is produced it will, to a certain degree, be imperfect for the purpose for which it is required. At the same time, on a subject of this nature, and when the information is considered to be desirable in reference to the very important measure which is under the consideration of Parliament, I think the House will not be disposed to object to the production of these Returns.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, great trouble would be entailed on the parochial officers in preparing the required information, and the House would probably not refuse, under the circumstances, to sanction a moderate claim for expenses, if such should be preferred.

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Return, for every Parliamentary City and Borough in England and Wales, showing,—

1. The total number of male persons in each who were charged to any of the Assessed Taxes, or to the Income Tax, under Schedules B and D respectively, for the year 1859-60;

2. How many of such persons were assessed to the Poor's Rate upon a gross rental of £20 and upwards;

3. How many upon a like rental of £10 and under £20;

4. How many on a like rental of £6 and under £10;

5. How many under £6;

6. And how many were not occupiers of tenements rated to the Poor.

JEWS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE moved the Third Reading of this Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, he objected to its being proceeded with at such an advanced hour (twenty minutes to one o'clock).

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he understood from the Colleague of the hon. Gentleman that the Bill was not to be further opposed.

MR. NEWDEGATE explained that, in deference to the opinions of the right hon. Members for Oxfordshire and Cambridge, he had determined not to offer any opposition to the Motion for the Third Reading, and therefore he hoped his hon. Colleague would withdraw his also.

Motion agreed to. Bill read 3^d and passed.

House adjourned, at a quarter before One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, April 30, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Jews Act Amendment; Church Rates Abolition; Church of England and Ireland (Rites and Ceremonies). 3^d Marriages (England and Ireland); Divorce Court.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS.

LORD EBURY moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be pleased to direct that the vacant Site of Smithfield Market shall be appropriated in such a Manner as will conduce to the Health and Recreation of the Inhabitants of the Neighbourhood.”

The noble Lord said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that, shortly before Easter, he asked Her Majesty's Government whether the report was true that they intended to consent to a proposal of the City authorities to build over a portion of the site of Smithfield market, and appropriate it for a dead-meat market. The answer he received was that such a plan was in the contemplation of Her Majesty's Ministers. He heard that answer with much surprise and regret—with surprise, because he thought he had received assurances, both from the present and the late Government, that no part of Smithfield market would be permitted to be built over—and with regret, because the smallest portion of open space, if it were but half an acre in extent, was of the utmost consequence in this crowded Metropolis, although to the owners of many broad acres in the country it might appear but an unimportant matter. If the Government permitted one single rood of land in that part of the City to be encroached upon, when it might be kept an open space, they would do an act of positive cruelty. He did hope, therefore, that the Government would reconsider their decision, and preserve the whole of that valuable space open. He (Lord Ebury) with others strove nearly twenty years ago to drive the City authorities to remove the cattle market from Smithfield, in which tame beasts were converted into wild ones, and ever since the City authorities had themselves been driven away, he had been watching the spot as a cat watches a mouse, and had taken all the steps he could to prevent them from re-occupying a ground which should be devoted to the health and recreation of the inhabitants. Through the authorities of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and the Rev. Mr. Rogers, who had established such admirable schools for the poor of that neighbourhood, this case had been frequently urged upon the City Corporation, and upon more than one department of the Government. In 1856 he (Lord Ebury) introduced a deputation to the noble Viscount, now at the head of the Government, on the subject of the appropriation of this space, which comprised the Sanitary Inspectors, the School Inspectors, the Secretary of Bartholomew's Hospital, and the Playground Society. They were received by the noble Viscount with great good will, and left his house with the assurance that he entirely concurred with them, and that he felt great interest in the matter. Hearing another rumour afterwards about it, he (Lord Ebury) wrote to the noble Earl who had succeeded the noble Viscount as head of the Government, and received a letter from him, the purport of which was, that nothing would induce the Government to do anything to dispose of the site of Smithfield Market, otherwise than for the health and comfort of the inhabitants. He had endeavoured, but without success, to induce the Government to take possession of the ground, and settle the question at once, because then only would there be security for its being permanently kept open for the benefit of the public. A question had arisen whether the site, after it ceased to be a market, reverted to the Crown or remained to the Corporation. The law officers of the Crown had been consulted, and had declared there was no doubt that the site actually belonged to the Crown. The Corporation, although they demurred to that opinion, could not bring forward any reason for disputing the claim of the Crown. They had, however, made various attempts to appropriate the whole or a portion of the site to the erection of a dead-meat market, or to other purposes, and a good deal of correspondence had passed between them and the Government of the day on the subject. Now, if this ground, which was formerly used as a cattle market only on certain days of the week, was to be appropriated for a dead-meat market, and partly built over, it would be like the unclean spirit who had been cast out returning there with seven other spirits worse than himself, and the last state of that place would be worse than the first. A Committee was appointed in 1854, of their own body, by the then Government, composed of Mr. Cowper, Mr. Brandt, and Mr. Massey, all distinguished Members of the present Government. The Committee said they were of opinion that the site of the market should be kept clear from buildings, and strong reasons could be given for their arriving at such a conclusion. It was stated recently in the other House that forty boys had been taken into custody by the police and committed to Bridewell within the year for playing at "tip-cat" and "rounders" in the public streets; but unless some playgrounds or open spaces were provided in these wretched localities the poor children would be prevented from having any healthful out-door exercise, and from enjoying the very few happy moments of their not very happy existence. To deprive them of such recreation, or if they did attempt the enjoyment of exercising their youthful limbs in running and jumping to send them to prison was absolute cruelty, and it was not surprising that when boys, who had been debarred from these enjoyments, grew up, they should be unhealthy, discontented, and miserable. He could not understand why the authorities of St. Bartholomew's Hospital did not petition against the proposed building; and he was afraid some kind of influence had been exercised over them. It was almost impossible to struggle successfully against the Corporation of the City of London, for when they had determined to do any particular thing they were always able to accomplish it somehow or another. But, as this was a question of public health, he hoped the Government would be induced to reconsider the unfortunate decision to which he understood they had come, and that they would preserve as much of the site of Smithfield market as they possibly could from the encroachment of buildings. He did not know what legal difficulties were in the way, but let it once be known that Her Majesty was willing to waive her rights in order to keep Smithfield as an open space for the recreation of the poor in the neighbourhood, and the Corporation of the City would not dare to go to law upon the subject. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Address.

Lord Ebury

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that it was all very well for the noble Lord to say that the Government had failed in their duty in not securing the site of Smithfield; but in fact a compromise had been entered into between the Government and the Corporation of the City of London subject to the approval of Parliament, whose assent would be asked to a Bill introduced for that purpose. Under those circumstances it would be improper for the Government to depart from the arrangement that had been come to, by which a large portion of the area of Smithfield would be kept free from buildings, in order to afford the inhabitants of the neighbourhood the benefit of fresh air. The noble Lord should remember that the City of London had expended large sums of money upon the locality and were entitled to a voice in the disposal of the ground. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Lord would withdraw his Motion for an Address to the Crown.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the answer of the noble Earl was most unsatisfactory. He protested against giving up one square inch of the site of Smithfield market to be built upon, and maintained that it was the duty of the Government, from a regard to the interests of public health and public morality, to resist to the utmost any encroachment on the part of the somewhat arrogant Corporation of the City upon the present open area. On what ground was any portion of the site to be built upon, interfering as such a proceeding would do with the enjoyment of 10,000 persons resident in a very crowded part of the metropolis? For years past Committees and Commissions had been inquiring into the sanitary condition of the people, and every Report that had been presented stated that open spaces affording the means of fresh air, ventilation, and exercise were essential to the health of populous towns and cities. Now, however, in a part of that vast City, surrounded by every noxious influence engendering disease and death, there being an opportunity of preserving such an open space, it was proposed to give it up to this Corporation, to be covered with a dead-meat market. It had been said in favour of the salubrity of a dead-meat market, that butchers and their families never died of consumption. Perhaps not; but it should be remembered that butchers and their families took good care to eat plenty of fresh meat every day. That was a very excellent preventive which poor people had not the means of obtaining, and therefore they could not withstand the effects of the pestilential atmosphere which surrounded them. He would give their Lordships some idea of the state of the population bordering on Smithfield, to enable them to judge how indispensably necessary for the comfort, health, decency, and order of these unfortunate people it was that this area should be preserved free from buildings. The rev. incumbent of St. Peter's, Saffron Hill, adjacent to Smithfield, stated that his district, which was only 300 yards in length by 200 yards in breadth, contained a population of 10,000 souls; and that was only a sample of the crowded state of the whole surrounding neighbourhood. All sorts of manufactures and processes, which required an open space in their vicinity to admit of fresh air, whereby the health of the inhabitants might be preserved, were carried on in that locality. The whole of the district in question was beset with slaughter-houses, which, it was well known, engendered fever and other diseases. It was full of what were called gut-spinning manufactories, than which nothing could be more offensive. There also were many skin-dressing and bone-boiling establishments, and knackers' yards. He did not know whether the noble Lord opposite had ever been to a knacker's yard, and knew the effects it produced on his nose, his feelings, and general physical system. In short, there was a combination of almost every element of evil influence surrounding the population of this district; and, as the opening of Smithfield market had been a perfect godsend to them, the building of it up would be a downright curse. In his opinion the space should be laid out in walks, planted with trees, shrubs, and flowers, in order to serve as a place of recreation for the population in that district, who had at present two or three miles to go for a mouthful of fresh air. It was established by universal testimony that a very large proportion of the intoxication which prevailed among the population of London arose from the state of the localities in which they lived, the foulness of the atmosphere they breathed, and the effects it produced on their general system, necessitating the resort to stimulating drinks in order to keep up the very sensations of vitality. Place the people in a proper sanitary condition, and they would reduce at once seven-tenths of the intoxication and crime which prevailed throughout the kingdom. But this was not all. Their Lordships must recollect that in the immediate vicinity of Smithfield was St. Bartholomew's Hospital, making up 500 beds, to the salubrity of which a free open space would be of incalculable service. The Corporation of the City of London were the trustees and guardians of the funds for the benefit of this Hospital, and were therefore in a manner autocratic in its management; so that the Hospital could not petition against this Bill; but he could adduce the testimony of many of the medical officers of that institution to the effect that fresh air would be of the greatest value to the recovery of their patients, and, without that, cures which might have been effected could not be looked for. They had also to consider the health of not fewer than 1,000 boys, who were congregated together in Christ's Hospital, at that very age when bad air was most injurious to their physical well-being. There were also two prisons in the immediate neighbourhood — Giltspur Street Compter and the Old Bailey—where the bad smells of Smithfield were peculiarly offensive, and where a double punishment was inflicted on the unfortunate inmates, ill-health being induced by confinement in such an atmosphere, and thus depriving the inmates of the means of subsistence when their term of imprisonment had expired. If these considerations were duly weighed, as he had no doubt they would be, their Lordships would hesitate before they assented to provisions which would be essentially detrimental to the interests of the population, and be largely productive of ill-health, vice, and immorality in the City of London.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that neither he, nor the Government of which he was a member, underrated the importance of preserving a large open space in so crowded a neighbourhood; but the only question under the consideration of the Government was, whether a small part of the site which had been purchased by the Corporation for the enlargement of the market should be given up for a dead-meat market?

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY: My Lords, I do not apprehend that any objection will be offered to the Motion I have to submit to your Lordships for the production of the correspondence that has lately taken place between the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland and the Lord Lieutenant regarding the education of the poor. There is no question relating to that part of the United Kingdom upon which it is so important your Lordships should be fully informed—none in which the Irish people have so deep an interest, and upon the conduct of which so much depends the future well-being and progress of the country; but, I must also add, that there is no part of the policy pursued by the Irish Government that so much needs to be reconsidered and reformed as the Department of National Education. The munificence of Parliament in the pecuniary provision it annually makes for that object shows the importance it attaches to it, and imposes a corresponding responsibility upon those to whose direction it is confided. How that important trust has been discharged, and with what success, has been, as your Lordships are aware, a subject of much controversy. On the one hand, credit is taken by Her Majesty's Commissioners for educating very large and yearly increasing numbers of poor children, numbers exaggerated beyond the belief of persons who care to be accurately informed, but by the uninquiring friends of the national system of education readily accepted as evidence of the success of the principle upon which it is founded; on the other hand, dissatisfaction has been constantly felt and repeatedly expressed that the education given is not based upon religion, or in any degree combined with religious training, and that even in imparting literary instruction the system has not realized public expectation; that it is both unsound in principle, and in practice a failure. Such representations, embodied in petitions to Parliament, have more than once led in both Houses to the appointment of Committees of Inquiry; inquiries that have been searching; but I regret to say never productive of any practical result either in refuting charges made against the system or its administration, or in leading to the removal of any grounds of dissatisfaction, however clearly established by evidence. The supporters of the Government, always a majority upon such Committees, have upon every such occasion prevailed to have evidence reported to the House without comment or opinion, happy thereby to elude for the time any further Parliamentary action, it being impossible for Parliament, unaided by a Committee's Report, to give a full consideration to the subject without wading through blue-books of undigested evidence. By such adroit, but not very honest policy, has the Irish system of National Education been preserved through every ordeal of Parliamentary inquiry; and every objection to it, however well-founded, every endeavour to have it so modified as to render it conducive to the intellectual improvement and moral elevation of the Irish population, have been rendered alike unavailing. Even the secession from the Education Board of the Archbishop of Dublin, and those two eminent Irish Judges, Mr. Blackburne and Baron Greene—the causes of whose retirement were among the circumstances that led to the last Committee of Inquiry by your Lordships—was unproductive of any change. The loss of these three, the most respectable of the Commissioners, was apparently considered by the Government as a lesser evil than the inconvenience they might be put to in attempting the correction of the abuses complained of. They probably felt that the education system had been originally framed in 1832 with the avowed object of obtaining the utmost support from the Roman Catholic Clergy; that the principle of the Church of Rome regarding the reading of the sacred volume had, in that view, been adopted as the fundamental rule of the system, and that the Protestant Clergy had thus been compelled to separate from the state in the work of education, and that it was, therefore of comparatively little importance whether the Commissioners I have referred to, respectable as they were, were also compelled to separate from the board, or whether the interpretation they objected to of a particular rule regarding books of general instruction were adhered to or not, after the authoritative exclusion of the Bible from every schoolroom open for united education. But the Government, having in the outset, in order to obtain the support of the Roman Catholic Clergy, thrown over the co-operation of the Clergy of the Established Church, and since forfeited the confidence of a section of the Protestant laity, represented by the seceding members of the Commission, your Lordships will learn with surprise, from the correspondence I am about to move for, that the principle of the National system is now declared to be not even acceptable to the Roman Catholic body; that it is, in fact, repudiated by the hierarchy of that very Church whose good-will and co-operation has been so eagerly courted and sought to be propitiated by the sacrifice of Protestant interests and Protestant principle; so that instead of support the Government are henceforth to look for opposition from the Church of Rome to their plan of united education. Surely, my Lords, the present is an occasion on which the whole subject ought to be carefully reconsidered; yet it is said that no change whatever is to be made. I trust that no such determination has been come to; for I would ask, where can you now look for support? Do you expect to receive it from the resident gentry and landowners of Ireland? The friends of the Board among them are either very few or very little disposed to give you any assistance. Judging of their zeal by the amount of their pecuniary subscriptions, it is very small indeed. Referring your Lordships to the latest Report, that for the year of 1858, of the Education Commissioners, you will find that even while the Roman Catholic Church was supposed to be in cordial alliance with the Government on the Education Question, the whole amount of local subscription over the entire of Ireland was only between £10,000 and £11,000, not much more than 8*d.* in the pound, or one-thirtieth part of the expenditure on National education, and less than one-tenth part of the amount annually subscribed and applied through other agencies for the purposes of education upon religious principles without any aid or encouragement whatever from the Government. Do you look to a cordial and grateful acceptance of your schools by the poor? This I admit, would be a very justifiable course. If popular the schools would probably be efficient, but are they either one or the other? Your Lordships, glancing at the first pages of the Report of the Commissioners that I have already referred to, would probably be impressed with the belief that the National system was extremely popular, for you would find that the number of the National school pupils had from the beginning been constantly increasing, until in 1858 it reached to as many as 803,610; but those figures, which abstractedly considered would make Ireland appear in a fair way of becoming the most educated of nations, I am sorry to say can in no degree be relied on. Let me refer your Lordships to impartial and, therefore, more trustworthy evidence. Your Lordships will find by the Census Report on ages and education, presented to Parliament in 1856, that the total of the Irish population of all classes, between the ages of five and sixteen, was 1,870,988, and that of these the whole number that attended schools was less than 25 per cent, or 460,595, a number not much more than half of what the Commissioners Report as National school pupils, but from which should be deducted not only the children of the upper and middle classes, but also such of the children of the poor as are educated by the Church Education Society, the Christian Brothers, and other charitable institutions; so that the whole number of those that attend the National schools would, probably, be considerably under one-third of that reported to your Lordships as National school pupils. Where, then, did the Commissioners find data for reporting their number as amounting to 803,610? Two-thirds of them at least must have been of the same substance as Falstaff's men-in-buckram. The Census Commissioners are very particular in their enumeration, and give an exact Return not only of those that attend schools, but of those that attend no schools, which they set down as 1,410,397, or more than 75 per cent. Now, contrast this with the Education Return for England of the same year, and we find that of 4,005,716 children from five to fifteen years of age, 2,144,378, or considerably more than half, are school pupils. Hence it ap-

The Earl of Shaftesbury

years that in Ireland the proportion of children that attend schools is less than half what it is in England. Which, then, my Lords is the more popular system of education? That which, as in Ireland, attempts to enforce a united education, or that which, as in England, aids and encourages denominational schools, leaving it at the option of parents to choose where they will have their children instructed? I think it cannot with any truth be affirmed, that the present system of education in Ireland is generally acceptable to the poor. Nor do its results afford any more encouraging view of its merits, for, although very much has been done by private effort and by charitable associations, apart from the National Board, for the furtherance of education among the poorer classes, there appears by the last census to have been a very small advance in the course of the previous ten years—and in the county of Londonderry, and in several large towns, an actual increase in the proportion of illiterate persons in 1851, as compared with 1841. Why is this? The obvious inference is, that the system of education is not suited to the requirements of the country. Her Majesty's Government are now, from the correspondence in their possession, fully aware that the Roman Catholic clergy, the patrons, I believe, of four-fifths of the schools upon whose co-operation they mainly relied, do not approve, and consequently cannot be expected to use their influence in giving effect to a system of education that they only accepted as a lesser evil in their eyes than the Scriptural system of education previously in operation. There is, therefore, a necessity, and the opportunity is favourable, for reconsidering the whole subject. The production of the correspondence I have referred to, I trust, may bring attention to it, and that steps may at length be taken to place the education of the poor in Ireland upon a footing of efficiency, deriving from the clergy of different religious denominations the utmost co-operation in the work upon principles that they can conscientiously approve of. The answer said to have been returned by Mr. Secretary Cardwell to the first letter of the Roman Catholic bishops I have not seen, but a portion of it referred to in the reply of the bishops is very important. They say,—

“ Examining your letter we are happy to find that you lay down, and fully admit, on the part of Government, principles of great importance, in which we cheerfully concur. You distinctly admit—1st, The paramount importance of religious education. 2ndly, The necessity of granting in the circumstances of this country, separate religious training to the children of each religious denomination; and 3rdly, The right of the heads of each Church in regard to the religious education of those of their own communion.”

The Earl of Clancarty

Now, these principles, although the third is somewhat ambiguously worded, would not, I think, be generally disapproved of. They are, however, very ably commented upon by the Roman Catholic bishops, who show conclusively how much they are at variance with the regulations and practice of the National Board. I am very far from desiring to see carried out all the requirements of those bishops, or from admitting the amount of ecclesiastical authority they claim in the conduct and management of the education of the people, their right to which they consider Mr. Cardwell's letter fully to recognize; but the example of England abundantly proves how much more successful for every purpose of intellectual advancement, and for the training up of children in the principles of the religion in which their parents desire to have them educated, is a system that admits of the establishment of denominational schools, than the idle attempt, involving waste of public money, to coerce the people into the adoption of united education, upon a principle so much objected to and so difficult of application as that upon which the system of National education is founded. I beg my Lords, to move

“ That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

“ 1. Copy of any Address in 1859 from the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland regarding the System of National Education in that Part of the United Kingdom, with the Names thereto subscribed.

“ 2. Copy of the Answer returned by the Lord Lieutenant.

“ 3. Copy of any Reply thereto from the said Roman Catholic Bishops.”

THE EARL OF CORK said, that the noble Earl had introduced what might be called his annual Motion on the subject of National Education in Ireland, although he had introduced it at an earlier period than usual this year. The noble Earl contended that great responsibility rested upon those who supported the present system; but he was inclined to think the great responsibility rested on those who, like the noble Earl, had for many years opposed the system. He had listened in vain for any new arguments in support of the noble Earl's views. He indeed asserted that it had not answered the objects of its founders; but before he asked the Government to abolish the existing system he ought to have been prepared with some policy as a substitute. Although the noble Earl had frequently brought the subject before their Lordships, and had made a plentiful appeal to statistics, yet he had never been able to prove that the system of National education had not been generally supported by the laity of Ireland. On the contrary, on the late election for the county to which he (the Earl of Cork) belonged, the clergy appealed to the feelings of the people on the question of National education, and the people bravely responded to that appeal by coming forward to support the Government system. There had been a steady increase in the number of children attending the schools from the very foundation of the system, and he might state that out of 85,250 children in the schools in the county of Cork, 82,000 were Roman Catholics. He admitted that the system had materially altered since its first establishment, and he could fairly say that he wished the rules originally laid down had been more strictly adhered to; but circumstances might have induced the Commissioners to make changes in the system. What was the present opinion of Archbishop Whately? In a recent charge to his clergy the Archbishop said perhaps it might be thought that, having retired from the Commission, his views had changed, and that he could not conscientiously support the present system of National education. Such however, was not the case, for if the system had always been administered as it was now conducted he should still have been a Commissioner. The noble Earl had referred to the pastoral of the Roman Catholic Bishops; but their opposition was based on an entirely different principle from that of the noble Earl; they did not pretend to say that the system had not done good, or that it had not conferred benefits on the people of that country; but their objections were made to the mode in which the system was carried out, as they alleged that it was unfairly used for the purpose of making proselytes. Whether the system had worked as well as had been expected was a question for Her Majesty's Government; but since the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) in introducing the National system had largely calculated on the support of the landed proprietors and gentry of Ireland, he (the Earl of Cork) as one of those—he was sorry to say, few—landowners who had supported the system from the commencement, was unable to remain silent when the subject was brought under the notice of their Lordships.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL said, that as regarded the memorial of the Roman Catholic Bishops, he, on behalf of the great mass of the clergy of Ireland with whom he had been associated in opposition, on conscientious grounds, to the National Board, rose to express their heartfelt thanks to Her Majesty's Government that they were not disposed in the slightest degree to accept the proposition made by the Roman Catholic Archbishop and Bishops; for they put forward their claim or demand in the matter as though they had a right divine to take into their hands the education of the people, and argued as though no one had a right to oppose them in the matter. They put an interpretation on the words, "Go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and the Holy Ghost, and teaching them all that I have commanded you," that was unjustifiable and wrong; and taking this text for their motto, the Roman Catholic clergy contended that they had a sort of prescriptive or divine right to superintend and control the education of the people. But the Church of England, on the contrary, utterly denied that that text of Scripture gave the Roman Catholic or any other Church, or any body of ecclesiastics, any special control over the education of the laity. While they contended, however, that they had no power of this kind, they held that it was, on the other hand, the bounden duty of every Christian minister to put into the hands of every one, and especially the children of their flock, that Word of God in which was written all that He had commanded. The principle of the Church Education Society is that they are bound to teach all committed to their care on Scriptural principles. They considered that the present Government had every right to object to the proposal of the Roman Catholic system, and more particularly so if it was shown that they were not well qualified to exercise the right to which they laid claim. The experience we already possessed of the educational system of the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland did not tend to show that they were the persons best qualified to take up the question of education as a matter of right; and the present state proportion of children in

 ; not to have been more
 . Mr. Sheridan said
 of this was to be attri-method and judgment on her, and the absence of trusting the junior chil-ice, 1,400 were returned ng; but he found that r 1,000 were capable of
 and with ease and free-portion only being able ese were the statements
 le to the system, but of Another important suject was the Report of
 of the Census, from the i in whose Reports and
 d that in the principal been a falling-off in the since 1841, as regarded but of 32 counties only iminution as regarded ot read nor write. Yet tional schools in those sed from 1,505 to 2,971
 tween 1841 and 1851.
 s say that as regarded illiterate, they were not rgely among those who older terms of life as
 r and earlier, that is,
 under the care of the
 ; regarded the superin-
 the managers of these ely nominal, and could ed as efficient: occuuties, the clergy exer-
 al superintendence, the being Roman Catholic
 he head Inspectors reae vigilance on the part
 a better class of men
 ; teachers, but the re-
 was not exercised. It efore, that, looking at nditure that had taken een a great failure in m of education in Ire-
 d that the Government
 rule which prevented a
 the clergy of the Esta-om taking part in the
 . It had been stated
 p of Armagh had issued subject, and he was an m the whole Church
 y great respect and at-advice given was not
 s of their consciences.

Attorney General for Ireland had called a great meeting of Roman Catholics in Cork, at which there were fifty-five Archbishops and Bishops, and priests of the Roman Catholic Church. That meeting was opposed to mixed education; but the right hon. Gentleman, who became connected with the Government, took the other side of the question of education, because the Government did not like the Ultramontane system.

The consequence was that an opinion was got up by the priests to his Majesty's Ministers, but a great number of Protestant electors supported him. On that occasion, read a lecture to the Ultramontanists, saying that it would be better for them to retire from the field, and follow the example of the clergy of the Established Church, who had, he said, unflinchingly surrendered their arms and retired from the contest in consequence of the better of the Protestant Primate. That, however, was not the fact, for they had not surrendered their arms, but were only rather to cry, "No surrender;" and hoped and trusted that Protestants would rally round them, and give their support even to a greater extent than they had done before. Indeed, they had never made such large contributions as since the annual meeting of the Church Education Society. The question at issue was one of principle, and the Established Church, while far from being willing to enter in a confederacy with the Roman Catholic Church to upset the National Board, would never lay down their arms until the system of National education in Ireland was placed upon a sound footing.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE: My Lords, I do not propose to enter into the general question of the duty of supporting the system of National Education in Ireland, because that question, which is as important and momentous as any that could be raised, should be brought forward, if at all, in some more distinct and specific shape. The opinions of Her Majesty's Government upon that subject, and upon the present position of the question in Ireland, are clearly and fully stated in one of the papers which have been moved for by the noble Earl opposite—a paper written by a right hon. Gentleman in the other House, with whom I have the pleasure of sitting as a colleague, as a reply to the last letter of the Roman Catholic prelates. The noble Earl who introduced the question to-night has asked whether it is really true that the Government mean to introduce no change into the system of National education in Ireland. My reply is that it is the firm intention of Her Majesty's Government, whether in England or in Ireland, to adhere to the principles upon which they have uniformly acted with respect to the system of National education in Ireland. For myself, I may say that, by reason of my long—though not unbroken—connection with Ireland, I have always felt a warm interest in this important subject. Those principles, as I understand and entertain them, are to give the advantages of as good a secular education as can be procured to all, who are willing to receive it—to give to all opportunities and facilities for specific religious instruction, without making religious instruction compulsory on any. We feel that instruction in religion—instruction upon those duties which should regulate the conduct of persons in life, and inspire hopes for hereafter—is of too high, important, and paramount a nature to be imparted except by the full consent and authority of the parent. The noble Earl has himself stated—and it is patent to all—that in upholding these principles we have often found ourselves with great regret bound to oppose the views entertained by excellent and eminent prelates of the Established Church; and of late it is equally notorious that we have felt ourselves equally called upon to act in opposition to the unanimously expressed opinions of the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church. Our adherence to the leading principles of the National system of education in Ireland we hope to continue unimpaired; but if at any time, from any quarter, from one side or another, there should be laid before us any propositions for practical improvements or any objections to existing practices, we should, so far as they might not be inconsistent with the principles I have stated, be always willing to give them a fair and candid consideration. If we found them trench upon the principles vital to the present system we should decline to entertain them. At all events no such change would be introduced without it being first communicated to Parliament. The noble Earl who made this Motion stated that the system of the National Board, which he has consistently opposed, has survived every inquiry and every attack. Surely that fact raises some presumption that it is founded upon principles which have inherent truth and authority in them.

M

constantly receiving important rom among the clergy of the Church. I have little more n the present position of the cept that I wish the noble ave included in the papers for has moved—although I do not e could have done so—the t was written by the Lord Priland to the clergy of his dio-
 not know that I am justified
 it directly under the notice of hips, but, as the question of ucation has been mooted, I can-from expressing my deep satis-
 that excellent Prelate, before and distant be the day when so—before he finally closes his st the respect and love of all watched its long continuance,
 abled to bequeath to the Church
 as upheld and adorned such a ace, wisdom, and charity.

LIFORD said, he believed stem of national education, as ntroduced into Ireland by the
 (the Earl of Derby) was as tem, both as regarded secular is education, as could possibly and he knew that where that had fair play it had proved uccessful. This fair play, how-sen very seldom obtained. The oncessions made had induced nd prelates of the Roman Cach to think that they might more. First, the "Scripture had been withdrawn in a great
 m the schools, and, in the next Evidences of Christianity," by hop of Dublin, had been omit-then, national schools, which stablished adjoining nunneries Catholic chapels were allowed
 e distinctive services or pore Roman Catholic service read whilst a Protestant proprietor owed—as had happened in his
 to have the Protestant service
 ial school-house on a Sunday,
 e that day it was used for no purposes. There were many e of complaint. A continual een made to remove the schools Protestant proprietors, and to uestant schoolmasters, and re-
 with Roman Catholics. A ceraster was charged with writing
 notices for the Ribbon Society,
 eased on bail for six months, and during those six months he continued to hold the office of national schoolmaster. There was a noble Earl (the Earl of Arran) who took a deep interest in the prosperity of Ireland, and he had one of the most excellent National schools under his management. He was, however, continually tormented with reports of the district Inspector. He (Viscount Lifford) visited the school, and found it one of the best that he had seen; and almost all the neighbouring clergy, though opposed to the National system, reported in its favour, and one of them said that this school was of so high a character as to be considered as a kind of university, for any young man who passed through that school took a higher standing than he could procure from any other. The same Inspector, who continued in his office the schoolmaster charged, and justly charged, with Ribbonism, brought a most unfounded charge against Lord Arran's schoolmaster, and unless the parties had been threatened with indictment for conspiracy, he would have been removed. Twenty-two years ago he himself established a national school in a very wild part of Ireland, and for sixteen years that school was very successful, having a good attendance:—more than nine-tenths of the children being Roman Catholics, but no Roman Catholic parent made any objection. After sixteen years, however, the National Board set up an opposition school adjoining a Roman Catholic chapel, and managed by Roman Catholic priests, and of course all the Roman Catholic children were withdrawn from his school. He had received a letter from the Board, stating that the school about which he inquired was not a Roman Catholic one. This was a quibble. By a rule of the Board no school was taken under its charge for six months after it was built. The six months had not expired in the case to which he referred, but it did expire in a very short time after the correspondence, and the school was opened as a National school. He then asked leave to remove his school into another district, but the Commissioners refused him permission to do so on the ground that the proposed school would be too near two other National schools, the priest's school being a full quarter of a mile nearer to both. In a conversation he had had with a Roman Catholic Inspector of National schools, that gentleman expressed his pleasure at the success of the system, because it was depriving the priest of his influence. He (Viscount Lifford) said that, although a Protestant, he was sorry for it, because, though it was destroying the influence of the priest, it was supplying an influence that was no better. Their Lordships had, perhaps, read accounts stating that no less than a million of Roman Catholics in America had abandoned that religion. He feared there was not much cause for satisfaction in the circumstance, because he believed that most of them had either joined some of the objectionable sects that existed in that country or become infidels. There could be no doubt that the present state of things as regarded the working of the system of National education in Ireland was unsatisfactory. He wished to know who was responsible for disallowing the reading of the little book on the Evidences of Christianity, written by the Archbishop of Dublin. He could not sympathize with those who opposed the National system on religious grounds. He did not think it was a Christian duty to refuse secular education to children whose parents dissented from the religious instruction given in a school. He rejoiced to hear the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland say that the Government had no intention to change the system. He believed the position of the Government on this subject was a strong one. Although there were undoubted defects in many of the schools, still the people of Ireland had tasted the benefits of education, and would look for those benefits where they could be best obtained. But he begged the Government to consider on the one hand whether the repugnance of the party represented by the noble Earl near him to the National system, and, on the other, whether the unreasonable demands of the Prelates of Ireland had not been caused by the unjust concessions which the Commissioners had continually made to the Roman Catholic body.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, that as one of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, he wished to offer a few observations to their Lordships. Not having expected that the noble Earl who had brought this subject forward would make the remarks he had done upon the statistics of the Board, he was not now prepared, as he otherwise would have been, to meet him on that ground. He had been given to understand that the noble Earl merely wished to obtain the documents mentioned in his Motion. As a member of the Board, however, who had had the greatest experience of the working of the system and of the operations of the Board, he desired to bear his testimony both to the progress and the utility of the National system. He could assure the noble Earl who represented that a fair statement had not been given of the condition and operation of the establishment, that, having attended the meetings of the Board and taken part in its proceedings with his colleagues, he had never seen anything done that was justly open to objection. He had never seen anything like an attempt at collusion. When cases were brought before the Board they were always decided by persons of the greatest respectability and integrity. When it was said that the rules of the National Board prevented the putting of the Scriptures into the hands of the young, he entirely repudiated such a statement. He would refer to the rules and regulations of the Board to bear him out in his statement. No candid man could read the rules and regulations of the Board, especially those connected with the secular and religious instruction imparted to the children, without being impressed with the conviction that if he honestly carried out the National system as it was there propounded, he would have perfect liberty to place the Scriptures in all their integrity in the hands of his own children. Whether the schools were vested or non-vested, there was an opportunity of giving religious instruction in them. In the case of the vested schools, whose fault was it that the Protestant portion of the community had not the Scriptures put into their hands? He was sorry to say so, but it must rest with the clergyman of the parish. In the case of a non-vested school, the patron might be a Roman Catholic, and he might prescribe a particular time for religious instruction; but, if the clergyman of the parish did his duty, the child had an opportunity at that time of receiving religious instruction from his own pastor. Certainly it was not permitted to the clergyman—and God forbid that it ever should be!—to violate the sacred rights of conscience. It was not permitted to him to trample on parental rights or parental authority; but the system gave to all the power of carrying into full and free effect the Divine maxim of doing to others as they would have others do to them. One might imagine from the statements that had been made by some of the opponents of the system that it was an institution rather for deteriorating than promoting the education of the young; but had the reports been fairly quoted it would have been seen that the good greatly preponderated over the evil, while the defects indicated were only those that must, more or less, attach to every system of National education. As an evidence of the progress made by the system in public estimation, he would only appeal to the number of right rev. Prelates who were now its friends and advocates. When he became a bishop of the Established Church only three of the Irish Prelates were found to support the National system; now the tables were happily turned, and it had enlisted on its side a preponderance of the episcopal body. But he did not rest there. He had the satisfaction of informing their Lordships that there had lately been instituted an inquiry in the dioceses of Derry and Raphoe as to the number of the clergy who had subscribed the fundamental rules of the National Board. It was conducted by his own archdeacon, and the subject was fairly canvassed among them. The result was that two-thirds of his clergy had given in their adherence to the principle on which the system was founded. He could not sit down without paying a tribute of respect to the Metropolitan under whom it was his honour and happiness to act. If there was anything in his public life that afforded him greater satisfaction than another it was the noble Letter which had lately emanated entirely and solely from the mind of that distinguished Prelate, recommending that course of candour, tolerance, and forbearance upon this subject which he hoped the clergy generally would follow. Though he did not advocate the National system of education merely on the ground of its success as a mixed system of education, he was happy to say that he held in his hand a document which proved that, wherever the clergy were disposed to act according to the rules of the institution they might have schools quietly and harmoniously carried on with a due mixture of the three denominations of Christians—Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and persons belonging to the Established Church. Within a comparatively small district in the diocese of Derry there were schools containing 623 Protestants of the Established Church, 1,569 Presbyterians, and 4,497 Roman Catholics, who were all receiving, he trusted, a salutary education, and living in love and peace one with another.

The Bishop of Derry

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he would not long detain their Lordships

although he had the misfortune of differing from almost every right rev. Prelate and noble Lord who had preceded him. He differed with all of them in some respect, though there was much of what had been said to their Lordships in which he fully concurred. The present position of the National system was not a happy one. The system was in theory one under which there should be an united education given to children of all religious persuasions, and in which the influence of no religious sect should preponderate over another; but what was it in practice? 3,000 out of the 5,000 National schools in Ireland were under the patronage of the Roman Catholic priests, and the great body of the clergy of the Established Church stood aloof from the system. The amount of really united education communicated to the people was almost entirely restricted to the schools under the management of the Commissioners themselves. Any man who knew Ireland knew that the people of that country, no matter what the faith they professed, professed it warmly, ardently, and there were not to be found in Ireland those cold-hearted men who were devoid of all spirit of proselytism. If Ireland was searched throughout there would not be found in it a sufficient number of men of that stamp to carry out the National system; yet it had been expected that the system would be worked by such men; and they were looked for even in the ranks of the clergy. He thought the Government was quite right in refusing the demands of the Roman Catholic prelates; but he was of that opinion for a different reason than that which had influenced the Government. His opinion was that the Government ought to require of these prelates a test of the sincerity of the opinions which they had put forward in their document. These prelates and their clergy were in receipt of a very comfortable sum of public money for the payment of the expenses of the 3,300 schools under their control; but on looking over the list of contributors he found that the amount of local support given to these schools was very trifling indeed. For the whole county of Clare only £27 was subscribed, of which £10 was subscribed by a Protestant lady. Though the Roman Catholic bishops had so great an objection to the system, the Government acted very liberally towards them, and they seemed to take advantage of its generosity. Now, he should like to see them give a proof of the sincerity of those objections by refusing money for the maintenance of schools; but until they did that, he should certainly refuse to yield to those objections. He did not know whether the clergy of the Established Church had it in contemplation to accept the invitation of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and suggest to him plans for the improvement of the system which should not attack its principles, which he (the Earl of Carlisle) wished to be carried out; but he (the Earl of Donoughmore); though he was and always had been an opponent of the National system, would venture to make a suggestion on the subject. By a rule of the Board no aid was given to any school in which the number of scholars was less than twenty-five. He would suggest that this rule might be advantageously relaxed. The Protestants were not numerous in the rural districts of some parts of Ireland; and in some of the schools the Protestant clergyman had less than twenty-five scholars. If he applied to the Commissioners of National Education for aid he was refused it, and he would no doubt be reminded of the rule with regard to the minimum of scholars, and would probably be told that in the neighbouring chapel-yard there was a National school to which he was recommended to send the children under his care, whom he might take home with him at certain times, in order to give them religious instruction. This school was probably taught by a Roman Catholic, and was under the patronage of a Roman Catholic Prelate. Now, although there might be some few clergymen of the Established Church who would accept aid from the Commissioners, there was not one of them who would recommend his parishioners to send their children to a school held in a chapel-yard, under the patronage of a Roman Catholic priest, and taught by a Roman Catholic schoolmaster. One other point he wished briefly to advert to, though with some degree of pain. He had the greatest possible respect for the character of the venerable Primate who presided over the Irish Church, and no one could entertain a higher opinion of his long and valuable services; but he must say he could not understand why such stress and such importance should be placed upon the letter to which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the right rev. Prelate had alluded. What did that letter say? Why, it merely said that if a clergyman or proprietor was not placed in a position to obtain a good secular education for the children under his charge, if he could not obtain the necessary funds for the support of his school, in that case, if he had no conscientious objections to such a course, he would advise him to place his schools under the National Board. Did the venerable Primate state any grounds of objection to the system itself? Nothing of the sort. On the contrary, as it was stated in the course of this debate by the right rev. Prelate, the venerable Dignitary, at a meeting of the Church Education Society, declared himself a sincere and cordial supporter of the system established. The letter of the venerable Primate struck him as if it said to a rich man who had the means of supporting a school and of paying a good salary to the master, "Oh, you are rich, and can afford to maintain your own principles; it is not therefore necessary that you should go to the National Board;" but to the poor man, who possessed not those advantages, the language of the letter was, "You have not the money to support your school, and to maintain your principles therein. You had better surrender your independence of action. Take my advice, then; connect your school with the National system, and obtain a share of the grant." He (the Earl of Donoughmore) should, however, act upon his own convictions. He had the means of maintaining his own schools without troubling the Commissioners. He was in the midst of a large Roman Catholic population, and the schools there were under the system of the Church Education Society. If he were to join the National Board to-morrow, he might save £30 or £40 a year; but he should be sacrificing his convictions without gaining one scholar or improving the means of education. Therefore, as far as he was concerned, the recommendation of the right rev. Prelate was without any force. Nothing had occurred to alter the grounds upon which he had always maintained those schools, and he should still continue to maintain the principles of the Church Education Society. If the right rev. Prelate thought he could conscientiously join the National Society, and could render himself more useful in doing so, he was quite right in adopting such a course; but whilst giving to others the most perfect liberty of conscience, he should claim the same for himself in being allowed to act according to his sincere convictions.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, the noble Earl who followed his noble Friend, who moved for those Returns, taunted him with wishing to overthrow the National system without proposing any better system in its place; for his own part, however, he had no wish to see the system overthrown, but he did wish to see some slight modifications made in some of the rules, which operated against the teaching of the Bible in the schools throughout the country. It was a question upon which the clergy of Ireland were much divided in opinion. Some time ago he took the opportunity of conferring with certain clergymen as to what modifications of the rules could be made, which would have the effect of removing these objections and of inducing them to join the National Board. He was informed that if the rule regarding the time for communicating religious instruction in those schools was so far modified as to leave it optional to the patrons of schools to determine when and where the Scriptures should be read, or whether they should not be read at all, their objections to the system would be very much diminished. As to the letter of the Lord Primate which had been alluded to, he concurred in the observations which had fallen from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In the diocese of Armagh there were many Dissenters, Presbyterians and Methodists, who were wealthy, and able to give their children the best education that could be procured. There was no doubt if the clergy could produce first-rate schools those children would be sent to them; but if the clergy could not do so, why in that case they ought to obtain the assistance of the National Board, and wait patiently until they could obtain those modifications which they so much desired.

The Earl of Donoughmore

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said a few words in reply.

Motion agreed to. Returns ordered.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, who had given notice of his intention to ask, Whether the European Powers, who, in 1815, guaranteed the neutrality of certain provinces of Savoy, which had now been transferred from Sardinia to France, had agreed to meet in Congress in order to deliberate on that transfer; also, whether Her Majesty's Ministers would communicate to Parliament the basis on which the contemplated Conferences were to be opened; said, he would not, at that hour of the evening, make the observations which he had thought were very well called for by the present position of foreign affairs. He would only ask his noble Friend who represented the Foreign Office in that House the first question on the notice paper, with regard to the assembling of Conferences upon the transactions which had recently taken place in the North of Italy and Savoy. An answer was lately reported as given by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the other House of Parliament, who said that it was proposed there should be a Conference of several of the Powers of Europe on this subject. He now wished to know from his noble Friend whether the Conference had simply been proposed, and the answers to that proposal had not yet been given by the Powers to whom it was addressed, or whether they were to understand that the holding of such Conferences had been agreed to by all the Powers. On the other matters of which he had given notice, he would postpone his questions to that day week.

LORD WODEHOUSE: The answer I have to give to the noble Marquess is that he has correctly understood what was recently said in "another place" by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Conference proposed for the consideration of the cession of Savoy has been proposed, but is not yet finally agreed on; and the question is not yet definitively settled as to whether that Conference shall meet, or when or where.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, April 30, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to make a suggestion to the House with reference to the course of public business. The existing rule is that the public business should not commence till half-past four o'clock, in order to allow time for the disposal of private business and of business not connected with the business of the evening; but I understand from you, Sir, and indeed what has passed this evening confirms your statement, that there is very little private business before the House, and that whatever there is may be disposed of before a quarter-past four. I would therefore suggest for the consideration of the House whether it might not be advantageous to-morrow, and from that time forward, to begin the public business at a quarter past instead of half-past four, unless the private business should go beyond that hour. The saving of a quarter of an hour at so early a period of the evening would probably be of more advantage than the gaining of half-an-hour after midnight.

MR. DISRAELI: I think, Sir, there is no objection to the suggestion of the noble Lord, which on the whole will be convenient in the present state of public business; but it ought to be understood that the public business will not commence at a quarter past four unless Ministers are in their places to answer any questions that may be put.

THE SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the frequent appearance of the Savings Bank Bill on the Paper, without any apparent chance of its being proceeded with, had caused considerable inconvenience to several hon. Members. He would, therefore, suggest that it would be better to postpone the Committee on the Bill till after Whitsuntide, when a day might be fixed on which it would be certain to come on.

MR. LAING said, that in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could not enter into the engagement suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Estcourt), but he would undertake that the Committee on the Bill would not be taken before that day fortnight.

DOCKYARDS.—THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (LORD PROBY) appeared at the Bar, and reported Her Majesty's gracious Answer to the Address on this subject:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the system of control and management of My Dockyards, the purchase of materials and stores, the cost of building, repairing, altering, fitting, and refitting My Ships, and the best mode of keeping the Accounts thereof:

And I have directed that a Royal Commission shall issue for the purpose which you have requested.

RAILWAY COMPANIES.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMPSON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether coupons issued by Railway Companies for the payment of their debenture interest are rendered liable to the Stamp Duty of one penny by the new Stamp Act; or whether, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the wording of that Act carries out the assurance given to this House by him, on the 26th of March last, namely, that “the Resolution would not in the slightest degree affect the question raised with regard to the liability of coupons or dividend warrants to pay the penny tax, and that when the Bill was drawn, the form of the clause would make this clear”?

MR. LAING replied that it certainly was not the intention of the Government to impose any new liability with regard to coupons issued by Railway Companies. He was distinctly informed by the Solicitor to the Inland Revenue that, in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, the Resolution did not contain any such liability. It could only be enforced by the Inland Revenue, and he thought that a sufficient assurance that no change would be made in the law as it at present existed.

THE NEW BRONZE COINAGE.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when the new Bronze Coinage will be issued?

MR. LAING said, he was informed that the non-issue of the new bronze coinage was owing to the delay in completing the dies. The penny die, however, was now ready; the halfpenny die would not be ready for another three weeks; and he anticipated that in about two months from the present time this coinage would be issued.

BOATS IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ALCOCK said, he wished to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether he will have any objection to allow a certain number of Thames Watermen to have Boats on the Serpentine and other Waters in the Royal Parks during the summer months?

MR. COWPER said, the condition required of persons who wished to ply with boats on the Serpentine was, that they should have a licence, which was given to secure good management and boats in proper order, and boatmen capable of managing them. The ornamental water in Victoria Park was not well fitted for boating. It was so shallow that boats would stir up the mud, and would probably make the water disagreeable, which was not at present offensive; it was not so well adapted for the purpose as the Serpentine.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

QUESTION.

In reply to SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE,

MR. LAING said, that in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Government did not intend to proceed with any of the financial measures except the Report on the Customs Bill, to which no opposition was anticipated.

THE GREAT BELL OF WESTMINSTER.

QUESTION.

MR. HARDY said, he wished to inquire, Whether an analysis of the Bell has been made, and if the material has been pronounced too brittle for the purposes for which it is intended?

MR. COWPER said, that Dr. Percy had made a Report, which had not yet been presented to Parliament, stating that he had analysed two portions of the Bell, but that he did not consider his analysis sufficiently conclusive to give a definite judgment on the chemical composition of the bell generally. The portions analysed by Dr. Percy were taken only from the external beading, or sound bow. When Dr. Percy had completed his investigations, the Report would be laid upon the table.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. FIFTH NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March], “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had heard from both sides of the House a great many able speeches on this subject; and it was natural that, after listening to those speeches, he should have attended with deep interest to the observations of the noble Lord who had introduced that measure to Parliament; because he had anticipated that the noble Lord would be able in the course of his speech to adduce some more consistent reasons and some better grounds for having introduced a measure which he himself very truly said had been severely criticised by both sides of the House. But, having listened attentively to the noble Lord's speech, he must say that it appeared to him to be rather apologetic than argumentative in its tone. The noble Lord appeared to be apologising for the Bill throughout his whole speech; and so far as he (Mr. Bentinck) had been able to judge, his apologies had not met with a very gracious reception. He could not help being struck with some observations of the noble Lord to which he should now beg to call the attention of the House. The noble Lord assured them that they were entering on a discussion of this measure at a time when there was no agitation on the subject of Reform. He (Mr. Bentinck) thought he should be able to show the House that the noble Lord's only reason for introducing the crude and ill-conceived measure now before them had arisen from his own political position and his own political necessities. He was now referring to the whole connection of the noble Lord with the subject of Reform; and he thought he should be able to show the House that the political necessities of the noble Lord had been the sole cause of the introduction of his present Reform Bill. The noble Lord, in alluding to some matters brought under the notice of the House on a previous evening by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James), said that the statistical blunders of the hon. and learned Gentleman were perfectly ridiculous. That was not a very gracious remark; but since the noble Lord had adopted that tone in speaking of the observations of hon. Members of that House, he should like to ask the noble Lord, who was so well versed in the history of his country, whether, in the diplomatic records of Great Britain, there might not be found some errors that would come under that denomination? He (Mr.

Bentinck) differed very much from the views taken by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone on political subjects; but the hon. and learned Gentleman had this advantage over the noble Lord, that he had dealt with this question in a straightforward manner, and had fairly told the House what his objections to the measure were. He was so much struck with his frankness on the occasion that he was very much disposed to think that the production of a Reform Bill and the conduct of the Foreign Affairs of the country might be safer in the hands of the hon. and learned Gentleman than in those of the noble Lord; and no injury would be likely to accrue to any one in the event of such a transfer, for the distinguished gallantry which characterized the noble Lord would, in case of necessity, prompt him to undertake the multifarious professional duties which were now discharged by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There was one remark, however, of the hon. and learned Gentleman which savoured of the modest assurance which was acquired in that learned profession of which the hon. Gentleman was so distinguished a Member. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of a gentleman (Mr. Croker) who had taken a leading part in the debates on the Bill of 1832, as one who had never "breathed the free atmosphere of a Liberal constituency." Had the hon. and learned Gentleman allowed Gloucester and Wakefield and other boroughs to escape from his mind's eye when he was making that remark? The hon. and learned Gentleman had, however, been more correct in his criticism of the statistics put forth by the Government as the basis of their scheme. The hon. and learned Gentleman had in the course of his speech referred to the great errors which he said existed in the statistical Returns furnished to the Government from the borough of Ashton; and he (Mr. Bentinck) understood his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. M. Gibson), who represented that borough, to deny the statement, and to maintain the accuracy of those statistics. As there was such a considerable discrepancy between the two statements, he (Mr. Bentinck) had since taken some pains to ascertain what was the real state of the case, and the conclusion at which he had been able to arrive was, that the hon. and learned Gentleman was entirely accurate, and his right hon. Friend entirely wrong, there being an error of about 2,000 voters in the Government

[Fifth Night.]

Returns. He had had put into his hands a statement on the subject of the Government statistics, which he would ask the permission of the House to read. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had defended those statistics, and quoted the town of Rochdale, with which he was connected, in corroboration of their correctness. He (Mr. Bentinck) held in his hand a letter from a gentleman in that town named Peter Johnson, who was no doubt known to the hon. Member. The writer requested that the information which he communicated might be put into the hands of some hon. Member. It had been given to him, and he asked the attention of the House while he read the letter.—Mr. Johnson said, “Mr. Bright is reported to have said in the House of Commons”—

MR. SPEAKER said, it was not in order to read anything which referred to a debate which had taken place in the House.

MR. BENTINCK would suppose then that some hon. Gentleman had made a statement, with respect to the borough of Rochdale, and that some gentleman in Rochdale had thought proper to answer it. He would further suppose that the gentleman so answering it had used words to this effect: “The Member in the House who adverted to this subject is represented to have said that he had inquired in Rochdale and other places”—

MR. SPEAKER again interposed, and said the hon. Gentleman could not read a letter referring to debates in that House.

MR. BENTINCK would of course bow to the decision of the Speaker, and confine himself to a statement. It had been stated by an hon. Member in the course of that debate—he (Mr. Bentinck) made this statement on his own authority—that he had made inquiries in Rochdale and other places as to the Returns made to the Government in giving the number of persons likely to be placed on the registry by the £6 franchise, and these Returns were accurate. Now his (Mr. Bentinck's) information enabled him to go to the rate-book belonging to the corporation of Rochdale, and he therein found that the number of persons rated at £6 and under £10 by the overseers was very much understated in the Government Returns. The information which he had received showed that the increase in the number of voters from the reduction of the franchise would be 3480, while the Government Returns only gave 1746. Those discrepancies arose from the mode in which the overseers prepared their

Mr. Bentinck

Returns. They made the gross rental of the borough amount to £110,096, while the corporation valuation made it amount to £124,762, being a difference of upwards of £14,000; and he took it for granted that parties did not pay for any larger sum than they were receiving. While speaking of the borough of Rochdale, he would ask the hon. Member for Birmingham how it happened that he had so much more confidence in the working people than they had in him; for nearly all his carpet weavers were now on strike in consequence of a reduction of their wages. Much had been said in the course of this debate about discontent among the working classes. He must express his opinion that when there was that discontent it arose from the systematic agitation of those who were desirous of making political capital out of popular discontent. The noble Lord said that the general frame of the Constitution would not be changed by the measure. He did not exactly know what the noble Lord meant by “the frame of the Constitution;” but if the balance of power amongst parties would be destroyed by a measure he must suppose that the measure would do material damage to the frame of the Constitution. The noble Lord had said, speaking of the occurrences in this country some years back, that the French Revolution of 1830 had stimulated the feeling for Reform in England. It appeared to him that the observation of the noble Lord amounted to this—that “Reform” and “Revolution” were convertible terms, and that when they heard a cry for Reform they must presume that there was nothing but a revolutionary feeling in the country. He did not hold with the idea, but it seemed to result from the proposition of the noble Lord. The noble Lord had also referred to the proceedings at Nottingham during the Reform agitation. Now he (Mr. Bentinck) happened to be residing near Nottingham at the time of the Reform riots, and the house in which he was staying was one of those which it was thought necessary to defend against the attacks of those gentlemen who were supposed to be carrying out the views held by the noble Lord:—at least the noble Lord and the Government of the day were very much misrepresented and maligned at that time if the language which they held did not go a long way towards encouraging and stimulating those practices. If it did not, the history of that day had maligned them extremely. The noble Lord always endeavoured to impress on the House that any measure of Reform, however crude, must be passed. His argument seemed to be—"This is a measure of Reform: at your peril pass it." The noble Lord, when making this speech on Reform, always reminded the House that Nottingham Castle was burnt, and that there was a great fire at Bristol. He reminded him (Mr. Bentinck) of a very old story which he had heard in his youth. A boatswain of the old school was at one time serving on board of a ship, the captain of which, a right-minded man, had strictly prohibited swearing and all strong language. The boatswain found himself unable to convey his meaning without the expletives which he thought gave strength to his words, but being debarred from using them, his practice was to go up to a culprit and say to him, "Bless your little eyes—you knows what I mean." It appeared to him (Mr. Bentinck) that the noble Lord in dealing with the opponents of any of his projects of Reform, emulated the custom of the old-fashioned boatswain. He always treated the subject of Reform as if he were apprehensive of some unfortunate results from a too close investigation of it. He always reverted to that subject as a sort of caution to the opposite side of the House, not to oppose any measure of Reform, lest the opposition should lead to these unfortunate consequences. Then the noble Lord was very fond of harping upon one particular point, what he was pleased to term "the settlement of this great question." He (Mr. Bentinck) admitted that if it were possible to settle this question, and to avoid the recurrence in future Sessions of such a stoppage of business as had taken place in this discussion of the present Reform Bill, it would be most desirable for the House and for the country; but he would ask the noble Lord on what possible ground he entertained the slightest hope of settling it by the Bill now before the House? He (Mr. Bentinck) had with him an extract from the Report of a Parliamentary Reform meeting which took place a short time ago at Manchester, which showed, in the first place, in most unmistakeable language, the estimation in which that measure and that Cabinet were regarded by the distinguished persons who took part in that demonstration. The chairman who presided at this meeting said he was well inclined towards the present Government. This was a somewhat mild phrase. He then went on to say that with Cobden as

Plenipotentiary of Foreign Affairs, Bright taking the out-door department, and Gibson the inside, the firm was doing a roaring trade. Then as to the settlement of the question, the meeting passed a resolution to the effect that no measure of Parliamentary Reform could be satisfactory which did not confer the franchise on every male person rated in boroughs to the relief of the poor, and which did not more equally distribute the constituencies, and give the voter the protection of the ballot; that the Bill now before the House could only be regarded as an instalment of the long denied rights of the people, and as such they hoped that it would be adopted during the present Session of Parliament. It was evident therefore that the Manchester reformers who supported this measure did so, not as a settlement of the question, but as a stepping-stone to further changes in the constitution; and what the House had to do was not to ascertain how they were to settle this question but a great deal more. He was not arguing against all change, all reform; but in dealing with the noble Lord's Bill what they had to consider was not how they could settle the question, or whether they could settle it, but what was the point, in the democratic direction, beyond which the House would proceed no further. Because if the House did not take that position now they were doing that which would next year, almost before the ink of the present Bill was dry, lead to further discussion on a further measure of what was called reform. The noble Lord had made a most candid statement. He said that the Government proposed to lower the franchise in a way which they thought would effect the object in view. He (Mr. Bentinck) had no doubt that that statement was perfectly correct. But what was that object? He presumed, pretty much what it was in 1832—to give a longer tenure of office to a party who found it somewhat difficult to retain their power without the movement. He (Mr. Bentinck) was not prepared to say that he was opposed to all reform; he had, however, always looked to the Reform Bill of 1832 as having been brought forward more in the spirit of party than with a sincere desire to promote a real reform in the representation; and he was anxious to see such a reform as should give a fair amount of representation to every class of the population, and remove those anomalies and that injustice which at present he thought existed under the operation of the Bill of 1832, and which he should presently prove did exist. How did this Bill originate? The noble Lord abandoned the principle of finality for which he, at one time, so stoutly contended; and it was tolerably easy to trace the real cause and foundation of all his various Reform Bills. It appeared that the noble Lord, up to a certain time, was prepared to abide by the measure of 1832; and it was only when he found himself in political difficulties, and that his Government was likely to be removed from office, that he thought it advisable to reopen the question of Reform. All his Bills had been based on entirely different principles. They had all been framed to meet the circumstances of the moment, not the wants of the representation. How did the noble Lord reopen the question? He (Mr. Bentinck) had always been under the impression that when a great measure, especially one embodying organic changes in the constitution, was propounded to Parliament by a Government, it was first made the subject of grave and serious consideration before an assembled Cabinet, and that it was only after that consideration, and when every Member of the Cabinet was perfectly aware of the measure, that it was brought forward. But what was the course taken by the noble Lord in 1852? He brought in his measure of reform without having communicated with a single member of the Cabinet on the subject.

[Fifth Night.]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL here intimated his dissent, and was understood to add that he gave notice of the measure.

MR. BENTINCK said, he made the statement on the authority of a Member of the then Government of the noble Lord. The noble Lord said he gave notice of the measure; but whether he gave notice or not, every Member of the Cabinet the moment he brought it forward became implicated in its introduction. But was this the straightforward, and statesmanlike, and becoming manner in which a question of this kind should be treated? And if not, what conclusion could be arrived at but that the noble Lord saw himself in difficulties, and, without weighing the responsibility of a Member of a Cabinet who introduced a measure, took upon himself the responsibility of committing the Cabinet to that measure in order to relieve himself from his political difficulties. It appeared to him, then, that the noble Lord was the very last man in the House who ought to be entrusted with a measure of Reform, because the House and the country would never be impressed with the idea that such measure was a measure for the reform of abuses. Any statesman introducing a measure of this kind into Parliament ought to be above suspicion as to his motives. And what was the present measure of the noble Lord? It appeared to him (Mr. Bentinck) to be hardly worthy of the name of a Reform Bill, for everything like reform was omitted from it. The noble Lord was going to enlarge the constituency, and, as a consequence, enlarge also the area of corruption. But was he not bound, before he extended the area of corruption, to make some provision against the extension of that corruption, and so to put an end to those disgraceful scenes so often described before Committees of that House? The Bill contained no provision as to registration, no extra provision as to voting; in short, there were none of the details of a Reform Bill;—and yet it was brought forward as a great measure of Reform. There was no attempt to balance the representation in this case with different classes of the community; and unless that was done—he need hardly anticipate contradiction to his assertion—if any measure did not do that it would only lead to disturbance. The noble Lord had gone on for years past enlarging on all occasions on the increased intelligence of the country. They all knew how often that particular phrase of the noble Lord had drawn applause in that House. He had always based his arguments in favour of Reform and the extension of the franchise on the increased intelligence of the country, and the increased education of the poorer classes. But what did the noble Lord now do? He introduced a Bill which professed to deal with the question solely on the ground of numbers, and without the slightest allusion to any intention to admit to the franchise any additional portion of the intelligence of the country. The great measure of Reform introduced last year by Lord Derby's Government had at least this merit—that it would have admitted every one who had a fair share of education. The noble Lord, in the Bill now before the House, made no attempt of the kind. He proposed to enfranchise a certain number of persons, and the only persons he so proposed to enfranchise were a class of men who, whatever might be their increased intelligence, at all events had had fewer chances of improving themselves than any other class in the country. It was, doubtless, their misfortune, not their fault; but the noble

Mr. Bentinck

Lord was perfectly aware that there were hundreds of thousands of persons in the country not enjoying the franchise, but whose education, and intelligence, and position in society were such as fully to qualify them to hold it. And yet he did not introduce one element of intelligence into his Bill. The noble Lord proposed in this Bill to increase the number of the Metropolitan Members. To this he most decidedly objected; for though he wished to speak of the Metropolitan Members with the greatest possible respect, he was bound to say that, taken collectively, they were positively objectionable. These Gentlemen were always ready to support any measure for employing the national purse in the promotion of Metropolitan purposes, and he believed that if those who took an Imperial view of public questions did not carefully watch over and resist the attempts that from time to time were made, the whole of the Metropolitan expenditure would soon be paid out of the public purse. He would therefore stoutly resist the increase of Metropolitan Members. He thought that before that House proceeded to reform others, it had better begin to reform itself. They uniformly found that when a poor fellow of a voter, who knew nothing of public questions and hardly anything of the candidates for whom he was asked to vote, was proved before a Committee to have taken a £5 bribe, he was held up as a monster of corruption who should be cast out of the pale of the constitution. Now, he would suppose a case. He would assume that some great question affecting the constitution was to be brought forward by the Government—it might be, a Reform Bill. There were great differences of opinion amongst men on that subject. Well, suppose a Reform Bill to be brought forward by one Member of a Cabinet, and that the measure was opposed by some—it might be by the majority—of his colleagues; but though the majority of the Cabinet might be opposed to the details or to the principle of the measure, they might think it more advisable, in order to save the Cabinet or the Government, to assent to a Bill to which they objected. He (Mr. Bentinck) wanted to know what was the comparative difference between the poor voter who took the £5 and the distinguished statesman who received his £5,000 a year. Of course, he was not asserting that there were such men. All he could say was, that should there be any Member of a Cabinet who assented to the progress of a measure of which he entirely disapproved, he did that which was ten thousand times more venal and corrupt than the poor voter who took the £5 for his vote. There was another difficulty the noble Lord would have to deal with in discussing this measure of Reform. He thought the leaders, the distinguished men on both sides of the House, had got themselves into an embarrassing position in connection with this subject; and, in his opinion, it would simplify the matter very much if they were to disfranchise the two front benches on this question and place it in more disinterested hands. Then as to the Ballot, all he would say was that it appeared to be losing ground in public opinion and in the general feeling of the country. But there was still another most important omission from the Bill. The noble Lord the Member for London, and other hon. Members, when talking of the question of Reform, would lead one to suppose that Great Britain was composed of nothing but large towns and railways, and that when they were represented, all had been done that was essential to forming a constitution; but he (Mr. Bentinck) was under the impression, borne out by figures, that the great bulk of the population and property of this country was to be found, not in the towns, or mixed up with railways, and that in dealing with the question of reform, it was a singular proposal to make that they should ignore and totally lose sight of the claims of the rural districts. This was a question upon which any measure of reform must hinge; and he would appeal in particular to Gentlemen who represented the rural districts to attend to the few remarks which he was desirous of addressing to them. By the Bill before the House the rights of the rural districts were entirely ignored; and bearing in mind the maxim, that representation and taxation were to be considered as convertible terms, he contended that every Member in that House who represented the rural districts was bound to say, "You shall proceed no further with this or any other measure of reform until you are prepared to do justice to those districts, and give to them that share in the representation to which they have shown themselves fully entitled." The only Gentleman in the House who had yet touched upon this point was his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who had dealt with it most ably, and he (Mr. Bentinck) cordially concurred in the views his hon. Friend had expressed upon the subject. His hon. Friend went at some length into the question, and cited a number of figures; but as the House had already had a very large quantity of figures before it, he was indisposed to inflict more than he could help, and he would therefore only quote one line from those which his hon. Friend had taken so much trouble to collect. Without going further into details, then, it appeared that, according to property, the rural districts of England were, by two calculations, entitled to 131 more Members than they had at present in the House; and that, by a third calculation, taken on different grounds, the balance due to them was 137 more Members. He wanted to know, therefore, if the noble Lord and his supporters were prepared to defend the grounds upon which they had thus entirely ignored the rights of the rural districts? Were the rural districts to be represented, or were they not? If they were prepared to say that they had no right to be represented in proportion to property, intelligence, industry, or loyalty, and that they were not prepared to give them their fair share, that would be an intelligible argument, and he should know on what ground to join issue with them; but if they were not prepared to take that ground, on what other ground did the noble Lord deny to the rural districts that share in the representation to which they were undoubtedly entitled? It appeared to him that one great mistake had always existed in the franchise of this country. He had always thought that the county franchise ought to be lower than the borough franchise; because the class of men resident in the rural districts who would be enfranchised by a lower qualification were better able to use the privilege and better qualified for it, than the corresponding class resident in boroughs. And he thought he could show pretty good authority upon that point. He was quite aware that it was the practice of many Members in that House, and still more of some of them when out of the House, to decry the intelligence and education of the inhabitants of the rural districts from the county gentlemen downwards, although the latter did not suffer much from attacks of the sort; but holding the opinion that he did, that the rural districts were not only entitled to their fair share of representation, upon the ground that every district ought to have its fair share, but also that if there were a preference, it ought to be given to the county over the town, he should like to quote an authority that was higher than his own upon the subject, and one which hon. Gentlemen opposite would be slow to dispute. He would not willingly have raised this discussion upon the comparative intelligence and energy of the inhabitants of the rural districts as opposed to the inhabitants of the towns, but so much had been said at different times as to the utter unfitness, particularly of the lower classes in the rural districts, to exercise the franchise, as compared with the inhabitants of the towns, that it was high time to set the question at rest upon authority which hon. Members opposite could not fail to accept. That authority says:—

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. Bentinck

“After what are called the fine arts, and the liberal professions, however, there is perhaps no trade (speaking of agriculture) which requires so great a variety of knowledge and experience. The innumerable volumes which have been written upon it in all languages may satisfy us, that amongst the wisest and most learned nations it has never been regarded as a matter very easily understood; and from all these volumes we shall in vain attempt to collect that knowledge of its various and complicated operations which is commonly possessed even by the common farmer, how contemptuously soever the very contemptible authors of some of them may sometimes affect to speak of him. There is scarce any common mechanic trade, on the contrary, of which all the operations may not be as completely and distinctly explained in a pamphlet of a very few pages as it is possible for words illustrated by figures to explain them. In the history of the arts, now publishing by the French Academy of Sciences, several of them are actually explained in this manner. The direction of operations, besides, which must be varied with every change of the weather, as well as with many other accidents, requires much more judgment and discretion than that of those which are always the same or very nearly the same. Not only the art of the farmers, the general direction of the operations of husbandry, but many inferior branches of country labours, require much more skill and experience than the greater part of mechanic trades. The man who works upon brass and iron works with instruments and upon materials, the temper of which is always the same or very nearly the same. But the man who ploughs the ground with a team of horses or oxen, works with instruments of which the health, strength, and temper are very different upon different occasions. The condition of the materials he works upon, too, is as variable as that of the instruments which he works with, and both required to be managed with much judgment and discretion. The common ploughman, though generally regarded as the pattern of stupidity and ignorance, is seldom defective in this judgment and discretion. His understanding being accustomed to consider a greater variety of objects is generally much superior to that of the mechanic who lives in a town, whose whole attention, from morning till night, is generally occupied in performing one or two very simple operations. How much the lower ranks of people in the country are really superior to those of the town is well known to every man whom either business or curiosity has led to converse much with both."

The authority to which he had referred was no less than that of Mr. Adam Smith. Upon what ground, then, were the rights of these men to be refused, and the House asked to go on with the consideration of the Reform Bill, which entirely ignored the rights of these men? He only hoped that when the House came to the discussion of the details of the measure he should be joined by every Member in the House who represented a rural district in at once saying, until full and ample justice has been done to those districts no further progress shall be made with this measure. It appeared to him indeed a self-evident proposition that every Member for a rural district who did not take that course was distinctly betraying the interests of his constituents. There was another point which he thought also bore strongly upon the matter, and it was a curious and an instructive fact. It appeared that the last fifty-six cases of bribery in which Members had been unseated were all cases of bribery in boroughs, whilst there was not a single case of bribery in the counties. That, too, appeared to be an argument somewhat in favour of conferring upon the rural districts their share of representation, and it ought to weigh strongly with Gentlemen opposite who were so extremely horrified at corruption and bribery. A great deal had been said about the accuracy of the statistics upon which the noble Lord had based his measure. He (Mr. Bentinck) would not go further into them than to say that the fact of inaccuracy had been so clearly established, and, what was of still more consequence, that the Census, upon which the whole Bill was founded, must necessarily, owing to the time that had elapsed since it was taken, be so inapplicable to the existing state of affairs, that it was perfect waste of time to go into the details of a scheme which rested on two sets of incorrect calculations. He contended that they ought to have such Returns before them as they could rely upon, so that when they came to consider details in Committee they should not have to commence the discussion with an inquiry whether the figures were correct or not. To attempt to deal with the proposal of the Government until accurate statistics were before them was, he repeated, a waste of time, and almost an insult to the common sense of the House. He would only further observe that the first object which the House should have in view was to deal with the question without reference to party feeling. The great fault of the Reform Bill of 1832, and that which probably necessitated the re-opening of the question, was that that measure was pervaded by party spirit; it was not brought forward in a spirit of fair dealing; it was introduced in a spirit of party; and he trusted the House would avoid falling again into so mischievous, and he might say, so disreputable an error. A good deal had been said about the consequences of rejecting this or any other Reform Bill. The noble Lord the Member for London, without absolutely threatening them with the consequences, nevertheless gently hinted that the rejection of the Bill might be attended with inconvenient results; whilst the hon. Member for Birmingham, on the other hand, who was in the habit of attending large meetings of his countrymen, had told them in the plainest and most unmistakeable terms what they were to expect. He would not argue that part of the question, but it appeared to him that such suggestions were a libel upon the working classes of the country. For his part he had no such opinion of the working classes, and agreed so far with the noble Lord that he believed that popular intelligence had greatly increased within the last few years; that the diffusion of education had tended much to humanize the masses in this country; that men were not so easily worked upon and their passions aroused and excited as formerly; and upon the whole he thought too highly of the English people ever to believe that it would be possible to substitute violence for reasoning and intimidation for argument, whether such a course were suggested by hungry placemen or disappointed demagogues.

MR. WALTER: Sir, I am anxious, before there is an immediate risk of a "count out," to take an early opportunity of vindicating myself, as one of the occupiers of this comfortable, but, I am afraid, in the opinion of some hon. Members, not very respectable bench, from the charge which was made the other night by my hon. Friend the Member for Radnorshire (Sir J. Walsh) against those who sat upon this bench of having some ulterior objects in view in their support of this Bill. For my own part, I assure my hon. Friend I have no such ulterior views. I believe that the consequences of this Bill, if it passes, will fall very short of the expectations both of those who favour and of those who oppose

[Fifth Night.]

it. I could almost apply to it the language in which the prophet of old spoke of the idols of wood and stone—"Woe unto them, for they cannot do good, neither is it in them to do evil." I believe that the effects of the Bill will be extremely insignificant. But as an independent Member of the House, acknowledging no political leader, and depending, I may say, on myself alone for my political existence, I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments while I attempt to state, as concisely as possible, the view which I take of the present position of the country as regards this measure, and of the course which I think ought to be pursued with respect to it. I apprehend there is one question which must have occurred to every one who has thought about the matter, and that is, why is reform wanted at all? Certainly not, I should say, on account of any crying grievance which affects the working classes as such, or which could possibly be removed by legislation. There was a time, we all know, when those classes were exposed to great hardship and injustice, when they had to bear an undue share of taxation, and when the penal and other laws affected them most oppressively. In 1832 they were led to expect that they would derive great material and social advantages from the passing of the Reform Bill; and the promises then held out have been, I believe, in a great measure fulfilled, partly in consequence of legislation and partly owing to causes with which legislation has had no connection whatever. I defy any one at this moment to lay his hand upon a single grievance which affects the lower class as a class. The hon. Member for Birmingham has been engaged for a long period in endeavouring to persuade the working classes that they are paying a most inordinate and unjust proportion of the taxation of the country; and in a speech which he made, if I recollect right, last December, he challenged the disproof of his assertion that more than half the taxation of the country was borne by those classes. This question has been lately subjected to a thorough and critical investigation, and in a recent article in the Edinburgh Review it has been shown by the most minute and careful analysis that so far from the working classes having to pay an undue share of taxation, they in reality pay a smaller proportion than the upper classes of the country. Of direct taxation they pay nothing; of local taxation they pay next to nothing; and of indirect taxation it has been proved as clearly as such a thing is capable of proof, that the unrepresented classes contribute £24,000,000 or only £1 a head. Therefore, as far as taxation is concerned, I cannot understand the grounds upon which these complaints were made. No doubt this House in reconsidering questions of taxation and readjusting the proportions of the general burden, has always been, and I trust will always be, disposed to turn the balance rather in favour of the working classes than against them. But the hon. Member for Birmingham, and those who join with him in advocating a great extension of direct taxation, must remember that direct taxation cannot be extended much further without being also extended much lower; and I should like to know whether the poor man who now pays his proportion of income-tax in infinitesimal instalments throughout the year would thank the Legislature for sending the tax-collector to call upon him for half a sovereign every six months. I believe that if you were to pick out a hundred average specimens of the working men of different trades in the country you would find their grievances amounted substantially to this—"A little less labour, a little more pay, and a glass of beer to drink your honour's health." So much, then, for the grievances of the working classes. Another reason which may be given why Reform is necessary is the composition of this House, which, in the opinion of some Gentlemen, would be greatly improved by a large infusion of the working classes. I do not deny that if we could obtain the services of men of superior intelligence who had risen from or still belonged to the ranks, it would contribute in many respects to the information of this assembly; but I am sure that if there were a large "infusion" of men of that class, the time of the House would be wasted in the discussions which they would raise as to the standard of wages, the relations of capital and labour, the grievances of journeymen bakers, who disliked night work, the demands of the Early Closing Association, and other questions of that kind, which did not lie within the province of legislation, and their consideration would only be a waste of the time of the House. If, then, reform is not necessary for these reasons, on what ground can it be demanded? I think three principal reasons may be named. First, it is agreed on all hands, by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, that it is time to remove some of those anomalies which are ted to exist in the distribution of and that a redistribution cannot be longer postponed. In the next place, we all agreed that it is quite possible to extend the franchise to a large section of the working classes without injury to the constitution. Whether the standard of franchise shall be lowered as proposed by the Bill of the noble Lord, or whether the working classes shall be admitted by some of the fancy franchises suggested by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, is a question rather of detail than of principle. In either case the object to be attained is substantially the same.

Mr. Walter

There is, however, at this moment a great demand for Reform, and perhaps a more important reason why Reform is demanded; and that is, the expectations have been held out for a long number of years back that some measure of Reform would be granted. That would put his fingers in no little jeopardy who kept a piece of meat dangling before the nose of a dog, even when not hungry, and requiring a good deal of coaxing to make him shake off his drowsiness; and I think it is dangerous to keep the question of Reform from year to year, held out as a sort of temptation to the ruling classes, to be withdrawn as soon as it appears to be put in a shape which enables it to be taken hold of. Another question is whether, Reform being admitted to be necessary, this is the season when it should be conceded. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. Lytton) has urged, as a great objection to a measure of Reform at this moment, that it necessarily involves the immediate dissolution of Parliament, which at the present time he regarded as a serious evil, when a deficit was expected in next year's budget, and when the state of affairs was certainly not such as to leave the country entirely free from anxiety. But it does not now as a matter of course that the passage of a Reform Bill should be immediately followed by a dissolution of Parliament. I think it would be a great crime in the Government to dissolve Parliament merely for the sake of collecting the additional amount of intelligence which would be furnished by the £6 and £10 constituents. I can see no reason why, even after the Reform Bill passed, Parliament should not go on till some other reason should arise to require its dissolution. Then, Sir, comes the question, much more easily asked than answered, what is Reform? Does Reform mean, as its name denotes, the pulling to pieces and reconstruction of the whole political machinery, or does it imply merely the removal of the decayed parts and the substitution of sounder material? I will illustrate what I mean by reference to the remark made by the chairman of one of the Manchester meetings—a gentleman whose good taste has already been commented upon when he spoke of the “roaring business” which a certain firm was doing, and of whose logic I will now give you a specimen. I allude to Mr. Wilson, who, after complaining that the House of Commons contained 400 Members connected with the aristocracy and the warlike professions, said,—

“Since the last Reform Bill all had changed, and progress had manifested itself to a greater extent than was ever known in the history of mankind. All had improved since then; the political machine was the only one which had remained stationary. If they lent their hands to that, they might give it breadth and principle, so that it should represent the requirements and the intelligence of the people.”

Now, mark the singular nature of the argument. The argument was that, because since the Reform Bill of 1832 there had been greater improvements in wellbeing, in national prosperity, in trade, commerce, and legislation than had ever been known in the history of mankind—because all that had been done and could only be done through the political machine which they possessed, therefore that machine should be pulled to pieces. Now, Sir, I have had some experience of machinery. I am the owner of machinery of various descriptions. Now, suppose the person who had the charge of my machinery came to me and said—“It is true, sir, that up to a certain period your business went on indifferently, and you experienced great difficulties; but you introduced great improvements; your business increased; you have made your fortune, and are going on swimmingly; yet some people out of doors think your machine should be tinkered, and therefore, without being able to demonstrate to you how the alterations which they suggest will be any improvement, I advise you to let me pull your machine to pieces, and put up some other of which no human being can foretell how it will answer.” Should I not say, “It is very true there is certain to be wear and tear in all machinery, and machinery requires to be overlooked and overhauled, but the reasons which you have given are an argument, not for pulling it to pieces, but for keeping it together; and, unless you can prove to me that the alterations which they suggest will be any improvement, I advise you to let me pull your machine to pieces, and put up some other of which no human being can foretell how it will answer.” Should I not say, “It is very true there is certain to be wear and tear in all machinery, and machinery requires to be overlooked and overhauled, but the reasons which you have given are an argument, not for pulling it to pieces, but for keeping it together; and, unless you can prove to me that some improvement will follow the alteration, I shall be cautious how I meddle with a good thing which I have already got in working order." I am not contending that no improvement is necessary, or that there is not some wear and tear in the great political machine, as well as in other inorganic machines. We all know that motion and change (perhaps I might say motion and change rather than progress) are the condition of human affairs. But those are things which require to be watched with great care and delicacy, and he is the true statesman who applies remedies which time has proved to be necessary with the least disturbance to the existing state of things and with the greatest certainty of future good. To come now to the Bill immediately before us—this child of the noble Lord's old age—which the noble Lord treats with paternal fondness, or, as some one has said, with grandfatherly affection, but which its unnatural relatives seem to look upon with unconcealed dislike. Putting aside the redistribution of seats, which does not involve a question of principle, the two main principles of this Bill are the representation of minorities and the extension of the franchise. I think the clause which gives third Members to certain constituencies is one of great importance, and I entirely concur in the object which the noble Lord has stated that the clause is intended to accomplish—namely, the representation of minorities. A great deal has been written and spoken upon the subject, and any one who has taken the trouble to read the pamphlet of Mr. Mill, and that of Mr. Hare, referred to by Mr. Mill, will have seen that of all the impracticable and impossible schemes which have ever been devised, theirs are the most impracticable. They remind me of the aphorism of Lord Bacon, that the speculations of some philosophers were like stars, which gave so little light because they were so high. If those schemes were ever so reasonable in appearance, we know from experience that they are so impracticable that it is useless to discuss them, and I believe it would be found that any proposal to accomplish this desirable object, except in a very indirect manner, would not be listened to for a moment. It is impossible to assign grounds on abstract principle for giving one, two, three, or any number of votes. The safest course is to take things as we find them, and I think that this scheme of the noble Lord to accomplish the object by an appeal to the good feeling of the constituencies is likely to be a very successful and useful improvement. With regard to the extension of the franchise, I am not going to follow those Gentlemen who have spoken at great length into the much-controverted question as to the mode of rating. As far as I am concerned, I care not whether 100,000 more or less are added to the constituencies. I believe that it would make no appreciable difference whatever. The true question to determine, as it appears to me, is the degree in which those classes whom we propose to enfranchise are qualified, by their intelligence and respectability, for the privilege about to be intrusted to them. A great deal has been said about trusting the working classes, and we have been told not to be frightened at them. For my part, Sir, so far from feeling any distrust or alarm with respect to the working classes, I declare I could not go to bed in peace if I had any such fears. But we must recollect that in periods of excitement the working classes are especially liable to be misled by popular orators. If we are called upon to apply any other standard besides our own knowledge to ascertain the intelligence of the working classes, we must naturally turn to those who are assumed to be their leaders. The hon. Member for Birmingham, a most distinguished man, no Chartist or Socialist agitator, but a man who is in a position to compliment and patronize Chancellors of the Exchequer, is the acknowledged leader of the people in those places to which we are accustomed to look for demonstrations of public opinion. Let us see what is the estimate which that hon. Gentleman forms of the intelligence of the working classes, whom it is proposed to enfranchise. The hon. Gentleman told us the other night, in the discussion on church rates, that he was a member of a sect whose religion, from his description of it, must be the essence of Christianity, as it pervaded all Christian sects. Therefore the hon. Member, of course, always speaks with a sense of responsibility and in a spirit of angelic charity, the very reverse of that quality which he attributes to his opponents. I am sorry the hon. Member has left his place, because the charge which I have to make against him is rather serious. I am not going to rake up a collection of passages from the out-door speeches of the hon. Member. If any one wishes to see the hon. Member's portrait, painted by himself, it is to be found in the last number of The National Review. I am about to refer to a speech not alluded to in that Review, which I thought of great importance. I must first refer to the speech which the hon. Member made in Manchester on the 14th of February, at a meeting of the Lancashire Reformers Union, where, after telling his audience that there had been a regular trade of imposture upon the Duke of Wellington's letter to Sir John Burgoyne since 1847, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to say:—

Mr. Walter

"The real fact is that the Treaty has been received with great coldness among those classes from whom your representatives are chiefly chosen. They know perfectly well that if ever there grow up between England and France the commercial independence and unity which now exist between England and the United States, then it will not be in the hands of Prime Ministers or Foreign Secretaries, or diplomatists, or intriguers of any kind to provoke disunion, and ultimately bring about war between the two countries. We are threatening by this Treaty to cut down the tree in whose branches all those unclean birds are lodged; and that is precisely the reason why those whose aim in life is patronage, salary, expenditure, taxation,—that is precisely the cause why all those look coldly upon this Treaty."

I suppose the hon. Gentleman must have been reading his Virgil, and was thinking of the obscenæ volucres—the harpies which gobbled up the dinner of Æneas's companions, and dirtied their table. As for the compliments to Prime Ministers, Foreign Secretaries, and diplomatists, I will leave them to answer those for themselves. Early, however, in the present month, the hon. Member went a great deal further, in a speech at Manchester, and made charges which I think should not be passed over, but should be noticed by some one on this side if not by any one on the other side of the House. After repeating the statement made in a former speech, that the Treaty was received with a marked coolness in the House, and was opposed by a large minority of Members, the hon. Member proceeded to explain the motive of that opposition:—

"The real objection to the Treaty, I say, has been, for the most part, concealed. It menaces the great patrimony of the taxes. It takes away, or threatens to take away, that which has been for 170 years almost the only cause of your incessant increase of expenditure, of debt, and of taxation. It promises confidence and peace with France, instead of perpetual distrust and occasional war."

Again, he says:—

"I have said that they are afraid that this Treaty menaces the great patrimony of the taxes upon which this great aristocratic power in your country so much depends for promotion and for income." [Cheers.]

Do hon. Gentleman cheer that? Are we to be told that a great minority in this House opposed the treaty, not because they thought that the Apostle of free trade had been overreached to some extent by the Apostle of annexation, but because they thought it would produce the greatest blessing which could befall mankind? Did the hon. Member for Birmingham give them credit for the most diabolical motives which could influence human beings? Sir, when an hon. Member enters this House he claims to be a statesman. He cannot play the part of a demagogue and a statesman at the same time, and he has no right to go down to the great centres of population and tell the people in unmeasured terms that large numbers in the House of Commons have been actuated by motives of the grossest baseness in opposing treaties, not on account of defects which they have discovered, but because they thought those treaties would confer the greatest blessings upon mankind, and that for the sake of the beggarly pittance which the military and naval professions received in the shape of pay for their services. I will not trouble the House with any remarks upon the other topics referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham—about his ideas of social liberty as connected with the tenure of land, or with his letter to the people of Glasgow, in which he wondered how a man could breathe in a country in which the land was monopolized by the nobility and gentry. But the hon. Member has asked whether we distrust the working classes. I say God forbid! but I certainly do distrust those who address to them such language as this. I am as little of an alarmist as any one. I think that neither property nor even life is a subject for alarm to any one who entertains a due sense of the dignity of human nature; but, so long as one has to live in this world, one would like to be governed with some regard to the principles of truth, honour, and justice; and I should rather expect to find those principles exhibited under the dictatorship of a second Cromwell than under a Government based upon the doctrines of the hon. Member for Birmingham. Sir, I have not made these remarks without considerable pain. It is painful to speak of any man in terms of reproach, still more of one with whom I have sat in Parliament for many years, and with whom I hope to sit in Parliament for many years more—most of all, of one who is so distinguished as the hon. Member for Birmingham for his prowess in the noble art of Parliamentary self-defence. But I know that my remarks are just; I feel that they are not uncalled for; and I think, from the manner in which they have been received, they will not be altogether thrown away. Sir, I have but one more remark to make before I sit down. The noble Lord, the author of this Bill, spoke feelingly the other night of the period which had elapsed since the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, with which his name is indissolubly connected, and referred with just pride to the various measures of improvement which had been carried since the passing of that measure. It has been the noble Lord's happiness to witness the growth, maturity, and success of that great measure; but it can hardly be expected that the noble Lord will be permitted, after another similar lapse of years, to bear his testimony to the effects of the present measure. He must feel that he is committing it to the care of tutors and guardians with some degree of uncertainty and anxiety as to the result. The Bill we are now discussing, and which I hope will soon go into Committee, and pass in some shape or other, is one which will not affect the noble Lord and men of his age, but us and our posterity. Yet the noble Lord's reputation will be inseparably connected with this measure. His reputation is dear to every man in this House, whether on this side or on the benches opposite, and I therefore trust that we shall all do our best in the discussions which will follow so to improve and amend this Bill as to send it forth to the world in a shape in which it will prove, not a disgrace, but an honour to the noble Lord's name, and not a curse, but a blessing, to the country.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that in dealing with this proposed measure of Reform the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) seemed to think that because the Reform Bill had worked well since 1832, it was necessary to subvert the Constitution it had established. The noble Lord had gone on to enumerate the various beneficial measures that had resulted from the passing of the Bill of 1832, namely, the abolition of slavery, the Commutation of Tithes, the advent of peace and plenty in the place of disturbance, and famine, the beneficial alteration and modification of the whole of our Indian empire, and so on. But surely it was competent to him to draw out an equally long catalogue of disasters that had happened since 1832, and refer them likewise to the operation of the same measure.

Mr. Walter

For instance, it might be said that the destruction of property of our colonists in the West Indies, the terrible rebellion in India, the Russian war, the Chartist insurrection in 1848, the Irish mortality, and the Irish exodus, and all the other calamities we had had to endure, were the results of the Bill of 1832. There was just as much common sense and sound logic in the one argument as in the other. But admitting the noble Lord's premiss to be correct, what was the logical conclusion for it? Why that they should "leave well alone;" for if they had a constitution that produced these beneficial results, why did they propose to change it? Now the noble Lord the other day was silent as to the principle of the Bill; but in his opening speech the noble Lord had dealt with the principle, if such it could be called, or chief portion of his Bill—namely, that part which related to the borough franchise, and that principle was purely arithmetical. He had said, "We first took a £9 franchise, but we found it would not give us more than 30,000 or 40,000; then we took an £8 franchise, and we found that that would only give us 70,000 or 80,000 additional electors." The House would observe that it was always to quantity, never to quality, that the noble Lord looked. They then tried the £7 franchise, and that would give, they found, 122,812 additional voters. But still that was not enough to justify any alteration in the estimation of the noble Lord, so they went down to the £6 rental, and that gave the exact amount required—the golden medium—namely, 194,000 additional voters to the boroughs. The £6 franchise was therefore determined on as the basis of the new Constitution. Such was the principle, as stated by the noble Lord, of the Bill then before the House. But with reference to the figures upon which the noble Lord's calculations had proceeded the House had had an expression of the most discordant views. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had said it was all nonsense to suppose that a £6 franchise would give 194,000 additional voters, for there would not be more than 162,000 from such a rental being adopted as the qualification of an elector; and a few days afterwards, to his (Lord John Manners') great astonishment, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department (Sir George Lewis) had backed up the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Bright), and admitted the actual condition of the register would not give more at that rental than 160,000 new electors. Then they had the remarkable evidence of the hon. Member for Marylebone. There was no one in that House who could presume to say whether the figures of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone were correct or not. The whole question was perfectly at sea, and the Government had been obliged, by force of argument, to consent to a Committee of the other House of Parliament, where the figures were being sifted; and until they had received the Report of that Committee he protested against proceeding with this measure, which according to the noble Lord was based upon figures and upon figures alone. But the noble Lord evidently apprehensive that in large towns his figures would fail him would seem to have adopted the fallacious theory of his coadjutor and friend, the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the small boroughs were merely an extension of the county representation, and said that if they took all the boroughs in England under 20,000 inhabitants the increase in the number of voters would be found to be so insignificant that there would be no serious change in the existing constituencies. Now, he (Lord John Manners) had taken out the first six boroughs in point of population under 20,000, and six of the lowest; and what were the results as showing what the real effect of this Bill would be? Shrewsbury had a constituency of 1,404; the noble Lord calculated that he would add 834; but for reasons assigned by many hon. Gentlemen in the course of that debate, it was far more likely that the next column in the Return would show the actual number, and then the increase would be 1,043. Colchester had a constituency of 1,257. According to the noble Lord there would be added 573; but according to the more reasonable calculation, the addition would be 716. King's Lynn had 1019; according to the noble Lord it would be increased 665; but according to the more reasonable calculation, 831. Whitehaven had 571; the noble Lord said the increase would be 474; the more reasonable calculation made it 592, or more than the whole of the present constituency. Kidderminster had 487; the noble Lord said the addition would be 1,173; the more probable calculation, 1,473, added to a constituency of 487. Would the noble Lord say that was not swamping the present constituency? Canterbury had a constituency of 1564; the noble Lord said the addition would be 482; the more probable calculation, 650. He then came to the six lowest boroughs; and he began with Totnes. The constituency at present was 341; the noble Lord said the addition would be 47; the more probable calculation was 59. Now, he would make the noble Lord a present of Totnes, as probably, even under his Bill, it would remain the same Whig fief as at present. Lyme Regis had a constituency of 265; the noble Lord said the increase would be 139; the more probable calculation was 174. Ashburton had a constituency of 193; the noble Lord made the increase 71; the more probable calculation, 89. Honiton had 287; the noble Lord made the increase 46, the more reasonable calculation 58. Arundel had 196; the noble Lord's increase was 80; according to the more reasonable calculation it would be 100. Was not that a considerable increase? But now, he would ask, taking whatever figures they pleased—whether those of the noble Lord, the Home Secretary, or the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, whether there was not a preliminary question which ought to be settled before they went into these schedules and figures that had so perplexed them? The Question had as yet been neither asked nor answered;—it was this—“What are the evils and defects of the present system, and what are the remedies fit and proper for their mitigation or removal?” It was not alleged, or if alleged it was not true, that the populations of the large cities and boroughs were not fairly represented in this House as to their predominant opinions. Take the two first boroughs on the list in point of population, the Tower Hamlets and Liverpool. Would any one assert that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) who so ably and zealously represented the vast and varied interests, and the enormous population of the Tower Hamlets, and his hon. Friend (Mr. Horsfall) did not fairly represent the preponderating opinions of those places? This, therefore, was not the defect of the existing system. What was it then that was complained of? Why, it was, that when they came low down in the present constituencies they found the poorer voters liable to corrupting influences, and by means of Committees and Commissions they had received information of so startling and so painful a nature that it had become a scandal, and a scandal which they all thought ought to be put an end to as speedily as possible. But then he would ask what effect this Bill was calculated to have in a remedial point of view. How was that Bill calculated to diminish the influences of bribery and corruption amongst the poorer classes of voters. As far as he could see the only effect would be to double and treble and even quadruple the area in which those corrupting influences might hereafter be exercised. Allusion had been made to the Bill of last year. No one could deny that that Bill, by the variety of the franchises which it proposed to confer, did tend to bring new classes within the pale of the Constitution, and infuse into the life of Parliamentary boroughs fresh and healthy elements, elements drawn from the intelligence and industry of the country, which might have had, and probably would have had a most beneficial effect in raising the general standard of electoral morality. But the Bill of the noble Lord was entirely silent upon that subject. It would not do to say "Wait until we get into Committee, and then we will make the Bill all that it ought to be;" for of course the Bill must be treated as representing the matured views of the Government on the subject. He would sum up his objections so this part of the Bill, by saying that whereas the Bill of last year sought to raise the working man to the level of a franchise easily obtainable by industry and honesty; the Bill of the noble Lord merely lowered the franchise to the level of bribery and corruption. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down repudiated the taunt of being unmindful of the claims or wishes of the working classes; he had no fear of the behaviour or the principles of the working classes, but yet he hesitated to give his support to a Bill for an indiscriminate degradation of the franchise. He (Lord John Manners) agreed with the hon. Gentleman. He did not object to the introduction of working men within what was called the pale of the Constitution, although he denied that they were excluded from it at present. Much had been said, especially by hon. Gentlemen opposite, about the ignorance of the working classes concerning the principles of political economy. He was no great political economist himself, and after what had lately happened he doubted whether the originators and authors of the French Treaty of Commerce could fairly propose to keep out the working classes upon the sole ground that they were not adepts in political economy. He did not fear the use the working classes would make of the franchise. Probably the first questions

[Fifth Night.]

Lord John Manners

which a House of Commons represents the views and wishes of working men discuss would not be those general changes which some Gentlemen apprehended, but questions which went home to the hearts and interests of the working classes — questions affecting relations between employer and employed. He did not wish to dwell on that subject but as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had more than once at meetings in the country made significant allusions to the present position of the working classes, and had given them his advice, he (Lord John Manners) would take the opportunity, as he was about to go to those meetings graced by the presence of the hon. Gentleman, who

"Like Cato gave his little senate laws,
And sat attentive to his own applause,"
as he (Lord John Manners) had the opportunity of referring, excepting to a free House of Parliament, to the comments of the hon. Gentleman, he proposed to say a few words on the arguments of the hon. Gentleman had twice brought before the notice of the people. He had said in effect to the young man, "You have at the present moment, a most important, a most influential but I must say a most dangerous organization; the organization of your clubs and your trades unions. Believe me it can be more fallacious or more fatal to the object to which at present you are directing your organization. But let me—give me and my friends the details of your trades unions and organizations and then you will see what wonderful political effects I will produce for you." Now he (Lord John Manners) thought the hon. Gentleman had not found that the working classes had shown any disposition to take his disinterested advice on that subject, and the reason was clear. The working men of the North had tried, and they were shrewd men, and they knew perfectly well what they were doing. They knew what they proposed to do for themselves in their organization, and in maintaining their organization. They had seen the past career of the hon. Member for Birmingham, in that House, and when he came before them and said, "I am your friend. Give up the machinery of your organization by which you purpose to improve the relations between employer and employed; suffer me to divert all that machinery to the political objects I have at heart," the working men naturally

"We have watched your past career in Parliament. You were in Parliament in 1846 and 1847, when a great question to which we attached the utmost importance was brought forward—a question which had inspired our energies, and for which we had toiled and sacrificed our hard earnings for years. How did you behave when that question, to which we attached such paramount importance, was under discussion in the House of Commons?" They looked at the records of that House, and they saw that the hon. Gentleman was one of the most pertinacious of all the opponents of the Ten Hours Bill. He succeeded in defeating it by a narrow majority in 1846. It was brought forward again in 1847, and then the hon. Gentleman not only spoke against it, but acted as a teller for the small majority against the second reading of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman perhaps might answer and say, "Oh, that is an old story; that is thirteen years ago. I admit that I was then an enthusiastic political economist; but I have seen enough in the last thirteen years, to make me admit that my predictions have been falsified, and that great benefits have resulted to the manufacturing districts from that legislation to which I was opposed." But was that so? Only the other day, a month ago, there was under discussion a supplement to the Ten Hours Bill—a Measure which attracted the sympathies of the great body of the working classes whom it would peculiarly affect. No doubt the working classes would say to the hon. Gentleman, "What was your conduct on that Bill?" And the hon. Gentleman, if he condescended to answer them, must give an answer of a very remarkable character. He must say, "True it is, that I was in the House of Commons before that Bill came on; for, working men of England, there was a Bill which was to do you good by depriving the bloated Church of England of some of its revenues. I was in my place to support that Bill, and to give it my hearty and cordial support; but when the Bill relating to the sufferings of the bleachers was proposed, knowing the use I wished to make of you on the subject of Reform, I had not the courage to carry my convictions into action and vote against the second reading of the Bill, and so I absented myself from the House." Now he (Lord J. Manners) trusted the working men, with their shrewdness, would not place confidence in the hon. Gentleman, and follow his insidious and pernicious advice. He now came to the second portion of the Bill of the noble Lord, by which he proposed to cut down the county franchise to £10. Well, now, here again he might ask what were the evils of the present system, and how were they proposed to be remedied? [Lord J. Russell: The same as in your own Bill.] But their position was this, that their Bill dealt with the evils, and the only evils which the present system of representation ever had alleged against it; but the Bill of the noble Lord remedied, and was intended to remedy none. The noble Lord, in introducing his Measure, said:—

"During the progress of the Reform Act through this House it was decided that freehold and leasehold tenures should no longer give the sole title to a county vote; but that an occupation merely of the annual value of £50 should also confer on the occupier the right of voting. That was an obvious change on the nature of a county franchise. That claim having been sanctioned by Parliament, those who since that time have looked into the subject, with the view of amending the law, have very naturally said, 'If an occupation merely is to give a title to a vote, it should no longer be restricted to a £50 holding; the occupier of a £20 or £10 holding is as fully entitled to a vote, and would form as good a class of electors as the occupier of a value of £50.' That view of the question has been more than once adopted; in principle it was adopted by the late Government."—[3 Hansard, clvi. 2051.]

But he (Lord J. Manners) took leave to say that the simple reduction of the county franchise was not the principle of the Bill of the late Government, as alleged by the noble Lord. The late Government asked itself what were the evils of the existing county franchise, and they found that they were two; first, that in some of the populous counties the freeholders resident in boroughs were likely to overwhelm entirely the voice of the purely county constituencies, and trench on the rights and privileges of the rural districts of which his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) had spoken, that was the first defect. A most unfounded and unfortunate prejudice was immediately raised by the noble Lord, and those who acted with him, against that portion of the Bill, an amendment of the law in favour of which so many sincere and earnest Reformers in that House had spoken, and which was held by them to be legitimate and proper in 1832, but which was now stigmatized by the noble Lord as something unheard of in the annals of Parliamentary history. Was it pretended that by the present county franchise an opportunity was not given to the rural districts for the free expression of their opinion? Nobody pretended that the counties were improperly or unfairly represented by the county Members, nor was it alleged, as in the case of the boroughs, that anything like bribery and corruption prevailed in the counties. In point of fact, the only county Member petitioned against on the ground of bribery at the last election was himself, and although the allegations of bribery and corruption were of course made, nobody who knew anything of North Leicestershire was surprised at his retaining his seat. The charges against county Members of bribery, corruption, and intimidation were confined to the platforms of Birmingham and Manchester; nobody in that House rose to repeat them. The only other defect that the late Government had to deal with was this,—that whereas a person living in a £10 house in a borough exercised the privilege of the franchise, his equal or superior in intelligence or social position residing immediately outside a Parliamentary borough, though he might reside in a £20, or £30, or £40 house, was denied that privilege. The Bill of the late Government completely cured that defect. But, he asked, did the Bill of the noble Lord cure it? It merely reduced the franchise in counties from £50 to £10, and in boroughs from £10 to £6; so that in principle and in practice the defect remained as before. The noble Lord had begun at the wrong end of the scale. He was confident that the noble Lord must feel that he had made a great mistake. His Bill perpetuated the defect, and up to the present moment there had been no indication of the intention of the noble Lord to modify that portion of the Bill in Committee. He (Lord J. Manners) had not the slightest fear of the influence which the £10 householders would exercise in county elections, but he could not submit to any very large extension of the franchise in counties without some counterpoise, which would give a security for the future character of the county representation. It was impossible for any one who was acquainted with the larger counties, not to see that, from year to year, owing to the increased wear and tear of public life, the early and late grinding in the Parliamentary mill, the increased demands upon their time and attention, there was a great and growing indisposition evinced by the country gentlemen of England to continue the part which they had hitherto borne in the public business of the country. He said, then, it was not the part of an

[Fifth Night.

Lord John Manners

English statesman, nor consistent with the wisdom of Parliament, to do anything which could tend, by possibility, to increase that lamentable indisposition. The noble Lord continued the borough freeholders, and cut down the franchise in counties to £10. The late Government not only proposed to remove the borough freeholders to the borough, where justice demanded that their votes should be given, but they divided several of the very largest counties. Did the Bill of the noble Lord do anything of that sort? Not content with increasing the difficulties now standing in the way of county gentlemen, of ability and high position, representing their native counties, he not only added to that indisposition by this great reduction of the franchise, but compelled several of the larger and more populous counties, where the difficulty was greater, to send three Members instead of two. That brought him to that portion of the Bill which dealt with the question of the re-distribution of seats. He viewed, with the greatest distrust and dislike, the proposal of the noble Lord to add another Member to large towns and large counties. If they were to have these Unicorn seats at all, upon what principle were they to be established? Population? Hardly that; because the Tower Hamlets, which stood at the top of the list, was not to be permitted to have more than two. Would the noble Lord say that he had withheld the additional Member from the Tower Hamlets, because there was no diversity of interests to be represented? Hardly that, because there was no borough in the kingdom in which the interests were more diverse than they were in the Tower Hamlets. Perhaps it was thought unnecessary to give an additional Member to the Tower Hamlets, because, being contiguous to London, it was thought the Members for London and for Westminster, or Southwark, would look after its interests; but if that was the case, why should Manchester have three, and Salford, which was contiguous, only one? He really thought that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had been somewhat hardly dealt with by his noble Friend. The Tower Hamlets had the largest population, and the greatest diversity of public interests; and though it was unquestionably represented by Gentlemen of great energy and ability, its claims to a third member, if that principle were conceded, ought to be admitted; and the hon. Member was perfectly justified in asking that one or two Members should be taken from the City, and added to the Tower Hamlets. These seemed some of the principal sins of commission in the noble Lord's Bill. The sins of omission in this Bill were enormous; they were past all enumeration, and they were so important and so weighty, that he confessed, when he heard the noble Lord introduce the measure, and witnessed the melancholy silence with which the dispirited colleagues of the noble Lord had listened to the dreary catalogue of stale proposals as they fell from his unimpassioned lips, he was inclined to ask himself, was this the great measure of Parliamentary Reform, the deliberate judgment of a Cabinet which arrogated to itself all the intelligence, all the Liberalism, and even all the enlightened Conservatism of the day; or was it rather the dreary, perfunctory redemption of a rash pledge, given for a party purpose? That was the impression produced on his mind when the Bill was introduced. Not a Minister spoke on that occasion, and the duty of defending the Bill was left in the hands of the hon. Member for Birmingham alone. To him and the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Rochdale, England owed the Commercial Treaty, about the effect of which the various Chambers of Commerce were now so ecstatic and so eulogistic; to him they were indebted for the defence of the cession of Savoy and Nice to our magnanimous Ally; and now he appeared as the great defender of this Reform Bill. He (Lord John Manners) thought that the time had really come when the gangway ought no longer to separate the hon. Member for Birmingham from the Government which he supported; for he it was to whom was entrusted the defence of our foreign as well as domestic policy; and therefore it was that he thought he ought to be placed in some position where he might share the honours he had earned, and answer the responsibilities he had incurred. The practical question, however, before the House was, what were they to do with the Reform Bill—how were they to treat it? It struck him that the House were very much in the position of the immortal Mr. Pickwick and his friends, when they were walking about the country with an enormously tall horse, which they did not know what to do with. There was a Gentleman in that House told them that it very much interfered with his business, which he performed as Chairman of Committees with the greatest possible urbanity and ability. He gave the House to understand the other day that he had got a very nice horse-box into which he could put this very disagreeable horse until it was wanted; the House hailed the proposition with delight; but no, the noble Lord was inexorable, and would have him trotted out again; and now what were they to do with this most mischievous and unruly animal? What were they to do with the Bill? In that magnificent oration to which no reply had yet been made, and to which he ventured to say no reply would ever be made, which rendered memorable the debate of last Thursday, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. Bulwer Lytton) appealed in most patriotic terms to the noble Lord to withdraw the Bill. The noble Lord spoke after him; but he could not collect from the speech of the noble Lord, that he was prepared to adopt that patriotic recommendation. He hoped the noble Lord meant to withdraw the measure; but should he insist on proceeding with it in Committee, he ventured to say that all the resources of the most distinguished statesmen, and all the qualities of mind and body that could be brought to bear upon it, would be required to carry it through, and to render it an effective reform of the Representation of the People. But what was the position of the noble Lord? Was he capable or able, however willing he might be, to devote that time and those energies to this question which its importance demanded? The noble Lord was at that moment directing the foreign affairs of this mighty empire, and at a crisis in the condition of Europe the dangers and difficulties of which no one could exaggerate. Let any one go into society, and say to the warm admirers and friends of the noble Lord, that you were disappointed with the noble Lord, because he had not managed our foreign policy with that skill and that success and vigour that was expected of him, or that you could not understand how it was that, when Members of the House of Commons brought forward statements with regard to the ambitious designs of France upon Savoy and Nice, although the Foreign Secretary was constantly receiving despatches on the matter from our Ambassador at Paris, he seemed to be entirely ignorant of the nature of those important communications or most culpably indifferent to them. "Oh," replied his friends, "don't be so unjust; at that moment the noble Lord was deep in the mysteries of the Reform Bill, in the consideration of £5 and

[Fifth Night.

£6 franchises, removing the scruples of reluctant colleagues, and, in short, was doing that which would send down his name to posterity as the greatest reformer of the age." But, on the other hand, if any one complained to the friends of the noble Lord that he had not produced such a Bill as the House and the country had a right to expect, their answer was "Don't be so unjust; could you expect that the noble Lord was able to pay attention to questions about the franchise when he had in his hands the management of the whole affairs of Europe, and had to penetrate the designs of ambitious monarchs and restrain the fury of undisciplined peoples?" He did not mean to quote the description of the noble Lord given by a facetious Canon, but it was hardly a metaphor to say that the noble Lord had exceeded even the anticipations of his reverend friend and was undertaking the operation of cutting for the stone and commanding the Channel fleet at one and the same moment, for he was cutting and carving and slashing at the vitals of the Constitution of England, and at the same time was directing, not the movements of the Channel fleet only, but of all the fleets of England over the globe. It was plain to him that the noble Lord was overtasked, and could not properly perform the double duty which he had undertaken to discharge. He could not properly and successfully be engaged in remodelling the Constitution of the country and managing the foreign affairs of a mighty empire in the present condition of Europe at one and the same time. The consequence was that the want of success in his foreign policy was excused by his attention to domestic concerns, and the failure of the noble Lord in domestic concerns was explained by the time and attention which he was obliged to give to foreign affairs. He trusted that the noble Lord would make a selection between resigning the seals of the Foreign Office or shelving this unfortunate Reform Bill. He must confess he would far rather see the noble Lord holding the seals of the Foreign Office, because, though he had little confidence in his skill as a diplomatist, he had confidence in his generous English sentiments, though he greatly doubted whether those sentiments were shared by some of his colleagues. At all events it was plain that the noble Lord must take one course or other, or it was clear that the nation must expect a failure in our foreign policy, and a miserable abortion in the shape of a

Lord John Manners

Reform Bill. Would the country blame the noble Lord if he adopted the course now recommended to him of withdrawing this Bill? He believed that the country would not blame him or the Government; he was certain that on that side of the House no taunt, no insinuation would be heard against the noble Lord if he adopted such a course. It would be the patriotic course; and on that side of the House he was safe from all reproach. But would the country blame him? The country was not so apathetic as some pretended on the subject; it was not so eager as the hon. Member for Birmingham believed. But the country was anxious lest, through want of consideration or through prejudice or party feeling, an ill-considered and fatal change should pass over those institutions which had so long reconciled liberty with order and blended into one harmonious whole the various classes of an ancient and illustrious community. Let us, then, he said, respect that just and noble apprehension, and let us cease to present the startling spectacle of a reluctant Parliament forcing on a still more reluctant people, legislation so devoid of merit, so full of errors, and so fraught with danger to the institutions of the country.

MR. HODGKINSON said, the debate was well nigh exhausted, as was proved by the variety of extraneous topics upon which succeeding speakers had enlarged. The noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord John Manners) had treated of the Ten Hours Bill, the Bleaching Bill, the builders' strike, and the manner in which the noble Lord the Member for London conducted the foreign affairs of this country, topics which seemed to have very little connection with the Bill before the House. Indeed, if a stranger were introduced into the House he would suppose from the constant allusions to the hon. Member for Birmingham that he was the chief occupant of the Treasury Bench, and that the House was engaged in discussing a vote of want of confidence in him; and if he were told that the object of all their vituperation was a Reform Bill, he would imagine that it was not the mild and temperate measure of reform introduced by the noble Lord that they were discussing, but that the measure they were deliberating upon was the other Bill promulgated to the country by the hon. Member for Birmingham, sixteen months ago, but which from a wise discretion had not been brought before the House. Something had been said of the great power possessed by the industrial classes through the means of their great organization, as shown by the recent strike, which, it was said, made it dangerous to intrust them with the franchise. But there was no analogy between the builders' strike and the exercise of electoral privileges from which it could be inferred that the organization in question could be made applicable to political purposes. It was to be expected that the working classes would agree upon a question involving the subject of wages and the hours of labour; but it was by no means so clear that they would agree upon political questions in which their interests were not so direct and immediate. Hon. Members on his (the Ministerial) side of the House were told that they supported the present Bill, not because it was in accordance with their convictions, but because they were impelled by pledges delivered on the hustings at the last election. He repudiated such motives, and it seemed to him that this argument was inconsistent with another argument which had been made use of by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that there was an apathy in the country on the question, and there was no desire for reform out of doors. If that was so where was the pressure from without upon them, and what had Liberal Members to fear when they went to the hustings by-and-by?" There was not after all so wide a difference between hon. Gentlemen opposite and those on his side of the House. The substantial difference between them limited itself pretty nearly to two points—the reduction of the borough franchise from £10 to £6, and the omission from the present Bill of the fancy franchises included in the Bill of the late Government. However much hon. Gentlemen might object to the reduction of the borough franchise, they can hardly be surprised that it should form an ingredient in any Bill to be introduced by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell); for was it not the fact that the reduction of the borough franchise was the very rock upon which the Bill of the late Government was wrecked? Was not the country appealed to in consequence? And if there was one real intelligible issue before the country at the last election was it not with reference to this very point? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, in the speech he made upon the vote of want of confidence last Session had himself described the answer made to that appeal, and admitted distinctly that the country was against him, on the subject of the borough franchise. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"The question of the borough franchise must be dealt with, and it must be dealt with too with reference to the introduction of the working classes. We admit that that has been the opinion of Parliament, and that it has been the opinion of the country, as shown by the Gentlemen who have been returned to this House. We cannot be blind to that result. We do not wish to be blind to it. We have no prejudice against the proposition. All we want is to assure ourselves that any measure we bring forward is required by the public necessities, and will be sanctioned by public approbation and support; and therefore we are perfectly prepared to deal with the question of the borough franchise and the introduction of the working classes by lowering the franchise in boroughs, and by acting in that direction with sincerity, because as I ventured to observe in the debate upon our measure, if you intend to admit the working classes to the franchise by lowering the suffrage in boroughs, you must not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope."—
[3 Hansard, cliv. 139.]

If the words of the right hon. Gentleman meant anything, they meant that if he had been spared for another Session to sit on the Treasury benches, he was prepared so to lower the franchise as to admit the working classes to such an extent as not to "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope." The hon. Member who, in last Session, moved the Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Speech likewise stated that the Ministry had shown a wise discretion in announcing that their measure of Reform would be considered in the next Session, and that he had reason to believe that it would propose a diminution of the borough franchise. Those who enjoyed a power or privilege were not usually predisposed to dilute that power or privilege by extending it to others, it must therefore be regarded as conclusive evidence of the strong claims of the working classes to the franchise, that at the recent general election, the existing constituencies evinced their willingness to concede it to them. Hon. Members who affirmed that there was apathy out of doors on the subject of reform assumed that which all recent experience had disproved. People were not usually noisy and clamorous in asking for the fulfilment of a pledge, the non-fulfilment of which they had no reason to expect. On both sides of the House reform had been promised—a substantial measure of reform, which would admit the working classes to a large share of the franchise, had been promised, both by those who occupied the Ministerial benches, and those who should occupy the Opposition benches if they were present. Why, then, should the people out of doors doubt that such pledges would be honestly fulfilled? If, however, the House should be induced to reject this measure of reform, or so to limit its provisions as to lead the people to believe that the promises which had been made to the ear were to be broken to the hope, then he believed the tone of the people out of doors would be changed; and, although he felt satisfied it never would exceed constitutional bounds, yet it would suffice to convince those who believed them apathetic how mistaken they had been in entertaining such a belief. It seemed to have been assumed by those who opposed the Bill, that the admission of the working classes to the franchise was an experiment of a perfectly novel character. It might be some consideration to hon. Members, whose respect for our institutions were almost in proportion to their antiquity, to be reminded that the Bill, so far as reducing the borough franchise from £10 to £6 was concerned, gave but a partial restoration of many of the boroughs to their ancient rights. He was one of the representatives of a borough (Newark) which was a type of a class, and in which, prior to the last Reform Bill, there were upwards of 1,600 electors. The effect of the Reform Bill had been to reduce the electors of that borough to less than half that number. He did not allude to the freemen, but to those who bore scot-and-lot, and who then enjoyed the franchise. The effect of the present Bill would be to increase the constituency again to something over 1,000. Had the privilege of the franchise been abused in that borough prior to the last Reform Bill? On the contrary, it was not within the memory of the oldest man living that any petition had ever been presented to the House charging that borough with bribery and corruption. The hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) had alluded to the borough of Newark as an illustration of the advantage of a small constituency, because it had had the judgment to introduce into Parliament such men as the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord who had last spoken. A third might have been added to the list, the late Lord Chancellor Truro. But although the fact was used as an argument in favour of small boroughs, the hon. Member who employed it had mistaken his mark, for when he (Mr. Hodgkinson) told the House that the introduction of the three Statesmen he had named took place before the constituency became reduced to its present limits—he believed two of them were returned when the constituency was between 1,400 and 1,500—it could hardly be said that that was a case to be quoted in favour of small boroughs, although it might be quoted as an instance of the judicious selections which were made by a constituency, of which a large part belonged to that very class intended to be restored to the franchise by the present Bill. With regard to what were called “fancy franchises,” he could not help thinking that the lodger franchise, the payment of direct taxation, and some of the franchises embodied in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, might with advantage be added to the present Bill. The lodger franchise would certainly add a large number of intelligent, well-educated men to the constituency, and, if proposed in Committee, he should give it his support. He hoped, however, that the House would speedily pass to the second reading of the Bill, and not disappoint the just expectations of the country.

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. Hodgkinson

MR. HOPWOOD expressed his belief that general apathy did prevail in regard to the question of reform. A tolerably correct estimate of the amount of interest excited by any public measure might be formed from the number of petitions presented concerning it, and he found, from a statement in The Times, that while 3,330 petitions, with 211,262 signatures, were presented with reference to the wine licences, and 10,986 petitions, with 794,045 signatures, with reference to church rates, only 96 petitions, with 33,756 signatures, had been presented with regard to Parliamentary Reform. This, he submitted, showed that great apathy existed on the subject of Reform. He believed that if the country were polled, the great majority of the people would be opposed to a measure of this kind. In the agricultural districts he had been hardly able to discover an individual who wanted reform; and speaking of Lancashire, he knew that in Burnley, which was one of the new boroughs to be enfranchised by the Bill, they cared very little about it indeed; on the contrary, they said it would be the worst thing that could happen to the town to have the privilege of returning a Member conferred upon it, because a contested election gave rise to so much bitter political feeling; in short, that they were happier without representatives than they would be with them. The hon. Member for Birmingham had pointed to the fact that when he was last at Manchester 7,000 persons came to listen to him, as proof that there was a demand for reform; but surely 7,000 persons out of a population of 400,000 were but a very small proportion, and no doubt as many would have assembled to hear the right hon. Member for Bucks, or the right hon. Baronet the Member for Herts, had either of those Gentlemen gone down to address them. The fact was, that it was holiday time, and the people had nothing better to do than listen to an animated and energetic speech from the Member for Birmingham. That hon. Member had also stated that he had gone through a large warehouse in Manchester, where he saw a quantity of goods of various fabrics, the produce of the ingenuity of the working men, who, he complained, had not a voice in the election of the Members of this House. He (Mr. Hopwood) contended that it was not these men exclusively who manufactured the goods, which were the produce rather of the ingenuity, the thought, and the care of their superiors. It might as well be said, with respect to the Reform Bill, that the men who printed it had no votes; but the Bill itself had been prepared, not by the men who printed it, but, he was sorry to say, by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in redemption of an unfortunate pledge, and to gratify the prejudices of Gentlemen below the gangway. It appeared to him that Governments in the present day were becoming mere delegates of a certain section of the House. To secure the support of the Members for Birmingham, Tavistock, and Swansea, noble Lords on the Treasury bench chose to outbid right hon. Gentlemen on that, the Opposition, side of the House. If they wanted anything they had only to ask for it, and if possible it was yielded. Our foreign diplomacy was managed by the hon. Member for Rochdale, whose absence from the House he (Mr. Hopwood) deplored, although, no doubt, Her Majesty's Ministers were glad of it, because possibly some ugly questions might have been put to him had he happened to be present. He regretted the even balance of parties, because it begot insincerity in public men. In his opinion, the time had arrived when the only method of forming a strong Government was by an admixture of the Conservative element on both sides of the House. If that were the case, he believed that we should see better measures introduced; that Government would not succumb to the anti-church rate agitation; and that there would be no question raised about Parliamentary Reform. The differences between the Conservative portion of the Ministerial party and the Opposition were now mere matters of history; they no longer existed in reality; and it was only with the view of obtaining the support of Gentlemen below the gangway that many measures had been introduced and pressed forward through the House in the past and present Session. As this Bill had been brought in, however, they might as well have had a good one, and if the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary was the author of it, he must endorse the opinion that the noble Lord was the most overrated Statesman that had ever sat high in public office. There was plenty of time to have prepared it in, as well as ample experience on the part of the Government. He must, however, submit that, as far as the present Parliament was concerned, it had performed its duties well, and that it would be unwise to kill the bird that had laid the golden egg. But it was difficult to find any one who spoke in favour of the present measure. Indeed, it was apologised for by the noble Lord himself when he brought it in, for its unpretending character, although they were now told that it was most democratic in its provisions. It had not been well and maturely considered, and he believed that if an Amendment were put, that it did not satisfy the just expectations of the people, it would receive the support of every honest man in the House. It contained no provision for registration or for new polling places. It made no attempt to protect the exercise of the franchise by means of a system of voting papers or otherwise. It omitted to introduce a lodger franchise. It failed to admit a certain amount of intelligence to counter-balance the £6 voters, and it left the present boundaries of boroughs untouched, although no one could doubt that they required revision and extension, owing to the increase which had taken place in buildings and population since the year 1832. The present system of employing agents at elections was admitted on all hands to be most mischievous; and he thought that the disfranchisement of beerhouses would be an excellent thing. He disapproved also of the practice of canvassing. He did not think that it was a good thing at all for Members or paid agents to go about canvassing the electors. Let hon. Gentlemen content themselves with getting on the platform and making speeches, and cease any longer to resort to a practice which was prejudicial to the morality of the country, and lay at the very foundation of all the bribery and corruption of which they heard so many complaints. Again, he would ask why should four brick walls be the only test of fitness for the possession of the franchise in boroughs? Why did they give the vote to the house and not to the man? This, too, was a subject which might well be considered. Were there no other means of conferring the franchise? Had not the people who paid income tax some right to be represented in this House? The noble Lord, had he chosen, might have brought in a Bill that would have rendered his name illustrious in the annals of the country, but instead of that, he had prepared a measure about which one-half of his own colleagues on the Treasury Bench cared nothing whatever. Their only care, indeed, was as to on which side of the House they should sit. What he wanted to see was, not the franchise lowered to the man, but the man raised to the franchise. The noble Lord and the Member for Birmingham used the term "working classes" in a very different sense. The working man of whom the noble Lord spoke was the artisan who devoted his time, talent, and energy, to raising himself in the social scale; whereas the working man of the hon. Member for Birmingham was a mere mechanic, who stood behind a machine, was acted upon by all kinds of influences, was the creature of impulse, and peculiarly open to bribery and corruption. The working man of the noble Lord and the working man of the hon. Member for Birmingham were, therefore, totally different persons. He saw the hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) sitting opposite. That hon. Gentleman was a Member of the Government, but seeing the reception which he had once met with from the working men of Kidderminster, he presumed he was not very anxious to entrust the franchise to such hands. Then at Sheffield, too, he understood that the master-manufacturers were not desirous that so much power should be given to the working classes. Indeed, he had heard reports that a short time ago, in consequence of a disagreement with their masters concerning the introduction of machinery, or something of the sort, the workpeople took the matter into their own hands, went to the manufactories, and attempted to set them on fire by throwing vitriol and other combustibles about the premises. The magistrates were applied to, but they dared not take notice of it lest a riot might have been the result, and subsequently he understood the matter was laid before the Home Secretary. How it ended he did not know; he spoke only from what he had heard reported on the subject. He believed that if the Bill were to go into Committee, it would be met by such a volley of Amendments that it would be impossible to pass it in the present Session. The Bill had disappointed the just expectations of the country, the people were disgusted with it, and he hoped that the Ministers would gratify the wishes of many even of their own friends by withdrawing such an imperfect and unsatisfactory measure.

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. Hopwood

MR. CAIRD said, that when he heard the observations which had been made by the hon. Member who had just sat down, but more especially of those of the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), with regard to the hon. Member for Birmingham, he was at first sorry that that hon. Member, having already spoken in the debate, was thereby prevented from defending himself; but when he reflected on the public spirit and political disinterestedness of his hon. Friend, he then felt that no defence was really required. He would therefore turn to the speech of the right hon. Member for Hertford (Sir E. B. Lytton) which he thought more brilliant than conclusive. It rested mainly on the proposition that if one class should predominate over any other class, the common interest was gone. Now, it was on that very ground that he supported the Bill of the Government, as it was his belief that the working men were not only predominated over in the present constituency, but could hardly be said to be recognized in it at all. He would readily grant all the conclusions of the right hon. Gentleman, if the result of this Bill should be to reverse the present system, and to give to one class, and that the lowest, the predominance. But he should endeavour to prove that no such result would ensue, and, unless the Bill of the Government had been framed with the very object of admitting a due proportion of the working classes to the franchise, it would not have had his support. It was conceded on all sides that the exclusion of the working classes was the main defect of the first Reform Bill.

Would this Bill afford a safe remedy for that defect? He should endeavour to show that it would. And first, as to the extent of the change—from the Census Returns of 1851—it appeared that there were 4,800,000 inhabited houses in the United Kingdom, and as the present constituency numbered about 1,200,000 there was thus one elector for every four households in the country. The Secretary for the Home Department, who had the best means of knowing, estimated an addition of 400,000 at the utmost, as the effect of this Bill. That would give one elector for every three households in place of one in four; and that being the extent of the change it could not be deemed either sweeping or dangerous. It was not only very far short of universal suffrage, but it was also very far short of household suffrage, inasmuch as only 1,600,000 householders would be admitted, while upwards of 3,200,000 would still be excluded. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that in the next thirty years large numbers of those still excluded would gradually come in; but that was a result which ought naturally to flow from increasing prosperity and intelligence. An illustration of the effect of such a change as would be made by this Bill might be found in Scotland and Ireland. One man in twenty of the whole population in England at present had a vote, one in thirty in Scotland, and one in thirty-four in Ireland. On the two latter countries the addition made to the constituency by this Bill would be to give to Scotland and Ireland the same proportion of electors to population—namely, one in twenty—as had been with perfect safety enjoyed by England for the last thirty years. During all that time the franchise, though equal in name, was practically one-third more democratic in England than in the sister kingdom, and yet no one would charge English Members with any special leaning to democracy. But let them take another view. Assuming that the whole of the present voters were above the class of working men, and even admitting for a moment that the whole of the new constituency would be of that class, there would still be more than three to one against the latter. Not only was there no proof, however, of the new constituency being solely composed of the working class, but he would be able to show that the proof was the other way. The Return from the city of Edinburgh, which he held in his hand, would satisfactorily dispose of another objection that had been raised by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, namely, the monotonous character of the new constituency. This Return, which was attested by the assessor for Edinburgh, and the particulars of which had been collected by him with great care, furnished information regarding the occupations and pursuits of the people of every class, down to the poorest, such as had not before been exhibited in a form so full and complete. It was shown by it that, instead of monotony in their pursuits, the new constituency followed 174 separate occupations. The population of Edinburgh was at present about 180,000, and the male householders were 22,058. Of these about 8,000 were occupiers of £10 houses and upwards. By the £6 franchise about 4,000 would be added, but upwards of 10,000 householders in Edinburgh would still be excluded; so that if Edinburgh were to be taken as a tolerably fair example of the general result of the new Bill among large populations, not metropolitan, it appeared that no such sweeping changes as had been attributed to it would be effected by this Bill. He would quote some figures from the Return which he thought would be of interest to the House. Of the new constituency, that is of those between £6 and £10, nearly three-fourths were of the working class, skilled artisans chiefly, the remaining fourth comprising the same classes as now possessed the £10 franchise. Of mere labourers there would be but a fortieth part of the new constituency, and less than 100th part of the whole body of electors. Among those to be enfranchised there would be 33 agents, 2 architects, 12 artists, 10 booksellers, 34 bakers, 111 clerks, 31 commercial travellers, 15 engravers, 14 drapers, 61 Government officials, 14 inspectors, 11 lithographers, 11 missionaries, 3 naval and military officers, 4 photographers, 6 sculptors, 8 stationers, 2 surgeons and physicians, 10 teachers, &c. Referring to the different trades and occupations in which there were more than 500 persons engaged he found that of clerks there were 544, of whom 377 were at present on the roll as £10 householders, 111 others would be enfranchised by this Bill, and 56 would be still excluded. Of 1,171 boot and shoemakers, 202 were at present on the roll, 202 would be added to the number, and 745 would continue to be excluded. Of 528 cabinet-makers and upholsterers, to the 154 who were already on the roll, 157 would now be added, and 217 would remain unenfranchised. Of 710 carpenters, 230 would now be added to 127 already enjoying the franchise, and 353 would continue to be excluded. Of 519 printers and compositors, the 126 who were already voters would be strengthened by an addition of 166; and 227 would remain still off the roll. And in the case of common labourers, to whom more than any of the others the objection on the score of monotony ought to be applicable, out of a total number of 1,767 there were 17 who were already on the roll, 113 would be added, and 1,637 would be excluded. These facts showed that no constituency could be more various in their interests and pursuits or less likely to combine against any one class. The lodger franchise, if it were added, would give little more than 300 voters in Edinburgh—men well qualified, and to whom the franchise could be most safely intrusted. He hoped these facts would satisfy the House that, while the Bill of the Government would, on the one hand, make no dangerous or overbalancing addition to the constituency, it would secure representatives from every class in the community at present excluded. As to the fitness of such men to exercise the franchise, he would urge the great extension of education among the people which had taken place since 1831, the diffusion of cheap and instructive literature, the increased intelligence among workmen from the universality of the application of steam-power, which required and created intelligence, the prevalence of order and content, and the loyalty exhibited on a recent occasion by the establishment of numerous volunteer artisan corps throughout the country. If at the time of the Reform Bill of 1832 £10 was considered a criterion of sufficient intelligence, surely the occupiers of £6 houses now were equally intelligent with the class of £10 householders then. He could not give the same favourable opinion of the county franchise proposed by this Bill, and he thought that the character of monotony would be much more applicable to it. As it stood it was a lower franchise than that of the boroughs, for, as the value of land was included, any allotment tenant or small dairyman whose house might not be worth more than 1s. 6d. a week might be admitted. The land which a man occupied for his means of living should no more be taken into account than the stock in trade of a small tradesman, the tools of a skilled artisan, or the looms of a handloom weaver. In this respect the Scotch Bill was much better, for it contained a proviso that the dwelling-house should be of £5 value; and unless it was the intention of Government to swamp the 40s. freeholders by the admission of a numerous body of the most dependent class, he would strongly urge upon them the adoption of a similar proviso in this Bill. As a Scotch Member, he could not but condemn that portion of the Bill which related to Scotland, as unfair and unjust. Scotland had always shown herself able and willing to bear her fair share of the public burdens, and she had a claim to be treated exactly on the same footing as England in regard to the distribution of seats. The noble Lord had repeatedly declared that in apportioning Members he was obliged to be guided by population. If he had taken population alone, or population and property combined, and if he had treated Scotland exactly on the same footing as England, he could not have run his eye along the list of counties and boroughs, and have passed by the great counties of Lanark, Ayr, Aberdeen, Perth, and Fife, and the great towns of Dundee and Aberdeen. Every English county, except one or two, had at present four Members; every Irish county had two; and every Welsh county, having a population over 70,000, had two. Not a single Scotch county had more than one. It was proposed to give an additional Member to certain English counties. The five Scotch counties he had named were as populous and rich as five of those in the schedule, each of which was now to have five Members while these important Scotch counties continued to have but one. Lanarkshire was three times as populous and five times as wealthy as West Cornwall, to which it was proposed to give another Member. And the disparity with regard to boroughs was even greater. Dundee, with 90,000 people, and Aberdeen, with 80,000, were together to have no more voice in Parliament than the borough of Cockermouth. A great deal had been said in the discussion of this question on the example afforded to us by American institutions. He certainly had no desire to see them imported here. They were better fitted for the wants of a vast new country, where our cumbrous and slow modes of procedure would be a clog upon its progress. But had there been, since the world began, any similar instance of progress? There was no Established Church there; but there was a Christian church to every 3,600 inhabitants. Within seventy years a scattered population of less than 4,000,000 had grown up to nearly 30,000,000 of people. Within the last thirty years the value of her native produce exported had increased five-fold, her steam tonnage ten-fold, her coinage twenty-fold, and within the same time she constructed upwards of 20,000 miles of railway. Instead of being wasteful of the public money, as had been alleged, her total expenditure of every kind, both federal and local, in 1858, was only £23,500,000; and in that was included upwards of £3,000,000 for public education, besides the whole charge for lighting her sea coasts. Her public debt had been reduced from £25,500,000 in 1816 to £6,200,000 in 1856. The manners of the people were rough and uncouth—or appeared so to Englishmen—but the great body of them were comfortable and independent, and every one had his political rights. It had been charged against them that they had no enlightened legislation; but any one who would run down the list of the Acts passed in the Session of 1858 would see at once that their legislation was very far from being deficient in prudence and foresight. There might be impending dangers in our European alliances, and it would be well if, instead of endeavouring to raise a feeling which might separate the two countries, we would remember that there was an Anglo-Saxon nation on the other side of the ocean, and do all in our power to bind England and the United States together. We had plenty of hopeless mismanagement and extravagance at home. This was no question of a form of government; but, having some experience of the United States and having witnessed the wonderful progress that had been achieved there, he would not accept the lesson which noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen had attempted to draw from that nation as an argument against the British people being intrusted with any share in the government of their own country. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to be afraid of numbers. If the country was in danger would it not be to numbers that they would look for defence? Would there be any selection of £10 householders then? We trusted the lowest class of the people to defend the Empire and guard its honour, and, whether in the Crimea or in India, nobly had that duty been performed. Should we then fear to extend to the best of that working class a limited share in the election of a Member of Parliament? And, if a struggle were really impending over Europe, was it not more necessary to enlist every sympathy of our own people by bringing within the pale of the Constitution many of the vigorous hands who might yet be called to aid in its defence?

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. Caird

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, it used to be the annual custom to call the attention of the House to the state of the nation, but on this occasion he thought the attention of the nation ought to be called to the state of the House. People outside that House ought to understand what the real sentiments of those inside were, not from the manner in which they voted, and from what they said in the House, but from the real sentiments which they expressed of the Bill in the lobbies. He would undertake to say, that if every Member would vote according to the opinion he really held with regard to the measure, the result of a division would show an immense majority against the Government. It was a Bill upon which every epithet of contumely and ridicule had been thrown. To use the language of Mr. Shiel, it conceded without conciliating and interfered without prevailing. It satisfied no person outside and no Member inside the House. It was one which Members were discussing early and late, simply because leading statesmen on both sides had made ill-considered pledges, which they sought to redeem in a most ill-considered manner. There was one point, however, upon which they would all agree, and that was that it was only an instalment, but not a settlement of the Reform question. He (Mr. Cochrane) fully agreed with the sentiments expressed by the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire, whose brilliant speech would live in the memory of man as long as the English language existed. He fully believed that if a deed could be drawn up, the terms of which should be an agreement that this Bill was a settlement of the question of Reform for twenty years only, and if that deed were signed by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), and by the leaders of the Opposition, that, bad as he considered the Bill to be, it would be desirable to pass it. But when they were told that it was but an instalment—that it was to be followed up by another immediately after it had passed—then he thought it an act of perfect insanity to allow a Bill so fraught with evil to be carried. It reminded him of one of Æsop's fables. A woodman went into a wood and asked the wood to give him a handle for a hatchet. To so modest a request as that the whole forest unanimously consented. The handle was fitted, but no sooner fitted than the woodman began to cut down the finest and tallest of the trees, and, as he approached an old and aged oak the oak bent over to a noble cedar and said—"One concession has ruined us all." Such was the position in which the House then stood if they conceded this Bill, not to Her Majesty's Government, but to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). For his own part he readily admitted that if they were to have a Reform Bill at all they must carry the franchise down to as low a rental as £6. But he would boldly state, as he had done on the hustings, that he was altogether opposed to a Reform Bill. The present system worked well. It might not be the most perfect constitution, but it worked well. There was no popular desire to change it; but if they were to change it they could not do otherwise than drop at once from the £10 to £6. Indeed, he did not see why they should stop at £6, or even £5, or £4, nor why they should not at once have universal suffrage. He saw no advantage in treating it homœopathically. There was no doubt of the result of such a Bill as this—it was as certain as anything could be that it would lead indubitably to universal suffrage. He thought everybody ought to look with great pity upon the Treasury Bench; there was no mincing the matter—the whole thing was in a fix. It reminded him of that scene in The Critic where everybody had got a dagger, and Puff says to Sneer—"Now there's a situation—there's a dead lock, and I don't know who'll get out of it first." Such was the situation of the Treasury Bench at this moment, and it was difficult to know who would get out of it first. But the fact was, that the Government had misapprehended the people's anxiety for Reform, and when they made the pledge they had uttered to bring in a Reform Bill they had not anticipated the Treaty and the Budget, which had been forced upon them by the hon. Member for Birmingham and the hon. Member for Rochdale; and he thought, therefore, they might very fairly withdraw this Bill, until at any rate they were acquainted with the result of the Committee appointed by the Lords to inquire into the state of the franchise. With respect to the working classes, he desired it should be most distinctly understood that he had no dread of them, for he knew they were deeply sensible of having been born under the blessings of a free constitution, of the advantages they possessed over other countries in Europe, and, strong in conviction, he certainly entertained no sense of danger from such a quarter. He did fear the influence of those who controlled the movements of the working classes. They had ascertained the enormous influence exercised over them by those who controlled their political opinions. They knew the political influence of one hon. Gentleman in that House, the weight they carried in the country, how far they influenced the working classes. He thought the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham had been latterly overlooked in that House. [Laughter.] He meant the views expressed by that Gentleman outside, not inside, the House, had been overlooked. Inside the House that hon. Member assumed totally different positions. It was said that March came in like a lion and went out like a lamb; the hon. Member reversed the proverb, he came in like a lamb and went out like a lion. It was difficult to say, indeed, whether he was a wolf in sheep's clothing outside the House or a sheep in wolf's clothing inside the House; or whether they were frightened when they heard him speak in the House, as Jacob or that of Esau. But, for the purpose of showing what the hon. Member's sentiments really were, he would refer to a collected edition of his speeches at Birmingham, Manchester, London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Bradford, and Exeter, and all revised by himself. He made reference because he thought it right that they were going to legislate at the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, that at least they should know of what they had to beware; and then, if they were foolish enough to pass the Bill which he told them would promote the objects expressed in his speeches, they would have to complain of themselves. In 1859 the hon. Gentleman had modified his views, for he found a danger would result from them; like the woodman, he had to begin cutting his trees carefully and cautiously; therefore it would be as well to go a little further back, when he was somewhat bolder, in 1858, for then they would know at what his real opinions were. On the 27th October, 1858, the hon. Gentleman in a speech he made at Birmingham said—

Mr. Baillie Cochran

"How can I reconcile a free representation of the people in the House of Commons with the inevitable disposition which rests in a born of Peers? Now we must decide this. Choose you this day whom you will. If the Peers are to be your masters, as past that their ancestors were the conquerors, serve them [Never!] But if you will only the laws, the laws of your country, the making of which you have been consulting, you may go on straight to discuss this question of Parliamentary Reform."

at the hon. Member argued that there be no free representation of the people without the abolition of the House of

MR. BRIGHT said, he was ashamed to say anything about this matter, but the hon. Member (Mr. B. Cochrane) had furnished the sentence he quoted with words which he (Mr. Bright) had never uttered. He only asked for fair play.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had merely stated what he conceived to be a fair inference fairly to be drawn from the hon. Member's speech. It proceeded thus: "I am not going to attack the House of Peers." [Mr. BRIGHT.—Read it all.] He was sorry if he had expressed himself in a manner likely to lead to any misapprehension, but he merely intended to convey to the House his own inference from what he had said.

He would, however, make another statement. Further on in the same speech the hon. Member said—

"There is another kind of Peer, which I am not going to touch upon—that creature of—what shall I say? of monstrous, nay, even of adulterous birth, the virtual Peer."

BRIGHT.—Hear, hear.] There was no mistaking that "Hear, hear!" Then Mr. Bright touched up the House of Peers as they were, they came to the opinions and views of the hon. Member as to the great territorial families of England, thus expressing himself:—

"What has been the fate of those who were enthroned at the Revolution, and whose supremacy has been for so long a period undisputed among us? Mr. Kinglake, the author of an interesting book on Eastern travel, describing the views of some of the acquaintances he made in the Syrian deserts, says that the jackals of the desert follow their prey in families like the place-hunters of Europe. I will reverse, if you like, the comparison, and say that the great territorial families of England which were enthroned at the Revolution have followed their prey like the jackals of the desert."

The hon. Member for Birmingham went on to say—

"That there is no actuary in existence who can calculate how much of the wealth, of the strength, of the supremacy of the territorial families of England and how much has been derived from an unholy participation in the fruits of the industry of the people, which have been wrested from them by every device of taxation, and squandered in every conceivable crime of which a Government could possibly be guilty. The more you examine this matter the more you will come to the conclusion which I have arrived at, that this foreign policy, this regard for 'the liberties of Europe,' this care at one time for 'Protestant interests,' this excessive love for the 'balance of power,' is neither more nor less than a gigantic system of out-door relief for the aristocracy of Great Britain."

This was the way in which the hon. Gentleman spoke of the aristocracy and the Church of this country, and they were called upon to pass a Reform Bill which the hon. Member described as an instalment towards lowering the franchise, in order to enable him to take ulterior steps to overthrow the Church and aristocracy. The hon. Member for Birmingham had further said he foresaw the day when a Revolution would arise between the upper and the working classes of this country, and that after the Reform Bill was carried—what would he do? Why, he should attack the Established Church and the feudalism of the dark ages.

MR. BRIGHT: The hon. Member did not say where he got his last quotation from. I have no recollection of saying anything of the kind, and I think he might entertain the House with something better than mere imaginary speeches.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE could only say he had copied it from a report of what purported to be a speech by the hon. Gentleman. If he disavowed it, he only hoped that his intercourse with the bench on that side of the House had moderated the views of the hon. Gentleman. He would not complain so much of these particular sentences, but he would ask whether the entire tone of his speeches was not calculated to excite the feelings of the country against the upper classes? The hon. Gentleman further said in another speech—

"Do you not see the same interests arrayed against you, the same greed of power, the same hate of reform, with our military services grown up into unheard of magnitude?"

And again:—

"If I tell you that peace and peaceful industry are your path of wisdom and of greatness—if I say that it is your taxes that are spent, your sweat which is pawned, your blood which is shed in war, am I less your countryman, or less loyal to my country?"

Was not this language, he would ask, calculated to anticipate the time when one class in this country would be set against another? When the hon. Gentleman dealt with matters abroad he should state the facts of history. The other day he endeavoured to—voured to establish a parallel between the state of this country and of France when a Reform Bill was previously attempted, and led his audience to suppose that it was this country that began the war with France in the first Revolution. Everybody except himself knew that France declared war against us, and that we fought not for any selfish interests, but for the liberties of England and of the whole of Europe:—though no doubt there were then, as now, those who would say, “Perish Savoy and liberty, and everything except commercial advantages.” The hon. Gentleman was very fond of referring to the advantages of American institutions. It was strange that, according to a writer in the last number of The Quarterly, American families were constantly engaged in tracing back their descent from English families, and that a Mr. Bright, of Boston, had actually published a book to prove that he was descended from the Brights of Suffolk, at the same time repudiating any connection with the family of the hon. Member for Birmingham. It had been said that this was just the time to pass the Bill, because it was not asked for; but he believed the noble Lord wished to pass the measure, although he had been taunted with not wishing to do so; and his dealing with reform had been likened to the periodical process of taking down a suit of clothes, brushing them up, and putting them away. But what was really the remarkable thing about the measure was the apathy and indifference that existed with reference to it. In order to pass a Reform Bill they must have some moving power, what the sailors call some steerage way, some great guiding impulse. Carlyle had well said that “nothing was so fatal to men or measures as apathy or indifference.” A gale of wind in any quarter was preferable to a dead calm; and a horse that went either way was better than one that stood still; and a passionate woman better than a silent one that would not speak at all. He believed they could not carry a measure of this sort unless there was an indication of its being wanted out of doors, and that the people took an interest in it. The noble Lord could not have foreseen the error of the hon. Member for Birmingham in describing the Bill as an instalment, or the error of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in stating that the finances of the country would be considered and settled by a House of Commons which more adequately represented the wishes of the people—a most significant statement when coupled with the scheme propounded by the hon. Member for Birmingham for the abolition of Customs' duties, and the institution of a gigantic tax upon property. The proposed Bill was not solely one of reform in Parliament, but one that would ultimately affect the whole financial interests of the country; and if they passed this Reform Bill they would have another of a more overwhelming description when the new Parliament met, and that was the reason he dreaded the present measure. What was the opinion entertained abroad of the constitution of this country? What said Montalembert, one of the most eminent men that France had produced, and whose comparison instituted between England and France rendered him worthy of the honour of an imperial prosecution. Speaking of the Constitution of England, he said:—

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

“When I am stifled under the weight of an atmosphere charged with vile and corrupt influences, I start to breathe a purer air and take a bath of life in free England. Not only does the nation not demand any organic change, but no party, new or old, seriously entertains it. Never has the constitution been so universally respected, so faithfully guarded, so affectionately invoked by all who wish—

‘That England long may be,
The holy and the happy, and the gloriously free.’”

This was the opinion of one who contrasted this state of things in England with that universal suffrage and division of property, which had led to despotism at home and spoliation abroad—measures that the hon. Member for Birmingham wished to introduce. These were the reasons, frankly and freely, why he should give his vote against the Bill; and he believed that if every hon. Member voted according to his honour and conviction, they might vote upon the Bill with the certainty of throwing it out by two to one. After what he had quoted from the speeches of the hon. Member for Birmingham, he thought the House would be able to see what they would have to trust to if this measure were carried, and which, if passed, would be fraught with unknown evils to the constitution of this country.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, this Bill had been before the House several weeks, and the subject before the country several years; but, as an Irish Member, he felt it right to say a few words. It was a most important consideration that five-sixths of the Members of that House were elected by England, so that Ireland was deeply interested in any change the constitution of that House which legislated for the whole kingdom. The last Reform Bill had produced a greater effect on the Government of Ireland, and more beneficial measures had been passed for that country than it ever had from the time of Strongbow to the time of George IV. It was a great truism that every advance in popular privileges was a blessing if the people were fit to receive it, and a curse if they were not, and we were now in a tolerably good position to judge of the fitness of the people of England. We did not exist in the comparative darkness of 1831. A change had been effected without alarm, violence, or convulsion; and what was the tone and temper of the nation now? Was not the monarchy in much less danger than at the time when Ministers were afraid to allow even a popular Sovereign like William IV. to go and dine in the City just prior to the proposal of the last Reform Bill? Was not the property of the country in a very different condition to what it was at the time of the Swing riots? How differently were the Church and the aristocracy regarded? Go where they would in the former period, either to public meetings or outside a stage-coach, and it was the invariable custom to run down the aristocracy and abuse the Bishops. How differently even were the public caricatures. They now saw no exhibitions of Bishops hanging, and calling it justifiable homicide. How different was the meaning attached now to the word "Radical," to then. Then it was thought that a Radical was a low, vulgar, impudent person, who showed both his independence by his ignorance and by his disrespect of others. It was then impossible to be an honest reformer without being abused, and indeed the words radical and blackguard were at that time synonymous terms. Experience had however now shown that a man might be an honest reformer of abuses, and an honest advocate for the extension of popular rights, without indulging in the low scurrility that was held to characterize the Radical of a former day. Reform measures were then and now proposed in a different temper, and it was felt that no great country like England could go on without saving from time to time to lop off old abuses. It was said that even supposing that a popular Parliament should be able to manage public affairs effectively in time of peace, they would be unable to do so in time of war; but the answer to that allegation was, that the disasters in the Crimea were speedily corrected under the direction of a reformed Parliament, while it took fourteen years to correct the mismanagement of the army until the Peninsular war, when the Government was in the hands of an oligarchy. It was notorious that a greater portion of the expenses was paid during the late war out of the current expenditure than during the great French war; and was there not reason to suppose that a fresh infusion of the popular element would now produce corresponding benefits? The objections to the Bill had been mainly directed against the extension of the franchise to £6 occupiers in towns; but the objections could not be sustained, when it appeared, from the evidence before the Masters and Operatives' Committee, that the operatives had wonderfully improved during the last ten years in self-respect, intelligence, economy, and conduct; therefore he thought it was but right that these classes should be admitted within the pale of the constitution. Some persons regarded with fear any great extension of the intelligence of the working men, because it would enable them to combine against other classes; but social science was now better understood by both upper and lower classes, and the result was that neither class had any sort of antagonistic feeling against the other. It was apparent to the working classes that they had no interest in attacking capital and property, and that such attacks were likely in the long run to have a disastrous reaction upon themselves. He had heard a great deal of the preponderance that was likely to be given by this Bill to the working classes in certain constituencies, and believed the case was exaggerated; but supposing that their preponderating power in certain constituencies should lead to the return of sixty or eighty Members under the influence of the working classes, would that be too large a representation for them in an Assembly composed of 658 Members. Nothing was so likely to show both what could be done and what could not be done for the working people, as the presence of a few of their representatives in the House. This would do a great deal to put down agitation and humbugs of all sorts, and when the demands of the working people were well weighed, they were not so absurd as some persons supposed them to be. In the year 1842 a petition was presented from the working classes by the hon. Member for Finchbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) deploring of any kind of monopoly—condemning taxes on the necessities of life, and particularly the articles required by the working classes—also complaining of the monopoly in land, in machinery, in the press, and in railways; and if all these complaints were now considered, it would be evident that the working classes were not so wrong as they were thought to be at the time in setting forth their alleged grievances. If the legislation of the country had not been in error since 1842, the working classes of that time had some reason to complain, for the whole course of legislation since that time had been to take off the taxes on articles of necessary consumption. It was a wrong assumption that the working classes would always remain in their present position. With equal laws, diffused intelligence, and freedom of transfer of land, they would have such facilities for rising in the world that we might hope to see such a fusion of classes as would render class legislation absurd and impossible. Since the year 1832 the line of demarcation between the manufacturing and commercial classes on the one side, and the landed aristocracy on the other, was not so strongly marked as it was before that time; and he indulged in a sanguine hope that a similar fusion would take place between the middle and working classes. It was not fair to draw a comparison between the political state of this country and that of Australia or the United States; for the colonists and the Americans had not yet had time to form a class which would have any great preponderance to counteract, what might in common language be called the “rowdy” element. He frankly owned he would willingly have seen the redistribution of seats go a little farther than it did at present. He believed, however, that practical difficulties existed in that way, which rendered it necessary to make some sort of compromise. He had heard that if there were too large a redistribution of seats made, the brilliant orators, such as existed in the unreformed Parliament, would not be found in it. He dissented from that objection, for their object was to get good legislation, and he recollected that the very brilliant powers of the orators, who figured in the unreformed Parliament, were often employed in making the worse appear the better. Was it not more desirable to have cheapness, plenty, and the “unadorned eloquence” of the honourable Member for Rochdale, than what had been termed by the noble Lord the Member for London

Mr. Pollard-Urquhart

“the umbrageous fancy of Mr. Burke,” and “the magnifying power of oratory in the mouths of such men as Mr. Fox and Mr. Canning” together with laws the avowed object of which was to produce dearness and scarcity. He firmly believed, that by the results which would flow from this measure, we should be the envy of all the nations of Europe, by the rational liberty which it would give to the people of this country; and he had great confidence as to these results.

MR. DU CANE said, he did not rise to follow the hon. Member who had just sat down through the speech he had just delivered with so much energy and rapidity. He did not wish to dispute the correctness of his definition of the term “Radical” in 1832, nor had he any desire at that moment to question the moderation of the Chartist sentiments of 1842. He had followed with much attention the debate on this Bill, and had listened to speeches both for and against it on both sides of the House; yet he now rose to address them in a state of considerable mental bewilderment as to who were its supporters. He remembered that it was said, towards the close of the great debate which preceded the downfall of Lord Derby’s Administration, that they were about to witness a little wholesome clearance of the political atmosphere, that old differences had been healed, and that from henceforth a perfect unanimity of sentiment would be found pervading the hearts of the great Liberal party. He had not the least doubt that at that particular moment there was a perfect unanimity of sentiment pervading the hearts of the great Liberal party; but looking at the amount of contradiction which had been manifested, as regarded the purpose of this measure, in the course of this debate on both sides of the House, he was induced to fear that, like other instances of Liberal cohesion, which they had witnessed within the last few years, it had been of a somewhat short-lived character. He had certainly been surprised at the contrariety of some of the opinions which had been expressed on the other side of the House as regarded the merits of this measure. The hon. Member for Birmingham—[“Oh, oh”]—he could assure them his reference to the hon. Member for Birmingham would be very short and very harmless. The hon. Member signified his gracious acceptance of the Bill because it was a simple Bill, because it was an instalment, and because it entirely excluded fancy franchises.

On the other hand, the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) condemned the measure for the self-same reason. The hon. Member for Birmingham spoke with something approaching to contempt and indifference of the limited number of those that the Bill would admit to the exercise of the franchise; while the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone was in raptures at the thousands or rather tens of thousands he hoped shortly to embrace as his new constituents. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) in an honest and unvarnished tale that did infinite credit to his political sagacity, did not hesitate to denounce the Bill as dangerous and revolutionary. But, on the other hand, the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) cordially supported the Bill because when he had succeeded in introducing into it all the provisions of the Bill of last year, he thought upon the whole it would be rather Conservative. But his (Mr. Denman's) faith in the hon. and learned Member's Conservatism received a rude shock at the commencement of his speech, when he said that in that masterpiece of eloquence which had been delivered by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton), he could see no argument, and that the House had nothing to do with the Government of France or the condition of the United States. He must say he questioned the depth and the soundness of that Conservative feeling which, when we were on the eve of a great political change, shut its eyes to the past, and closed its ears to the lessons addressed to us through the page of contemporaneous history. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary recommended the Bill because, he said, it would at least do us no harm; but the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Lassey) gave it as his opinion, both by his speech and that Motion which so abruptly vanished, that it would do him no good; while the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Berkeley) said that he swallowed this Bill as he would an homœopathic globule, convinced that it would do him neither good or harm. When he saw the state of complete contradiction at which they had arrived, though he did not wish to introduce party topics, he thought they had a right to ask who it was that had brought this question to such a dead lock? He thought they had a right to ask the noble author of this measure what practical benefit the country or the House had obtained from affirming his Resolution of last year; and how it was that some of them, at least, were not now assembled in the first Session of a Reformed Parliament. It was somewhat difficult for any one to discover what novelty of a startling character this Bill contained that might not have been introduced into the Bill of last year in Committee. Let them take the first feature of this Bill. In the Bill of last year they had the materials ready to hand to effect a reduction of the county franchise to £10. As to the second feature, they might have also effected a reduction in the borough franchise. The then Government opposed the Resolution of the noble Lord because it was brought forward at an unfair time, and raised an unfair issue; but they had no evidence that if they had gone into Committee on that measure, and an Amendment had been brought forward to reduce the borough franchise to £8 or to £6, and if that Amendment had been carried, that the Government would not have accepted the proposition. And supposing that they had not, but had declared that the carrying of the Amendment would be fatal to the Bill, even then the House would not have been in any worse position than they were now, inasmuch as they would have obtained from the House a direct expression of opinion as regarded the limits to which it was inclined to extend the borough franchise. To come to the third and last prominent feature of the noble Lord's Bill they surely might, without any superhuman amount of exertion, have extended the redistribution of seats to the somewhat narrow limits at which even now the noble Lord intended to rest it. But they had in the former Bill what they had not now, but what they must have again before they witnessed a satisfactory settlement of this question. They had various franchises, which acted upon the working classes on the principle of self-selection, and which would have extended the franchise to thousands of industrious and intelligent artisans who were entirely passed over by the present Bill. The noble Lord now made a present of his measure to the House, and said, "Go into Committee on the Bill, and then do what you like with it; raise the franchise in boroughs if you think that it is too low; introduce a lodger clause; restore the fancy franchises—in point of fact, do whatever you like with the Bill, only pass a measure of Reform before Bristol is sacked and Nottingham Castle is in flames." But the noble Lord must allow him to say that this sudden gush of generosity came one year too late, and that, patient and long-suffering as they always were, he was taxing at that moment somewhat severely the generosity and forbearance of the Conservative party. It was certainly rather trying to the temper to have a commodious residence that it had been the labour of months to erect and furnish, blown about your ears, and to survey from the opposite side the broken and disjointed fabric; but Job himself would venture a gentle remonstrance when the crafty engineer who fired the mine took forcible possession of the ground and pressed you into the service of himself and his colleagues to reconstruct and refurnish the building on the original model. He would not say whether it might be possible to reconstruct the edifice of Reform on the somewhat slender foundation which the noble Lord had lain down, but this he did not hesitate to say, that this Bill, as it now stood, was by far the most dangerous and one-sided that had yet been presented to them. The Home Secretary told them the other night that he was quite unable to understand the arguments that they on that side of the House had advanced—that this Bill, to begin with, was insignificant and an abortion, and then that it was dangerous and revolutionary. But with due deference he would tell that right hon. Gentleman that this particular measure was obnoxious to both these charges. The Conservatives said that as regarded any immediate proposition for satisfactory settlement the Bill was both insignificant and abortive, and inasmuch as it would thus unsettle everything and settle nothing, in its future consequences it would be both mischievous and revolutionary. What they said was, if a measure of Reform is to be passed this Session, let it not be a Bill merely framed to be passed, but one that will include every branch of the representative system which it appears to the House to be desirable to Reform. This measure did not even profess to do that. Upon the great subject of registration, upon those of polling booths, and payment of travelling expenses for voters, this Bill was silent as the grave. A hint had, indeed been thrown out, that they were to be treated to a Supplementary Reform Bill, containing provisions on one or two of these heads when a certain Committee on corrupt practices had published their Report. This, if it was an argument for anything, was an excellent one for postponement of the whole question until that Report was published, for all must agree that if any matter was more intimately connected than another with corrupt practices it was the extension of the suffrage. This Bill largely increased the number of voters in the county constituencies; but did it make any provision for remedying the disparity between the number of borough and of the county Members? On the contrary, the noble Lord appeared to have done just enough to show that he acknowledged, whilst he refused to grapple with, the grievance. He appeared to have acted on this plan. Something must be done to stop the mouths of the county Members, and he must, of course, make a special reservation in favour of Lancashire and Yorkshire; and, as to the others, why he would subject them all to the operation of the Ballot, and take the first twelve counties that turned up for increase of Members. On what other principle could the noble Lord have given a Member to a division of the county that he (Mr. Du Cane) represented—of which he did not complain—but how was it that this county, having a population of 189,000 and a constituency of 5,400 should have an extra Member, when the Bill passed over 17 divisions of counties, all of larger population and, he believed, all with a larger number of registered electors? The noble Lord might, perhaps, say, that, inasmuch as he proposed to take away a Member each from Harwich and Maldon, he thought it fair enough to give a Member to the division of the county in which those boroughs were situated. But if the noble Lord had acted on that principle in one county, why had he not carried it out fairly and honestly towards all? Why, for instance, when he took Members away from Tewkesbury and Cirencester, had he omitted to give one to either division of Gloucestershire? But, as he (Mr. Du Cane) had previously observed, this Bill proposed largely to extend the franchise in counties and boroughs. Did it, however, in so doing, recognize any one of those distinctions they had hitherto considered essential to maintain a just and fair balance of our representative system, and for which no one had more stoutly contended than the noble Lord himself, and the majority of that Cabinet now seated around him? On the contrary, the noble Lord by this measure, proposed to sweep away the last remaining distinction which Conservatives considered necessary between the county and the borough franchise, with which the insertion of the Chandos clause had in no way interfered—to wit, that the one should be based on property, the other on occupation; and he proposed to have the whole representative system on a low and almost assimilated borough occupation franchise. What was the great charge brought against the Government Reform Bill last year? Was it not that it was based on uniformity of suffrage? But the uniformity of suffrage in that Bill was as nothing compared with the dead level to which the franchise would be reduced after the passing of this measure. That was a uniformity mitigated and utilized by the introduction of no less than eight franchises, conferring the privilege on thousands of intelligent, educated, and independent classes of the community; but should this measure be allowed to pass, who from henceforth would be the predominant class in the county representation? The Returns produced were of a very slight character; but he would make every allowance for persons who might be already registered, for female occupiers, non-payment of rates, and the difference between positive and rental and rateable value, and he thought that they would add a constituency to the counties of not less than 250,000. In his own county he found that in the town districts, where they had one occupier at £50 a year they had 10 at £15 a year, and 20 at £10, while in the more rural districts they would scarcely find a single £10 occupier. Moreover, many of the present £50 occupiers in counties might be deducted from the list, because they claimed votes as freeholders; and on the register of his own county the same name might sometimes be seen nine or ten times over. So that the effect of the alteration in the county franchise would be entirely to throw the representation into the hands of the £10 occupiers resident in towns alone. It was one of the charges against the measure of last year that it extended the county franchise to £10 voters, but accompanied the boon with neutralizing provisions in favour of the county; he thought it might be urged against this Bill with equal justice that it extended the county suffrage, clogged with exclusive and one-sided provisions in favour of towns. The £5 building restriction was calculated to disfranchise a great number of small county occupiers, and the condition that a joint occupancy of land and building should qualify for a vote only when held under the same landlord would, in his opinion, operate no less injuriously. The effect of the latter restriction would be that a man who occupied an £8 or £9 house in one parish and held a piece of land of from £20 to £30 value in another parish would be debarred from voting for the county unless the proprietor from whom he held the land would consent to lay out money in the erection of buildings equally useless to landlord and tenant. But who would constitute the predominant class in boroughs? He had no wish to plunge into the mysteries of the Compound Householders Act, or to enter on the difference between gross estimated rental and rateable value; but he did not think he was overstating the case when he assumed that the effect of the Bill would be to add to the borough constituencies some 200,000 voters, occupying houses of from £6 to £10 yearly rental. The existing number of borough voters he estimated at 412,000, exclusive of 40,000 freemen, the great bulk of whom were the occupiers of houses below the value of £10. But from the electoral statistics of Mr. Newmarsh, it appeared that there were already 130,000 occupiers of houses at the lowest level to which the suffrage was then extended. Therefore, if they added to that body the 40,000 freemen and the 200,000 new voters that would be added by the Bill, they would find, by a very simple sum in arithmetic, that the voters who occupied houses of a rental of £10 and under would outnumber those who were above that level by some 100,000 votes. He did not mean to say, as the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Caird) appeared by his elaborate statistics that evening to imagine, that it was the fixed idea of the Conservative party, that that body of 370,000 voters were all of the same trade, or that they would be characterized by an identity of political sentiments. A great philosopher had told them that no two human beings ever did think alike on political matters, and the extreme diversity of opinion manifested by hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform certainly gave confirmation to the theory. But the effect of the Bill would undoubtedly be to confine the operation of the franchise within a far narrower compass, and to produce a far greater uniformity of suffrage than was contemplated by the measure of last year. He would not presume to foretell the possible fate of the Bill, but if they went into Committee upon it he thought the duty of the Conservative party would be obvious and simple. They would have to ask themselves

Mr. Du Cane

[Fifth Night.]

the question whether there was in the country any one class possessing such independence of thought, such intellectual ability, and such purity of political principles, that they could afford, once and for ever, absolutely and entirely to intrust to its charge the control over our representative system. Admitting that the suffrage in counties and boroughs was to be extended, it would be for them to consider on what basis and within what limits that extension should be carried out. If the House had irrevocably decided in favour of a £10 county franchise, they were entitled, at least, to ask that it should not be established without some provision of a modifying character in regard to the large towns of the country. And here he must beg to comment briefly on a remark which fell from the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone in his last week's speech. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) retaliated upon a sulky Conservative elector of that constituency, who complained that his vote was neutralized by the preponderance of his opponents, by saying that the same complaint might be made, with an equal show of strength, by any Liberal voter in a Conservative county; and he instanced the county which he (Mr. Du Cane) represented as an example. Why the hon. Member had done him the honour to select his constituency he did not exactly know. Certainly he was happy to say that the county of Essex had been for many years, and he trusted would long continue to be, a stronghold of Conservatism; but he denied that the parallel was a fair one. The real subject of complaint was that the hon. and learned Gentleman was a representative, returned, according to his own admission, of a numerical majority, composed of a single class—that of the working population—while the Conservative majority in a county such as North Essex would be found to combine the representation of nearly every class in the country,—the landed interest, agriculture, commerce, manufactures and labour. And it was because they believed that by the passing of this measure the proper representation of those varied interests would virtually be neutralized, and that in point of fact three-fourths of the constituencies in the country would be reduced to the level of that of Marylebone, that they entered their energetic protest against its passing. But he must also say as regards the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech

Mr. Du Cane

that there was in it an hiatus valde de flendus at which he was somewhat surprised when he remembered a certain document that had issued from his pen in the course of last autumn. He (Mr. E. James) entered into the most elaborate statistics to prove the sweeping charges this Bill would effect in his constituency, and which he proposed to view with extreme delight. The animation of his countenance appeared, however, to be in no way reflected in that of the hon. Member for Birmingham, who evidently thought that his indiscreet companion was letting the cat slip out of the bag. But they did not hear a word from the hon. Member as regards the question of the builders' strike, or how many of these new constituents were to be found among that class so recently distinguished for their powers of combination. He (Mr. Du Cane) must say that he did not think that was a part of the question that had been fairly and manfully grappled with by the supporters of this measure. The noble Lord the Member for the City had disposed summarily of the matter by quoting a couplet from Burns, which, as far as he could understand, only went to prove that the labouring classes were extremely well contented to leave things as they were, and did not desire any change whatever. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) had told them that if such strikes had occurred thirty years ago they would have been accompanied by scenes of violence and bloodshed. Doubtless the educational progress of the last thirty years had been rapid; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman had studied the page of that contemporaneous history which he appeared to regard with contempt he would find that in a state in which the various interests were not properly balanced, it was not always a high educational status that was the best guarantee for liberty of thought and independence of action, and that these other means of coercion and intimidation, besides the open manifestation of the brick-bat and the bludgeon. The hon. Member for Birmingham said that the Conservative party knew nothing of the feeling of the general population of the country, but blindly followed their leader, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, who lived in a manor house, and knew nothing about the people; and that he, on the contrary, knew the people, and he said to the Conservative party, "Repose in the people a generous confi-

ice, and be assured the day will come when you will reap your reward. There is only one thing to make that statement quite satisfactory, and that was that the Conservative party should feel confidence in the hon. Member himself. But the feeling of confidence which that side of the House might have felt in the hon. Member for Birmingham diminished exactly in proportion to the rapidity of its increase upon the Treasury benches. Confidence, a most illustrious authority had once been served in this House, was a plant of slow growth, in an aged breast; but this memorable Session of 1860 was, he suspected, destined to witness the practical contradiction of more than one golden maxim both of ancient and living statesmen. What was the language of the hon. Member for Birmingham but a few days since upon that Manchester platform, when, to use the expressive language of his chairman, he drove such a "roaring business?" What was his language then to that people whom he knew well, and in whom he asked the House repose such a generous confidence? He only urged the people to bring and bear upon the question of Reform the vast power combination which they had displayed in the form of strikes, so as to influence the Legislature of the country. Were the hon. Member for Birmingham present, he would ask him, but in no acrimonious spirit, did he think such language was likely to inspire that House with confidence in the people, or was it likely to quicken their zeal in the cause of Parliamentary Reform? He would ask him to consider whether the brave deeds and open avowals of the Liberation Society tended on Friday last to quicken the zeal of the House in the cause of Church and State Abolition. Might not the House be apt to ask themselves the simple question, could the gift of the franchise to such parties diminish the danger of subsequent combinations, or afford any guarantee that if this Bill passed, the hon. Gentleman would not soon again be doing "a roaring trade" on the Birmingham platform; telling the people that this Reform Bill was a mere drop in the ocean compared with what they had a right to expect, that this Budget of a Chancellor of the Exchequer did not help lay the saddle on the right horse, that the people should now remember they had a preponderating voice in the representation, that now was the time for appointing their delegates, making their combinations, bringing their power to bear on the House of Commons, and woe to the representatives that dared to oppose the will of the people? Upon this point he would read a short extract from a journal which he believed had the largest circulation of any going exclusively among the working classes, professing to advocate their just claims and obtain a remedy for their grievances. The Weekly Dispatch, some few weeks since, had an article on the merits of the present Reform Bill. It commenced thus:—

"We feel some hesitation in 'letting the cat out of the bag.' The Tories are in a state of complacent ignorance on the subject of the significance of the new Reform Bill—and 'where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise.' They are disposed to let it pass sub silentio, as too small for notice and too futile for opposition. It gives us some compunction to undeceive them and some qualms to provoke their resistance. Liberals appear to be in an almost equal predicament of omniscience. They turn up their noses at it, as Jeames of Belgravia would at cold meat to dinner. Some of them call it too poor for acceptance, and too worthless for rejection."
 "The Bill is, notwithstanding, a tremendous measure—far more comprehensive, infinitely more thorough and organic in its changes, than either its friends or its enemies even remotely conceive. The fact is, they are thoroughly deceived by utterly deceptive Returns, and the most futile and nimious statistics." "We repeat the expression of our conviction that the Bill is a political revolution. It is a stride towards democracy that leaves the rest of the way but a step. In one simple clause it hands over the issues of political power to the masses. When it shall become law the working classes will constitute substantially the prevailing element in representation—be the masters of the situation."
 "This does not disclose nearly the whole of the case. Of the present constituency 50 per cent, and that the most wealthy and the most thoughtful never vote. It is never found, however, that working men having a vote ever neglect to poll. Of Ancient Foresters, Odd Fellows, Amalgamated Engineers, and other Trades' Unions and Friendly Societies of working men, it is computed that there are nearly 2,000,000 enrolled throughout the United Kingdom. The builders' strike showed how intimate was the mutual understanding among these combinations. Some of them possess an organization so perfect that in a few hours the Central Council could set in motion every affiliated branch throughout the empire. It is on these classes the franchise is about to be conferred. Who or what can stand before them? They will poll to a man—will they not all poll one way? It is notorious that the middle classes do not possess the cohesion and spirit of union which support the power of the working classes. Henceforward, for weal or woe, the Democratic element reigns in England."

Hon. Members might suppose that this statement was somewhat exaggerated; but, at all events, this was not a branch of the question which they could afford to pass over with contemptuous silence or indifference at a moment when they were about to inaugurate a constitutional change which, according to their own showing, was to be the prelude of other changes. He trusted that House would always represent the free and unfettered opinion, controlled by the talent and intelligence, of the country, giving their sanction to great legislative changes only after having calmly ascertained their bearing on the national welfare. In conclusion, it had been well said by M. de Tocqueville, that free institutions were necessary to a State not more to secure the lesser citizens their rights than to warn the greater citizens of their perils. He thought that they whose lot had been cast amid the peaceful scenes of an enlightened civilization, might recognize at the present moment the truth and the value of so ancient and so time-honoured a maxim. They might return thanks for the blessing of free institutions, and especially might they feel grateful for a freedom that allowed the tongue to utter and the press to circulate doctrines that warned them of the pitfalls that lay before them when they were discussing this great constitutional question. He could not reiterate a charge which had been made in the course of this debate against the Conservative phalanx for apathy and indifference in not opposing the second reading of this Bill. The principle of the measure was the extension of the franchise, and it was no part of a Conservative policy to oppose that principle. It was no part of the Conservative policy to imitate the example of another celebrated phalanx of 300 in ancient days, to buckle on their armour and court destruction to man, in a resolute and hopeless resistance to the advancing tide of popular opinion. But if he did not say to the Conservative party, as regards their present position, in the despairing and reproachful language of Byron—

[Fifth Night]

“ Of three hundred give but three,
To make a new Thermopylæ.”

He did venture to say to the House that it was not a question for the Conservative party alone to consider, but for all in that House, whatever their party denomination, who had any regard to the safety and stability of our own representative institutions and the duration of free Parliamentary government. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) said he had no wish to overturn or undermine the constitution of the country; but, when he quoted Burke as his justification of this most mischievous and one-sided measure, he (Mr. Du Cane) could have wished that the noble Lord had drunk

Mr. Du Cane

somewhat deeper at that fountain of inspiration. He wished he had reminded himself of another passage, worthy to be recalled of one who, liberal alike in genius and in practice, did not speak merely for the immediate exigencies of the age in which he lived, when he said—

“ I look with reverence on the Constitution of my country, and will never cut it in pieces or place it in the cauldron of any magician in order to boil it with the puddle of his compounds into youth and vigour. On the contrary, I will drive away all such pretenders; I will nurse its venerable age, and with lenient arts extend a parent's breath.”

MR. CLAY, as an elector of Marylebone—not the particular, sulky elector to whom allusion had been made, but one well satisfied with the noble Lord, and the learned Gentleman who represented him—must correct the error into which the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Du Cane) had fallen, in stating that elections in Marylebone were decided by majorities of the working classes. He (Mr. Clay) should not think the worse of the constituency if it were so; but the fact was, that the majority in that borough was one of retail tradesmen—a class generally as Conservative in their opinions and interests as hon. Members opposite could desire. The hon. Gentleman, in looking at this Bill, professed himself unable to see how hon. Members, who supported it, could have voted against Lord Derby's Reform Bill; and his (Mr. Clay's) hon. Friend the Member for Dorsetshire had twitted the opponents of his Bill with having found in it only a means of turning out a Government, and to this motive he attributed their votes against the second reading. The attacks of his (Mr. Clay's) hon. Friend were always so free from bitterness as to excite no annoyance; but all he said both deserved and received so much attention, that he (Mr. Clay) was anxious to correct this erroneous impression. He could say for himself—and with equal confidence for the Gentlemen who sat on the same benches with him—that his vote against the second reading of Lord Derby's Reform Bill was influenced by no such feeling as that attributed to it by his hon. Friend, but had one motive—and one motive alone—namely, that this Bill contained no provision for lowering the property qualification in boroughs. And this, they were told, was the principle of the Bill, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire called it a middle-class Reform Bill. Why he (Mr. Clay) thought that the middle classes had their Reform Bill in 1832, and he said that the turn of the working men come. Their improvement was acknowledged on all sides of the House. He had decreased, intelligence had increased, disaffection was dead. These were virtues of a class, and to a class the turn ought to have been given, and not a few exceptional or, as they were called, fancy franchises. If Lord Derby's Bill had provided for any extension, however narrow, of the borough franchise, he would have voted for the second reading and would have trusted to a Committee to make that extension more liberal. Yet there no doubt were some Members who now seemed afraid of that very extension for which last year they were the advocates, and the Member for Edinburgh for this reason assured the House that with regret he differed from his friends. Why, the hon. Gentleman differed from himself as well—and, in his speech of the other night, quite forgot to say how he reconciled that speech with his vote for the Resolution which defeated Lord Derby's Bill—a Resolution which declared that any Reform Bill to be satisfactory must contain a general extension of the franchise in boroughs. But now the Member was afraid of the classes which this extension would admit—of the working classes. Why? Because they were ignorant of political economy, as shown in their strike of last year. If ignorance of political economy was to be the ground of exclusion from the franchise, they need not go back far to find the very highest interests in the country as ignorant—aye, and more so—as the working men in their strike, as to which it might be remembered that they were not wholly in the wrong. The noble Lord the Member for London might, on these terms, lose some of his very richest constituents, in the members of that great bill discounting firm, who, the other day, locked up in their drawer a million and a-half in bank notes, in utter disregard of all sound politico-economical principle, and in an insane attempt to pervert the Bank of England in the conduct of their business as bankers. But the hon. Member objected to the working classes as likely to be bribed, and he spoke of bribery as if it were the vice of the lowest classes of our society. Surely it was fair to remember that it was at least equally the vice of our very highest classes, for before a man can take a bribe some one must be found to give it. The hon. Member would do better to join earnestly in the endeavour so to legislate as to make bribery impossible to the rich, rather than to distrust those whose poverty sometimes yields to temptation. The hon. Gentleman said there was no bribery in Scotland. Was this because the working classes there were more honest, or because the richer classes were more wise—too wise to part with their money in so foolish a way? If they all came from "as far North" as the hon. Member, there might be less bribery in this country. His (Mr. Clay's) hon. Friend, the Member for Norfolk, (Mr. Bentinck) claimed for the rural districts an intelligence superior to that of the inhabitants of towns, and quoted Adam Smith in support of his opinion. He (Mr. Clay) had no wish to depreciate the rural intellect, and still less desire to speak with disrespect of Adam Smith; but he objected to Adam Smith as any authority whatever in making this comparison, as he wrote before that immense development of mechanical industry which had so wonderfully acted on the intelligence of the inhabitants of towns. His hon. Friend was not satisfied with the disgracefully slow progress which the Bill was making, but advised that no progress should be made at all—until the House was prepared to acknowledge the claim of the counties to 130 additional Members, a claim which he founded on their population and property. Why, in this calculation, the hon. Member took credit for the counties for all the population and property of the large unrepresented towns—some of which would have Members under the present Bill, and all of which, if the Radicals—for he (Mr. Clay) was not ashamed of the name, in spite of the dirt thrown on it—had their way, would have Members at the expense of the small, or rotten boroughs. He (Mr. Clay) would not quarrel with this Bill, which would add, as he was told, some 1,500 electors to the constituency which he had the honour to represent. On this account, if for no other, he was grateful for it, and supported it as far as it went—though, to his thinking, it did not go very far, and left untouched some subjects with which a Reform Bill ought to deal. But he was more disposed to lay the blame of its shortcomings on the apathy of the country, than on the niggardliness of the Government. The hon. Member for Halifax had endeavoured to explain this apathy, and had cited high authority in support of his opinion, while his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk said that agitations produced political discontent. The reverse was the case—distress naturally produced political agitation among a class who still believed that legislation could find a cure for their sufferings. To him (Mr. Clay) the cause of this indifference on the part of the unenfranchised classes to the acquirement of political rights was of easy explanation. In this country political agitation had always been co-existent with periods of general depression of trade, or periods of famine. The operation of the great commercial changes of late years had at least been this—to spread a more equal surface over the interests of trade, and to make in the highest degree improbable those times of famine prices from which the country in former years had suffered. Indeed, they were scarcely too sanguine if they expected that the calamities, in this respect, which they had seen they never would see again. To this, in the main, he (Mr. Clay) attributed the notorious indifference of the country to Parliamentary Reform. In part also to this, that the honest and earnest Reformers—and there were honest and earnest Reformers—relied implicitly on the promises made by the leaders of all parties that there should be an amended representation of the people in the House of Commons, and were content to wait in patience for the loyal fulfilment of this promise. Whatever the cause, this indifference was not denied, and when he (Mr. Clay) remembered how little was asked for, he confessed himself surprised at how much it was proposed to give, for it was not in human nature that those in possession of power should consent to share it with others short of compulsion; by which, of course, he did not mean violence, but that strong and general expression of a nation's will, which, for years past in this country had been taken—which for all years to come he hoped would be taken—by sagacious statesmen as sufficient indication that the time for concession had arrived. He might be told that this Bill itself was the refutation of his theory, as by it much was given when little was asked. But he was forced to remember that this Bill was only the loyal fulfilment of a promise, made some ten years back, when there was clamour—when there was agitation—such as no prudent statesman could afford to disregard. He must not be supposed to infer from this that it would be safe—much less that it would be honest—that the leaders of parties in this House should now forget their promises, and that its members should forget the declarations which so many of them had made on the hustings. For, if there was a way—and there was this one way—to wake the agitation which had long slept, it would be to give to honest Reformers the idea that statesmen were disposed to play false by their pledges, and that the House of Commons was anxious to find a decent pretext for shelving an unpalatable subject. An amended representation of the people in the House of Commons there must be. What should be its nature? His right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, not only objected to this Bill, but he objected to any Reform Bill at the present time. It was, he said, the wrong time. Jeremy Bentham had disposed of the argument—fallacy he called it—of the wrong time, by saying that when anything is wrong, the only right time to amend it is the very first time at which its remedy can be found. But his (Mr. Clay's) right hon. Friend gave two reasons why this was the wrong time. First, the menacing aspect of foreign relations. Well, if his right hon. Friend could tell him when the black cloud, big with turbulence and war, would pass away, leaving an unclouded sky, and a bright sun to shine on their efforts of Reform, he might consent to wait a little while; but if, as was most probable, his right honourable Friend could make no certain prophecy of fine weather—he (Mr. Clay), on the ground of safety, declined to put off indefinitely the settlement of this long-vexed question. But his right hon. Friend gave another reason. This House of Commons, he said, had sanctioned a system of finance so imprudent, as to have placed the country in fearful financial danger. It was their duty not to abandon their posts until they could leave to their successors a legacy of greater financial ease, and he likened them to defeated and desperate speculators about to commit suicide rather than face the difficulties which their own recklessness had brought about. He (Mr. Clay) did not admit the reckless character of the finance which the House had sanctioned, but if his right hon. Friend was right—if they had misconducted themselves—it was surely an odd argument that on that account it was their duty to continue their mischievous labours unreformed—and this plea was one which might be urged with equal justice by Mr. Pullinger, why he should be allowed to remain cashier of the Union Bank until he set right the defalcations from which company had suffered. But his right Friend objected especially to this, and had embodied his objections in a speech so able and so eloquent, that its praise was, that it equalled—if it did surpass—any previous effort with which had delighted the House. Yet, so fair and candid was his speech—so philosophical was the tone of his mind—that he (Mr. Clay) did not think it would be difficult for the Radicals to come to terms with him in Committee, for they would readily admit to the franchise any test of intelligence which his ingenuity could devise, and the more they admitted the better they would be liked. This Bill would only be looked on as a measure for extension of the suffrage. Its disenfranchising clauses seemed like the cheap ones—made to sell, and not to cut. They were framed to pass. He (Mr. Clay) would look only at that which chiefly concerned him—the extension of the right of voting in boroughs. He had no fear that a proposal would swamp the intelligence of the country by its uneducated numbers; he would confess to seeing an awkwardness—an incompleteness—in this—at all the extension was more or less to one class. He admitted the defect, but it appeared to him of easy remedy. The larger franchise would do much to vary the present admission of new voters, and would give a larger class of voters of intelligence and property above the common one. But beyond this, he had always been in favour of a mixed franchise founded partly on intelligence, partly on property. Let them introduce in Committee such tests of intelligence as they could hit on. He must not be told that these exceptional franchises would be useless, with a £6 property qualification, as, under this, all would be admitted; for, if so, what became of the argument that the admission proposed was all of one class? This idea of tests of superior intelligence had, it seemed, been discussed in the Cabinet, and thrown aside. Let his right hon. Friend, the member for Buckinghamshire, pick it up if it was in some sort his property. Such aid as he (Mr. Clay) could give, in this sense, was most cordially at the service of his right hon. Friend; and, if he would lend the authority of his name and position to Amendments such as these, everything might be done in Committee which the hon. Member for Salford could have hoped from his proposition—rather novel than constitutional—of a Committee upstairs; and a Bill might be passed such as they all would like to see, more or less the work of all parties in the House—for, if there was a subject which, more than any other, ought to be removed in its discussion from party strife, it was the amended representation of the people in the House of Commons. If his right hon. Friend would give favourable consideration to this suggestion—given in all sincerity, and with great deference—his right hon. Friend might be assured that he would add much to the popularity of the great party which he led, and—better still—would deserve well of the House and the country.

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. Clay

MR. A. MILLS said, that one advantage had at all events resulted from the prolongation of this discussion, namely, that the charges of a “Fabian policy” levelled at the Opposition, by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Lewis) had been practically refuted. The statistics of the present debate were that before its commencement that night, 43 speeches had been made, of which 18 had been made on the Conservative and 25 on the Ministerial side of the House; of these speeches 29 were against the Bill, 12 neutral, and 2 in its favour. The Opposition had been accused of having conspired together to destroy the Bill. But was that borne out by facts? Instead of adopting the tactics which the party now in power had adopted last year to defeat the measure of the Government of Lord Derby, they had abstained from concocting any ingeniously contrived Amendment which would have that effect; but proposed—laying aside party politics—to take the miserable materials which the Government had presented to them, and to try to make something of them, if they could, in Committee. They were all convinced that the time was come when the game of politics, commenced in 1852, by the indiscreet declaration of the noble Lord, and since kept up by agitators out of doors and by public men in that House, ought to be played out, and brought to a conclusion. He had heard it said that they on his side of the House were afraid to admit the working classes to the elective franchise. Now, he asserted that not a single word had been uttered from his side of the House that could favour any such idea. He had certainly heard speeches from the Ministerial side of the House which contained arguments by no means complimentary to the competence of the working classes to exercise the franchise.

The Conservatives, on the other hand, were convinced that the time had come when classes which had hitherto been excluded should be included in the representation. As to the course that ought to be adopted, if he thought that there was the slightest possibility, out of the meagre materials which the Bill presented, to frame anything approaching a constitutional measure, he for one would be prepared to make an effort in that direction in Committee; but if the Bill came out of Committee in the shape it stood at present, he should decidedly give it his negative upon the third reading. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertford then alluded to an article upon the subject of this Bill that appeared a short time ago in a public journal which generally found some favour with the Members on the Ministerial side of the House. He alluded to The Economist newspaper. The writer said that this Bill established the competence of all men alike to wield an equal amount of political power, and pronounced that an educated man compared with a mechanic had no inherent superior qualification to legislate or to govern; it declared that though to plough a field or make a machine were matters of skill and science, to discern a fit legislator and a good ruler required no knowledge of politics or statesmanship. The Bill of 1860 was simply a deteriorated edition of the Bill of 1832, which was pretended to have conferred a sort of monopoly in this department of legislation on the noble Lord; but he (Mr. Mills) denied that the Bill of 1832 gave the Liberal party a patent right to deal with the question of Reform; on the contrary, he thought it proved that its framers were for ever disqualified from dealing with the question. The Bill of 1832 was justified by its authors and advocates by the excitement which then existed on the question throughout the kingdom—the measure of 1860 was justified by the general tranquillity and indifference that prevailed amongst the people upon the subject of reform; so that the noble Lord endeavoured to draw a pretext for his Bills from circumstances of the most contradictory character. As to the charge made against the political party with which he generally acted, that they were afraid of giving power into the hands of the working classes, he utterly repudiated any such feeling. A large portion of his own constituency was composed of the working classes, and he felt proud of representing such an independent and intelligent body of men. But what right had they to expect that by enlarging the area of the constituencies of the kingdom they should be raising the quality as well as the number of the electors? A large proportion of the present ten pound occupiers, though they might be very staunch adherents to their party colours, had in fact no political opinions at all. What ground was there for supposing that the class below them would be more enlightened? Frequent allusions had been made to the hon. Member for Birmingham throughout these discussions. For his (Mr. Mills's) part he thought that they had heard too much of the hon. Gentleman. He wished not to speak in any spirit of harshness or unkindness of the hon. Member. At the same time he thought that they had been rather too much afraid of him. He believed that the hon. Gentleman would be more formidable if he endeavoured to be more accurate in his statements. If the arguments attributed to the hon. Gentleman were correct, he thought that there would be considerable difficulty in verifying his statistics. The subject was now well nigh exhausted, nevertheless he thought it a fortunate circumstance that it had been so fully and freely discussed; because if they had attempted to pass the second reading without a full discussion, or had met the Motion at the outset by a direct negative, a false impression as to the views and reasons of the Members of the Opposition would have been conveyed to the country. He contended that they had adopted the best, the safest, and most constitutional course in allowing the Bill to go forward in the House. He was, however, by no means sanguine as to its progress in Committee, or that anything like a sound constitutional measure could be made of it. He would only remark in conclusion that instead of seeking to deprive the working classes of any voice in the election of their representatives, the aristocracy of this country, whose conduct had been severely canvassed in connection with this question, had been most assiduous in their efforts to educate and to raise those classes to a position to qualify them for the exercise of the franchise. The educational statistics of the country proved that fact beyond the possibility of a doubt. They were, however, opposed to a measure the object of which was the indiscriminate admission of a mass of persons wholly unprepared for the proper exercise of this boon, and who would effectually swamp all the other elements of our popular representation. He ould resist to the utmost any such attempt, whether it were made by the Liberal or any other party inside or outside walls of that House.

Mr. A. Mills

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was anxious to say a few words, because he believed that with the exception of a speech from his hon.

learned friend the Member for Marylebone no Metropolitan Member had addressed the House in this debate. He believed one of the reasons why the Metropolitan Members had been so much adverted to in the course of the discussion was, that many of them were returned by the aid of the working classes. They had been denounced as a class of men who could not be properly trusted as legislators, and there had been a comparison made throughout the debate between the Metropolitan Members, who were the representatives of the working classes, and the Members who represented small constituencies. He predicted that had been done to show that the effect of this Bill was a bad object, and that the very worst thing the Bill could do was to make all the Members like the Metropolitan Members. Now for his own part he only wished that more of the Members of the House were like the Metropolitan Members. If they could have a sufficiently large net, and could include within it any fifteen Members that it fell upon in any part of the House, he thought the Metropolitan Members would not at all suffer by comparison. It was charged upon them that they did not possess every description of talent which was required in a legislator; but they would find among them men high in position, and who in their intellect would all bear comparison with any Members of that House. They boasted that they had among them the noble Lord the Member for the City of London; they boasted that they had among them Generals and Admirals, and men who had received the favour of their Sovereign. They had among them an hon. Baronet who, when everybody else despaired of our success in the Crimea, showed how our troops might be relieved, and constructed a railway by which the object was accomplished; and he was made a Baronet for having done so. He might mention the names of eminent men who had represented Metropolitan constituencies. He might speak of Mr. Palmerston and Sir Robert Wilson, and Mr. Brougham, the brother of Lord Brougham, and a long list of distinguished men who had sat for Southwark. But they were not that small boroughs sent the best Members. Why, the Members for small boroughs might be counted by hundreds, while the Metropolitan Members only numbered eighteen. Some of these small boroughs were in the hands of patrons, and it was said the patrons selected Members who would be of the greatest service to the country. He looked upon the patron of a borough in the same light as he looked upon the patron of a living, who selected a person for the living not because he was a good divine, but because he was a relation or a friend. It would be a great shame if among the representatives of these small boroughs, which returned so large a part of the House, there were not found men who distinguished themselves. But it ill became the representatives of such boroughs to cast aspersions upon the Metropolitan Members, merely because they were returned by a class who he hoped would soon return a large majority of the House. It had been said that the Bill received little or no support from hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House; but exactly the same thing might have been alleged against the Bill of the late Government. With the exception of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Macaulay), there was not one of the independent supporters of Lord Derby's Government who spoke that did not express more or less disapproval of the Reform Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks. It seemed to be a sort of law that whatever kind of Reform Bill might be brought in it must be opposed—indeed it was not human nature to suppose it could be otherwise—but what the House had to look to were the main features of the measure that was submitted to them; and it was precisely because the main feature of the Derby Bill—namely, the non-extension of the franchise in boroughs, was disapproved of, that the Bill was thrown out. That they were discussing the present Bill at all was owing to the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When the Reform Bill of the late Government was first introduced two main objections to it were pointed out—the disfranchisement of freeholders and the non-extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs. Against these two defects the Resolution of the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary was directed. He (Mr. Locke) thought at the time that the ingenuity of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire would have found a way out of the difficulty by accepting the Resolution

The right hon. Gentleman having given up the disfranchisement of the freeholders, was urged to adopt the Resolution; but he did not choose to do so. He dissolved Parliament, and the opinion of the country was, in fact, taken on the question of extending the franchise. Immediately before the dissolution, in reply to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, the noble Lord, if he (Mr. Locke) remembered right, stated that he should recommend a £6 franchise in boroughs. This was what the country looked forward to, and the present Bill was brought in embodying that principle. The feeling of the country, he contended, was not that of apathy to the measure; but the people were satisfied that the compact made with them before Parliament was dissolved had been kept. The Conservative party knew what the extent of the impending reform was to be; and he was astonished that the same objections were still made to the extension of the suffrage, after the speech of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, when Parliament reassembled. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman alluded to the extension of the suffrage to the working classes; the expressions made use of by the right hon. Gentleman were:—

"The question of the borough franchise, however, must be dealt with, and it must be dealt with, too, with reference to the introduction of the working classes. We admit that that has been the opinion of Parliament, and that it has been the opinion of the country, as shown by the hon. Gentlemen who have been returned to this House."—[3 Hansard, cliv. 189.]

Considering the circumstances under which that speech was made—that Parliament had been dissolved on the Reform question, and that the noble Lord who moved the Amendment had expressed his intention of extending the borough suffrage to £6 householders, and that this was well understood throughout the country as the suffrage which was to be adopted, there could, he thought, be no question whatever that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman applied to the borough suffrage, and that the right hon. Gentleman, if restored to power, would have used his influence as a Minister of the Crown to secure its adoption.

"We cannot be blind to that result," he went on to say—"we do not wish to be blind to it. We have no prejudice against the proposition. All that we want is to assure ourselves that any measure that we bring forward is one required by the public necessities and will be sanctioned by public approbation and support; and, therefore, we are perfectly prepared to deal with that question of the borough franchise and the introduction of the working classes by lowering the franchise in boroughs, and by acting in that direction with sincerity; because, as I ventured to observe in the debate upon our measure, if you intend to admit the working classes to the franchise by lowering the suffrage in boroughs, you must not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope. The lowering of the suffrage must be done in a manner which satisfactorily and completely effects your object, and is, at the same time, consistent with maintaining the institutions of the country."—[Ibid.]

It would be seen, therefore, that the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion was undoubtedly in favour of the £6 borough franchise. But what was the objection taken now? Why, that it would swamp the constituency. Now, perhaps, hon. Gentlemen opposite might object to his (Mr. Locke's) constituency, and say it could not be worse. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not suppose they meant anything personal to himself—"Hear, hear!"—then it must be that they objected to his constituents because they consisted of the working classes. Well, the £6 franchise would make little or no change in the character of his constituency, for he did not suppose it would add more than 3,000 voters to the number already on the roll. It had been said that in the large metropolitan boroughs, such as Marylebone, Tower Hamlets, and Finsbury, there were no elections, for not a quarter or a half of the voters cared to vote at all. But that was not the case in the borough of Southwark. There an election was a matter of real interest, and the voters came to the poll. At the last election there were 10,606 electors on the register, and the number polled was 7,152, which left 3,454. From that remainder must be deducted the number of persons who had left their residence, those who were dead, those who kept post-offices or were employed in the Customs, those who were down in the register two or three times, and others. Ten per cent of the registered number, or 1,060, must be deducted on this account from the 3,454, and that would leave only 2,394 who did not vote. In such a population as Southwark, it was probable that many persons would be away from home, and considering all these circumstances he thought this was a polling quite equal to that of any other large town or borough in the country. Therefore it must not be said that the working classes of the Metropolis, or of Southwark at all events, were not alive to the importance of exercising the suffrage when it was given to them. This disposed of one of the strongest objections which had been raised to the extension of the suffrage to large masses of the population in boroughs. In the City of London also, a very large proportion of the electors had always been polled. Now, he (Mr. Locke) did not mean to say that he entirely approved of this Bill; he merely gave his unqualified assent to a £6 franchise. His constituents desired that there should be a lodger franchise, and he agreed with them. Many of the working men who lived in lodgings were of a very superior and intelligent class—men who did not choose to burthen themselves with a house, because of its liabilities and inconveniences, but who were perhaps earning their £5, or £6, or even £8 a week, as engineers, or in different trades requiring great ingenuity and talent. What could be the danger of entrusting the franchise to such men as these? They were told of the spirit of combination which actuated the working classes. Why, people of every class would combine together for their own interest. No class had combined together more determinedly than the landed proprietors of this country, and having a majority in that House, in 1815 they imposed the corn laws, and maintained them until 1846. Great discussion had taken place with respect to the returns. For his own part he thought it mattered little whether the present constituencies were increased by 250,000 or 400,000; but should it prove [that a very large addition were made, it would be necessary to have additional polling places, and that had not been provided for under this Bill. He was anxious that the Bill should go into Committee as soon as possible. They were all agreed on an extension of the suffrage; and in Committee Gentlemen opposite might propose any fancy franchises they pleased. Did they wish to do so? Had they any very strong wish for any Reform Bill at all? ["No, no."] Then why had they themselves brought in a Reform Bill? They had nothing to fear from a £6 franchise; for the working classes understood public questions as well as they did in that House.

Mr. John Locke

MR. MACAULAY moved the Adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he did not object to the Adjournment of the debate, but expressed a hope that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark and other Members who had Motions or Orders of the Day on the paper for to-morrow would give way so as to allow the adjourned debate to be resumed.

COLONEL DICKSON observed, that some important Irish Bills stood for to-morrow, for the consideration of which another opportunity would not easily be found.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that sixteen English Members had spoken that night. This Reform Bill was becoming the great "social evil" of the day. Every hon. Member instead of addressing himself to the Question, addressed himself to the hon. Member for Birmingham. This question of the English Reform Bill concerned Irish Members as much as their own; for when it was settled, all the rest would follow as a matter of course. It was complained that out of sixteen Metropolitan Members only two had been heard; he should be happy to hear the other fourteen—and he hoped when the Irish Reform Bill came before the House, the Irish Members would be listened to with the same patience with which they had listened to the measure now before the House. He quite agreed in the reproach which was cast upon Irish Members, that they did not take a sufficient part in questions affecting the whole nation. If they were too modest to speak upon this question—although he had himself no intention to take any part in the debate—he would overcome his modesty so far as to detain the House for a short time in order to express his opinions upon the Bill.

MR. HENNESSY said, he had an important Bill regarding the improvement of land in Ireland on the paper for to-morrow, and he could not give way.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE stated, that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Sir Charles Napier), assured him before leaving the House a short time back that it was his intention to proceed with his Motion to-morrow. He trusted that that would be the case, for he believed the manning of the navy was a much more important matter to the country than any Reform Bill that could be laid on the table.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

CUSTOMS BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS moved the following clause:—

"And whereas contracts may have been made on or before the 10th day of February, 1860, for the delivery free of duty after that day of goods or commodities the duties of customs on which are hereby lowered or repealed: Be it therefore enacted, that any person who shall or may, on or before the 10th day of February, 1860, have made or entered into any such contract or agreement as the purchaser or consignee of such goods or commodities, may and is hereby authorized and empowered to deduct from the sum payable by him under such contract or agreement the amount of the duties which, if this Act had not passed, would have been payable in respect of such goods or commodities."

MR. LAING objected to the introduction of this clause.

MR. WHITESIDE supported it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL opposed the clause on account of the principle involved in it.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS replied, and said that although the Solicitor General opposed the clause on account of the principle involved in it, it was one that the House had agreed to five or six times over.

Clause agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

House adjourned at a Quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, May 1, 1860.

MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament.—The Earl of Tankerville (Baron Ossulston), after the Death of his Father.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

LORD LYNTHURST rose to call the Attention of the House to the State of the Naval Reserve; and to ask Her Majesty's Ministers for an Account of its present Condition and probable future Progress; and said: My Lords, I am anxious to call your attention to a subject that appears to me to be one of great importance—the actual state of our navy, and more particularly that branch of it which is distinguished by the title of the Royal Naval Reserve. I cannot pretend, my Lords, to enter into many details connected with this subject; and if any noble Lord, more acquainted with the details of the naval profession than I can pretend to be, had undertaken this task, I certainly should have remained silent; but, finding that no Member of this House appeared to be disposed to bring this subject before your Lordships, I have felt it my duty, at no little inconvenience to myself, to present it to your notice. I shall endeavour, in what I have to state, to confine myself to a simple narration of facts, for the purpose of placing before you as clearly as I can the actual state and the future prospects of the navy, and for the purpose of conveying information to the nation which I think ought to be possessed by every man in this empire. It must not be supposed that I am about to state anything that can be at all prejudicial to the public service. Almost everything that I am about to state may be collected from public documents; and I believe I may say generally that Foreign Governments, rivals to this country, are more minutely acquainted with the condition of our army and navy than the great mass of our own people who are not within the immediate circle of official knowledge. My Lords, upon the strength of our navy the character, the influence, and, I think I may say, the existence of this country depend. When I say the strength of our navy, I mean thereby the comparative state of the English Navy as contrasted with that of Foreign Powers—for that is the essential consideration. I was informed the other day that a very able man, an Engineer, and a member of the Fortification Commission, being asked, "What defence do you consider the best for our country?" answered shortly and emphatically, "A powerful navy—a powerful fleet." My Lords, I am old enough to remember the whole history of the Revolutionary War, and of the war which succeeded it with the Empire of France. Step by step, and victory after victory, notwithstanding all its efforts—and every one must recall the gallantry displayed by the French Navy—that navy was by the great victory of the Nile, the victory of Lord Duncan, that of Lord St. Vincent, and the great and splendid victory of Trafalgar, reduced at the termination of the war to such a state that for twenty years after that period we remained, as far as our navy was concerned, in a state of perfect tranquillity. My Lords, that state of things has always been galling to the French, and they have at different times expressed themselves in terms of great feeling upon the subject. When Admiral Lalande lay with his fleet in the Bay of Salamis, expecting orders to follow our squadron to the coast of Syria, being continually disappointed and receiving no such orders, he, in a moment of irritation at the manner in which he was treated, expressed himself in the strongest terms upon the subject. I mention this circumstance as an illustration of the feeling entertained by the members of the French

Sir Hugh Cairns

Navy with regard to the state to which they were reduced by the triumphant victories of the British. After expressing his indignation at the conduct of the French Government in not giving him the orders which he anticipated, the French Admiral of whom I have been speaking said, among other things, "England inflicted upon us a series of cruel defeats and humiliations, which caused, and ever will cause, every French sailor's heart to beat in presence of the English." Such, my Lords, was the result of the efforts made during the great French war. Very little change took place until after the memorable event which I now beg to call to your attention—I mean the accession to supreme power of the present Emperor of the French. In the year 1848 he was elected President of the Republic; and in the following year that celebrated Commission was appointed for the purpose of considering the reorganization of the navy of France. That Commission was composed of fifteen or more of the most able men selected from the navy and from the civil service of France, and they have framed a code of regulations of the most complete kind for the purpose of stimulating and directing the efforts of the French Navy. I have stated one remarkable date with respect to the issuing of that Commission. There is another date equally remarkable. No Report was called for from that Commission until after the celebrated event of the 2nd of December. About twelve or fourteen days after that coup d'état—namely, on the 15th of December—a report was called for by Louis Napoleon, and from that time the most strenuous exertions have been made to carry all the recommendations of that Commission into effect. I mention these facts in order that your Lordships may see how far you can reconcile the dates and facts which I have stated with a certain conversation which is supposed to have taken place between a Frenchman and an Englishman, and which was published to the world some time back. My Lords, need I say that that Commission was in terms directed against this country? If you look to the evidence of the persons who were examined before that Commission, and to the remarks of the Members, you will see that England was at that period almost the sole object which Louis Napoleon had in view. M. Collas, who was the Secretary to the Commission, says:—

"The first thing to establish is the number of ships France ought to and could put to sea the day war is declared; for this basis is certain, the enemy is known; there can be no question but of England."

That gentleman does not stand alone in the evidence which he gave before the Commission. Some of your Lordships, perhaps, may have read the opinions appended to the Report. The President of the Commission, M. Daru, discussed the manner in which a French fleet, with a proper military force on board, might make a successful attack upon the shores of this country. Admiral Dupetit Thouars, a well-known name, goes in much greater detail over the same ground, stating how easily a landing might be effected, and showing to demonstration the view with which that Commission was appointed and the object to which its result was directed. My Lords, the result of that Commission and of the admirable system which was formed under it has turned out to be a formidable navy—a formidable navy of steam-vessels, to which alone I confine my observations. What were the Government of this country and the Admiralty doing in the meantime? For a considerable period they were absolutely supine. No notice was taken of what was being done on the other side of the Channel, until at length, alarmed at the progress which had been made by the French Government in reorganizing their navy, they began to exert themselves, and by a most extraordinary effort and expenditure of money they have at length succeeded in forming a fleet, I believe at this moment about equal, but not more than equal to that of France. As I understand the matter—and I have it from the Reports upon the table—at the beginning of last year our fleet consisted of twenty-nine sail of the line, and the French fleet of precisely the same number. Although we were at that time equal in ships of the line, the French were far superior to us in what they consider of infinite importance—the number of frigates. While we had only twenty six frigates, they had thirty-four. What addition has been made to our fleet since the commencement of last year I am not informed. We shall perhaps hear it from the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) this evening; but I do not imagine that at this moment our fleet exceeds—or if it does, only in a small degree—the steam naval force of France. And now, my Lords, allow me to make an observation founded upon this supposed equality. If your steam navy is nominally only equal to that of France, it is in reality much inferior to it. I speak the opinion of every naval man with whom I have communicated; I speak the opinions of the members of the French Commission. They all say, "the English have so many points to defend, that with an equal navy they can never bring the force to compete with us that we can bring against them." And I have heard it stated by more than one naval authority that in order to place ourselves on a footing with the navy of France we ought to have nearly double the number of ships which they can bring into action. But it is sometimes said that our seamen are so much better that they give us the superiority. My Lords, let us not delude ourselves in that manner. The change in the mode of navigation has very greatly altered the whole system; and, although I agree with Sir Howard Douglas, that seamanship is of considerable importance, still it is very different at this moment from what it was at former periods. I have stated the comparative force, and also the amount of the material, of the French and English navies. Let me call your attention for a few moments to what is still more important, their personnel—the mode of manning their navy. By the inscription maritime, which is part of the French system, every seaman in the merchant service, of whatever rank, common seaman, master and mate, must be entered upon the register and pass through the navy; and an authority, whose name I dare say is familiar to the noble Duke opposite, M. de Fleurian, states that at the time he wrote there was not a sailor in the French marine that had not passed through the navy. Independently of this inscription, there is another measure of great importance adopted, called the levée permanente, under which a very large class of men have to pass seven years in the navy. What is the result of this state of things? The result has been stated over and over again; and forms a very important part of any comparison. It is, that the moment a French ship is built they have a trained crew ready to put on board; whereas we have to wait months after a ship is in commission before we can send her to sea. Again, if any great or sudden emergency calls for the fitting out of a fleet, France has trained seamen ready to put on board their vessels, which they can do with the utmost expedition. And how are her seamen trained? They are regularly educated in seamanship, in gunnery, in everything that is necessary for the purposes of warfare. One of the regulations proposed by the Commission and adopted by the French Government requires that 10 ships shall always form a squadron of evolution, and shall, at all convenient and proper times, go to sea with a view to exercise the seamen. It was, I learn, stated the other day in the other House of Parliament that 40,000 French seamen are regularly employed in the fishing trade off the North American coast, near Newfoundland, and that the French Government, in order to encourage that trade as a nursery for seamen, pay a bounty amounting to more than the value of the fish that is caught. That is a course not consistent with the principles of free trade, but perfectly consistent with the principles laid down by Adam Smith in his admirable work. Now, my Lords, let me turn to the other side of the account. Everything, as the French say, depends upon the personnel—that is, on the manning; and I am disposed to agree in that remark. What is the force that we require? A Channel fleet equal to that of France, with the means of replacing it in case of disasters. We also require a Mediterranean fleet and a fleet of observation for the protection of our distant possessions. What force have we got, how are your ships manned, and what materials do you have for manning such a navy? And here my Lords, let me remind you that in the event of reverses you are not in the same situation as France would be in on the defeat of her fleet: for independently of any landing on your shores, if France were to obtain the mastery of the Channel and to blockade your ports, what becomes of the country? what becomes of your revenue? what becomes of your trade? what becomes of your means of feeding your people? The whole kingdom would be thrown into a state of permanent confusion. These are grave considerations which should convince you that you ought not to be content with an equal force. Nothing short of what is necessary for your absolute security ought to satisfy you on a subject of this kind, so vital to your interests, and even to your existence. My Lords, what are our means of manning the fleet? I will not speak upon my own authority; I will quote to you testimony which cannot be controverted. I will adduce the authority of Lords of the Admiralty, of First Lords, and even that of the noble Duke

Lord Lyndhurst

lf. What is the language of Sir as Wood, late First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking on this matter in the House not long ago? He says:—

"I have no doubt that if time be allowed, in course of two years we should have not the least difficulty in adding to our navy as many as might be required, but it is when the emergency arises that the difficulty is felt. What it is, not that that number of men should be on board at the end of two years, but in months, or in two weeks. Russia and France—that."

My Lords, is another authority—for it is not a recent state of things; but it has continued for the last ten or fifteen years. Admiral Berkeley, lately First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, says:—

"We have a Reserve force of thirty sail of the Admiralty for commissioning, and fit to proceed in a few days."

is cheering—encouraging in the highest degree. But what does the same Admiral add? "But where are men to man them without having recourse to impressment?" Recourse to impressment! Every man throughout the country admits the impossibility of our having recourse to impressment. My Lords, when it was proposed to send an expedition to the coast of Syria, the Mediterranean fleet was upon a peace establishment; and not only so, but it was far short of its complement of men in consequence of sickness and other casualties. It became necessary therefore readily to apply to this country to send an additional supply of seamen. Hear the gallant Admiral to whom I have just referred say on that subject—and it would be impossible to give a better or stronger authority:—

"The first reinforcement of the seamen, or persons so called, did not arrive till the 1st of January (six months after the warning given!) and it amounted to 600 men only. We were left for a period of six months exposed continually, with ships, the complements of which were reduced below their peace establishments, to come into collision with the French ships composing which were fully manned and no means spared to render them in every way efficient. Add to which it since appears that the French were fully aware of our weakness and were only waiting for orders from their Government to enable them to take advantage of it. This was the state of things at the period to which I have alluded. It has existed, my Lordships will perceive, for a very considerable length of time, and no adequate means have been taken to remedy the evil. But, my Lords, I can bring the case down almost to the present day—to the time when our fleet was sent to the Baltic to attack the fleet of Russia. See what was the state of our navy at that time. Admiral Berkeley wrote to the commander of that fleet in the Baltic to this effect:—

"Have any of your ships tried for men in a Norwegian port? It is said that you might have any number of good seamen from that country."

We were so reduced that when we sent out only one single fleet we were so incapable of manning it that the commander of that fleet, not having a sufficient number of English seamen, was desired to search on the different coasts of the country in the neighbourhood of which he lay to see if he could not supply his deficiency by foreign seamen. Is it possible to present a more unfavourable picture of the position in which we stand? Again, my Lords, Admiral Berkeley, in writing to that commander that he was about to send out two vessels, the James Watt and the Prince Regent, states that they would soon join him; but he afterwards adds that "men are wanting, and it is impossible to say how long it will be before they are completed." On the subject of the navy he writes thus:—

"Notwithstanding the number of landmen entered, we are come nearly to a dead standstill as to seamen, and after the James Watt and Prince Regent reach you I do not know when we shall be able to send you a further re-inforcement for want of men. Something must be done, and done speedily, or there will be a breakdown in our present ricketty system."

My Lords, I have brought these observations down almost to the present day, and I am afraid at this moment we are not in a better state than that which is described by the authorities to which I have referred. What, then, is to be done? There is one point arising out of the new system of naval warfare to which I wish to call your attention. A blow can be struck in a moment. It does not take time to prepare it. In the course of the evidence given before the Commission to which I have referred it is stated—and many naval men concur in the correctness of the opinion—that the striking of the first blow in the event of a naval war will be almost decisive of the result. This, then, is a true and unexaggerated picture of our condition. My Lords, it is our duty not to deceive ourselves—it is our duty to take care that the country is not deceived; it is our duty to meet the difficulty in a manner corresponding with the emergency. What, then, is to be done? Two years since the Government appointed a Commission of Inquiry as to what course should be adopted for the manning of the navy. At the head of that Commission was my noble and gallant Friend who sits before me (the Earl of Hardwicke). No selection could have been more proper, from the gallantry, naval skill, as well as from the civil experience of the noble Earl. That Commission met in July, 1858, and made its Report in the February following—that is, about a year ago. What did they recommend? An addition of 4,000 sailors to the Home Reserve. I believe I may state, although I shall be happy to be contradicted on that point, that not one of these men has yet been raised. I am glad to read the smile on the countenance of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), which leads me to suppose he means to correct my statement to this extent, that out of 4,000 perhaps 1,000 men may have been raised. We shall, however, have a correct statement by-and-by from that noble person. They further recommended 5,000 Marines to be added to the present force—I believe not a single Marine has yet been raised after the lapse of a year. They also recommended 2,000 to be added to the Coastguard. Now, my Lords, I call your attention to this point, for great confusion has been allowed to prevail upon the subject of the Coastguard. There are two descriptions of force comprised under the designation of the Coastguard. There is a revenue Coastguard, and a Coastguard on board eleven ships scattered along our coast. Of the eleven ships I give the noble Duke joy. They never go to sea. The ships are occasionally driven by steam from one port to another, as convenience may dictate; but there is no mode of effectually training to seamanship the men who form that part of the Reserve. The other department is divided into two bodies—the fleet men and the shore men. It is most material to attend to this distinction. The fleet men amount to 3,200, and they are most admirable seamen. You cannot find a better body of seamen in any quarter of the globe. But there are 1,400 shore men, who are of no use whatever to the navy. So that when you talk of an increase of 6,000 Coastguardmen—for that is stated, I understand, as the amount of this Reserve—while that force embraces 3,200 admirable seamen the balance consists of these Coastguard Volunteers whom I have before described. I have it on the authority of many men connected with the service, and Admiral Martin, in his pamphlet, states it in most distinct terms, that the only real Coastguard consists of 3,200 men. Well, my Lords, this is a lamentable catalogue. But let me go on to the main point. The main point for your consideration, and to which I am about to call your attention is the great Naval Reserve—the Royal Naval Volunteers. It was stated by the Commission that it was absolutely necessary immediately to raise such a body of men for the purpose of supplying all the defects that might arise in our navy, and for the purpose of being prepared to meet any contingency. I was very anxious to see the subject taken up by some noble Lord of authority in naval affairs; but as the duty has fallen to me, who am only a civilian, I am desirous in calling your attention to the subject to support myself by sufficient authorities. I will quote, therefore, the Report of the Commission. The Report says:—

Lord Lyndhurst

“The force we require must be composed of trained seamen, and, as the necessity for such a reserve is urgent, it must in the first instance be recruited from adults.”

That is the language of the Commission. What is the language of Admiral Berkeley on this subject?

“No person can consider the ease with which a powerful squadron might be manned and rendered available for hostile purposes,—the great increase in the number and power of their steam-vessels, together with the menacing aspect at times of our foreign relations—without coming to the conclusion that the present state of our Naval affairs demands the most serious and prompt consideration of Her Majesty’s Government, and that it is a matter of paramount necessity—a necessity which, to my mind, neither brooks delay nor admits of compromise—to adopt such measures as shall, in the event of a sudden outbreak of hostilities, place a reserve force at the disposal of this Department sufficient to man effectually, and at a few days’ notice, at least twelve or fourteen sail of the line.”

Such, my Lords, is the language of the Report of the Commission moved for by my noble and gallant Friend near me. The noble Lord has been a Lord of the Admiralty, and is possessed of great experience and knowledge in naval matters. This Report was made in the month of February of last year. The subject was of an urgent nature, one which demanded in dealing with it the most prompt and in-

nt activity. What then has been ? The fact, I believe is, my Lords, no attempt was made to raise a single until the 1st of January last, in accordance with recommendations of the Commission. And what, let me ask, is the number which is now stated by Lord Pembroke Paget to have been obtained for the most important Reserve of 30,000 which ought to have been immediately raised ? Why, 800 men constitute the whole of the force, whose services have not been secured in the space of three months; that at that rate it would take about 37 years to raise the whole 30,000; and, in the meantime, one-third of the number would, owing to sickness, or some other cause, be found to be missing. Under these circumstances I think I may safely say that the Admiralty have not succeeded in carrying out the scheme which was recommended by the Commission as one which it was absolutely necessary to carry into effect for the security of the country, and which is also viewed in that light by every naval man who has directed his attention to the subject. The result is, my Lords, the scheme is an absolute failure, and is so regarded, I believe, by the members of the naval profession almost without exception. To what causes, then, let me ask, is this failure to be attributed ? As to the circumstances to which it is owing, there may be some doubt, although of the fact itself there can be none entertained. There is, however, one circumstance which it appears to me may have to some degree conduced to this result. Sailors are, as a general rule, very simple-minded men and do not like entering into complicated terms of engagement. Now, I hold in my hand the regulations issued by the Admiralty by which the seamen who enrol themselves in this service are asked to abide. They consist of 159 clauses. Now, my Lords, there is not an attorney in the United Kingdom who could make himself master of these 159 clauses in one fortnight. How then can it be expected that a common sailor, who is, generally speaking, wonderfully jealous of the Board of Admiralty by which he has been so often imposed upon, will enter blindfold into engagements, the nature of which he cannot comprehend. Why, my Lords, I, who was a member of the legal profession, and who formerly knew something of the practice of the Courts, should be obliged if, in the vigour of my life, I were reduced to such a position as to render it necessary for me to join the naval Reserve, under such conditions as these, to call to my assistance, Mr. Bellenden Kerr or Mr. Coulson, or some other eminent conveyancer, in order to make myself acquainted with the various provisions of this absurd document. In these regulations there is to be found, in my opinion, one obvious cause of the failure of the scheme to which I am referring, and it was an act of gross absurdity to issue such regulations. I should certainly be very shy of entering the Reserve Force under them were I a sailor. Towards the latter part of last autumn I was much among naval men, and they all told me the same story, that the Naval Reserve had turned out a miserable failure. I am, in saying so, giving expression to the views of many persons competent to form a judgment on the subject. A sum of £5 or £6 is given to those seamen who enter the Naval Reserve, and you suppose then that you have bought their services. You cannot buy them at the price. You will not find men to join the force for that amount. If the number of 30,000 sailors were, in accordance with the Report of the Commission, raised, you would at the present rate of payment expend on that body only £180,000 a year, while the total amount of your Naval Estimates reaches the sum of £12,000,000 sterling. But you ought to bear in mind that all your machinery is of no use, and might as well be thrown to the bottom of the sea, unless you have a number of seamen sufficient to man your fleet. In framing these regulations, then, the Admiralty acts, in my opinion, somewhat after the fashion of a workman who, in making a clock, constructs the machinery admirably, using the very best materials for the purpose, but who, when he comes to make the mainspring, through some false notion of economy, uses imperfect materials, and renders the whole work, as a consequence, comparatively valueless. I may, however, be asked what course I should propose to be taken with the view of remedying the existing state of things. My answer to such a question as that is, "I have pointed out a great evil demanding immediate removal. It is not for me but for Her Majesty's Government to provide the remedy." I may, however, say, that I had a letter sent to me by a gallant Admiral, Admiral Bowles, suggesting a conscription of some sort, with the view of forming a maritime militia. This is a suggestion which I leave for the consideration of the Government. The conclusion on the subject to which I have been addressing myself at which I have arrived is, I may add, that in point of material—that is to say, in ships—you are far below the requirements of the country, while so far as the manning of the fleet is concerned you are in a situation the most deplorable. I do not mince the matter. Our position in this respect ought to be known throughout the country. No man ought to be ignorant of the real facts of the case. I do not seek to ascribe the existence of those shortcomings, to which I have alluded, to inefficiency on the part of the Board of Admiralty, though I cannot say that I look upon that Board as a well-constituted body. A civilian who probably never knew anything of naval affairs, who never, perhaps, even owned a yacht, is placed at its head. There are also four naval Lords, to each of whom different departments of the service are intrusted, the proper administration of the details of which is quite sufficient to occupy the entire of his time; so that there is an absence of that superintending control which is requisite to direct the machinery. Such a system as exists at present cannot lead to anything but failure. The state of things, indeed, is not quite so bad as that which prevailed in former times, when a Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway and burned our ships at Chatham, and when not a single Lord of the Admiralty was at his post, the only official connected with it who was to be found on the occasion being the Secretary, who ran to and fro shaking his hands, and sending his silver in one direction and his gold-bags in another, to place them beyond the reach of spoliation in case of the landing of the Dutch. There has been, I admit, a change in the conduct of affairs at the Admiralty since that period, but not such a change as the requirements of the country imperatively demand. I ask your Lordships if I trespass upon your time in dealing with this important subject to a greater extent than is convenient? I assure you the inconvenience is ten thousand times greater, in all probability, to me in my own person than is that which you may experience. I shall then, with your permission, again briefly refer to the evidence of Admiral Berkeley, who states that from the moment he went to the Board of Admiralty he strenuously advocated the necessity of an available reserve to a large extent. I may here, perhaps, remind the House of that to which it is, perhaps, not requisite to allude—that the construction of the Board of Admiralty is not only such as I have pointed out, but that its members do not continue to be the same for more than a few years, inasmuch as, owing to the frequent changes of Government, one set of officials, as a matter of course, are obliged to give place to another equally uninformed as to the details of the service and equally inexperienced as their predecessors. Admiral Berkeley adds :—

Lord Lyndhurst

“The constant change of Boards—above all, the frequent change of the individual at the head of the Board—renders it almost a hopeless task; it requires perseverance in one system in detail, as well as a whole. No scheme can prosper that is so constantly altered, and, above all, any scheme on the subject of manning the navy, as well as establishing a Reserve, must be steadily persevered in, and the one end kept constantly in view.”

Again he says :—

“From the first moment at which I entered the Board of Admiralty to this time, I have strenuously advocated the necessity of forming a Naval Reserve to a large amount; but from the frequent changes which take place in the Board of Admiralty, and in the individuals at the head of the Board, it is almost a hopeless task, and it requires the utmost perseverance in a new system of details as well as in the whole subject. No scheme can prosper which is so constantly altering, and, above all, any scheme for manning the navy, and establishing a Reserve, must be studiously persevered in, and kept constantly present and in view.”

These are the opinions of the gallant Admiral to whom I have referred. There is another opinion with which I will take the liberty of troubling your Lordships—it is that of a former friend of mine, a most gallant Officer, of high character, loved by all who knew him, and standing high in public estimation. It is the opinion of Sir George Cockburn. He says :—

“Having filled the station of confidential or principal sea Lord of the Admiralty for more than seventeen years, I feel that my opinion regarding the constitution of the Board may sooner or later be deemed worthy of consideration and attention; I therefore am induced to place in writing the decisions to which my experience has brought me on this point. I have, then, no hesitation in stating that I consider the present establishment of that Board to be the most unsatisfactory and least efficient for its purpose that could have been devised.”

He then recommends “that the Admiralty Board should be abolished, and a totally new governing body established.” My Lords, I have only one more observation to make. I find that at this moment, and with this state of things existing, there is a party actively employed in the north of England in liberalizing and improving, according to their sense of the term, the fiscal system of the country, with the declared object—not unsupported, I am afraid, by pretty high authority—of putting an end to all taxes on articles of consumption, and placing the taxation almost entirely on realized property, and on realized property according to a graduated scale. This is done with the avowed object of introducing here the social equality, or, according to the expression used by a high authority, that species of social equality, that exists in France, and which is cherished in that country, regardless of civil liberty. Another object they have in view is to pull down the wealthier and aristocratic classes, who, they say, are the favourites and patrons of the army and navy, and to reduce those national establishments to a lower status. So that, while the navy of France increases from year to year, while its continuance in its present strength is provided for till 1871, the navy of England is to be reduced—and for what purpose and under what pretence? In the expectation that the nation will continue to possess the friendship of the Emperor of the French; in the expectation that, by the further exchange of cotton and pottery for wine and silks, a warm friendship may be established between this country and France. These are the views entertained by men who are aspiring to the Government of this country—men who, if they could, would place themselves at the head of the whole power of England. They would reduce us to the state of humiliation I have described, instead of maintaining our establishments as they now exist, and holding high the honour and reputation of England. And finally, my Lords, under these circumstances, I see that a noble Lord in the other House—with an indefatigable spirit that does not find sufficient employment in disentangling the complicated phrases of M. Thouvenel, and opposing the logic of his facts, instead of watching the course of events in Europe which require all his attention and all his powers of mind—as it were in a spirit of mischief, and living only in troubled waters, has at this time thought it right to bring forward a measure that opposes one class of the community against another; he would entirely remodel our constitution when all men should come forward in its support: and this he has done at a time when, in the opinion of all who have reflected on the circumstances, every class ought to unite in support of the honour and independence of the nation. The noble and learned Lord concluded by putting the Question of which he had given notice as to the state of the Naval Reserve, its present condition, and probable future progress.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I am not sorry the noble and learned Lord has brought this important subject under the notice of the House; but I trust the speech of my noble and learned Friend will not induce your Lordships to imagine that since I have filled the office of First Lord, I have been unmindful of the necessity of maintaining our navy in full force. Undoubtedly, the condition of the navy is far more important to the country than the existence of any Board of Admiralty or any Government; but I must say when I heard the speech of the noble and learned Lord I expected that he was about to come to the conclusion that I had unnecessarily reduced the Navy Estimates and cut down the expenditure; because in a great part of his speech he assumed that the Admiralty had reduced our naval establishments, and the number of our ships and men. I do not consider this in any way a party question, and I may say, shortly, that the desire of the present Board of Admiralty, as of preceding Boards, is, and has been, to maintain the navy in the most efficient condition. On my accession to office in the present Board of Admiralty, I directed my attention to the Estimates; and I thought, looking at the programme of work left to be done by the late Government that the money to be voted was not quite sufficient for the result to be accomplished. I therefore added £100,000 to the Estimates on account of ships to be built. I did so in an earnest desire to complete within the year the programme laid down by the late Board of Admiralty. And I can say that during the last eight months more men have been employed in our dockyards than at any previous period of the history of the country. I do not exclude the time of the great war, down to 1815; and in this statement I exclude the factories altogether, which form another great division of our naval establishments. I speak of the shipbuilding department only. Undoubtedly, in the present year this exertion has been somewhat diminished; there was much inconvenience in continuing to carry on work at so great a pressure. Therefore, as far as the works undertaken by the late Government are concerned, they are still going on, but at the same time I thought it convenient and advantageous that for this year works should be differently arranged. We are now, I may say, forward in ships of the line, and the noble and learned Lord is right in saying that what we require, therefore, is to bring on a smaller class of vessels. Not that I purpose altogether to put a stop to the operations on ships of the line, but it has been agreed that they shall be left in frame in such a way that they may season and improve, at the same time that they can be finished off rapidly if an emergency should arise; and by this means the chief energies of the dockyards can be applied to the smaller vessels. The noble and learned Lord referred to the ships we have now afloat. I find that we have built, and that there are afloat, 50 ships of the line.

LORD LYNTHURST: Do you include block-ships?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I am not taking the block-ships into account.

LORD LYNTHURST: Or sailing ships?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I do not count them.

LORD LYNTHURST: Are those vessels all completed?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: They are all afloat. I do not mean that they are all in the first class of steam reserve; and nothing could be more unwise than to complete their equipment, because the moment you put in the machinery and set up the masts and rigging you stop the ventilation, and the wear and tear begins from that moment, and the expense mounts up at an enormous rate:—but those that are afloat are in different states of efficiency and forwardness. Had I known that the noble and learned Lord intended to call attention to the state of the vessels in the different classes of reserve, I would have prepared myself with a statement of their position. We have, as I have said, 50 ships of the line afloat, 37 frigates, 17 corvettes, 88 sloops, many of which are very powerful vessels, 26 smaller vessels, 24 gun-vessels, and between 150 and 160 gunboats. That is our steam force at present afloat.

LORD LYNTHURST: Have you an account of the French navy?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I have an approximate account, but I will not vouch for the accuracy of the figures. They have 33 ships of the line afloat, and they are building six or eight—in all about 40; of frigates, they have 38 afloat and 12 building, making 50 in all—they surpass us in frigates; of corvettes, sloops, and all the other classes of vessels they have 104,

The Duke of Somerset

which would not at all equal the number of our smaller vessels. The noble and learned Lord referred to a former period, and to the evidence of Admiral Berkeley as to our having 30 sail of the line for the defence of the country, which could be got ready in any emergency to go to sea. We have now 21 or 22 sail of the line at sea all properly manned—that is, more fully and efficiently manned than at any previous time, as we made an addition some months since to their complement. Some time ago I looked to ascertain what would be the complement of a fleet thus fully manned in the Channel or Mediterranean, and I found it would represent upwards of 21,000 men. As regards either the force afloat or the manning of the fleet, I therefore do not believe that the objections can be sustained. The noble and learned Lord said that on a certain occasion our fleet in the Mediterranean was insufficiently manned, and that every one had complained of their condition. No doubt, if ships are sent to sea, they should be efficiently equipped; and I do not think that such a state of things as was experienced during the Syrian war is likely to occur again. With regard to the Russian war, it is well known that we were called on suddenly to send fleets both to the Baltic and the Black Sea, and no doubt the Admiralty of that day was under great difficulties in manning the fleet. But before long what was the case? Why we had one fleet in the Baltic and one in the Black Sea, both very efficient. The fleet in the Black Sea in particular was very efficient—as to the Baltic fleet he would not say that it was all that was required. But if it were contended that we should take none but first-class seamen we should never get them—the question was whether we had men to man the fleet efficiently. On the whole I believe that, not merely as regards the vessels and machinery, but the general arrangements for equipping and sending vessels speedily to sea, at no time were the preparations in so forward a state as at present. I now come to the subject of the highest importance—the men. The noble and learned Lord says we have the ships, but the ships are not half-manned; but it so happens that it is just the contrary difficulty under which we have laboured. On coming into office I found certain Estimates prepared and a £10 bounty in existence. I adopted these, and before the month of August I found that the number of men voted by Parliament was exceeded by 1,000. The news of the Chinese disaster arrived in September, and I did not think it was prudent, under these circumstances, to put a stop to the enrolment of seamen; the result is that for the last six months we have been 5,000 in excess of the Vote. This year we determined to cover that larger number by a larger Vote, but they were still coming in so rapidly that I was obliged to come to the determination only to take able seamen, or ordinary seamen who had already served on board the fleet and been drilled to the guns. When the noble and learned Lord says that if we look to the last month or so, it will be found that we were not getting men. Of course that was so. The men we have are included in the Estimates, and it was not likely I should be taking additional men when I had already 5,000 men more than had been provided for. The noble and learned Lord had referred to the Reserve recommended by the Royal Commission. I have directed my attention to the Commission and their recommendations. The noble and learned Lord has stated correctly that the Commissioners recommend three or four measures. They recommend that the Coastguard should be increased to 12,000 men. I have taken in the Estimates some 10,000 or 11,000 more than last year; and, besides covering the excess in the Estimates this will provide a body of seamen in port ready to put on board ship as soon as they are commissioned. With reference to the Coastguard—

LORD LYNDHURST: Which Coastguard?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Not the Naval Coast Volunteers, but the old Coastguard. Of these there are, first of all, 3,183 who serve on shore, and the officers attached to this force are 259. The crews of the district ships number 2,594; and, in addition, there are the crews of the coasting cruisers, consisting of 827 men. Not including the civilians, to whom the noble and learned Lord has also referred, there are thus of Coastguardmen ready to be put on board ship 6,862 men. The noble and learned Lord seems to attach little importance to the Coastguard ships, because he said they do not go to sea; but he forgets that attached to these vessels there are 14 or more gunboats, which are attached to the vessels round the coast, and in these the men are continually exercised. The crews for the most part are men who have served in the fleet, and a most efficient and excellent body. More than 900 of them are petty officers, which shows the superior class of men who enter the force. It is said that the numbers of the force ought to be raised considerably; but to do that at once would be very injudicious. At present the Coastguard service is a great attraction to seamen—men who have served their ten years in the navy are eligible, and are very glad to get into it. It was only the other day a ship came home and a great number of men elected to go into the Coastguard; and if we were to fill up that serviceable force with any other than experienced and able seamen we should be committing a great injustice and injury to the men in the navy, and discouraging those who are willing to enter the navy, and who are looking forward at the end of their term to get into the Coastguard. The noble and learned Lord did not speak as if he had a very high opinion of the Naval Coast Volunteers, and said he wished me joy of it—by which I supposed he rather meant the contrary. I would only state that there are in the Naval Coast Volunteers 7,000 men. I have received very gratifying reports from the chief officers at Liverpool, Hull, Leith, and numerous other ports upon the coast where they are stationed, all concurring in the conclusion that they are a fine and able body of men, quick at drill, well disciplined, good marksmen, well acquainted with their duties, accustomed to the boats, and altogether an admirable acquisition to the service. It is true they were only intended to serve in the event of emergency, and that they are intended for the defence of the coast; but for that purpose they are a most able and effective body of men, and the reports regarding them from all the different districts are of a highly favourable nature. I think then that as far as the Coastguard and the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve are concerned, that these statements are most satisfactory. It is quite true that the Commission on Manning the Navy recommended that the Naval Coast Reserve should be a body of 10,000 men, and that at present we have only 7,000. In considering this subject we must contemplate the position of the mercantile marine of this country as well as the position of the navy. A great many men have recently been coming into the navy, but the mercantile marine has of late been drawing largely upon seamen. I have a Return from all the ports relative to the rate of wages given, and I am informed that wages are now better than they have been in most former years. I have Returns from London, Liverpool, Bristol, Plymouth, Newcastle, Sunderland, and other places, and the general observation is to this effect, and that they are sending to other ports for men. There is a competition thus created between the mercantile marine and the navy which tends to affect the Naval Reserve; and the men when they can get those high wages will not come into the navy; so that the very prosperity of the merchant service to a certain extent embarrasses the advance of the naval force. The noble and learned Lord had stated that the Royal Naval Reserve was to be raised to 30,000; but I think the Commission put it at 20,000. As regarded that force undoubtedly there are great difficulties in framing the regulations. The noble and learned Lord laughed at the regulations, and asked, how could the seamen follow them? If these regulations were part of their business and their duty I might agree with the noble and learned Lord; but that was not the case. The regulations for the most part are addressed to the shipping masters and the officers who enrol the men. I believe all the regulations which seamen are required to know can be printed on a single sheet. All we want in regard to this force is a little time. We did not begin to pay the men until April, and we all know that seamen are not very likely to come forward until the pay begins. The scheme has only been a month in operation, and I believe the men are entering very fairly; somewhere about 1,000 have joined, and they are all of them fine men, excellent sailors. In raising this force the Board of Admiralty was unanimous in thinking it desirable that we should only admit at first what are called "able seamen," and not admit ordinary men; because we wanted to get a class of men who would all of them be useful as the nucleus of a ship's company, and to keep out that class who would join only for the sake of the money, and when the emergency arose would not be forthcoming. A letter has been forwarded to me, written by the seamen of Hartlepool to the seamen of Aberdeen, which shows very satisfactorily what is the feeling of the men on the subject. The seamen of Aberdeen, it appears, did not like the scheme, thinking there was some trap in it, and they wrote to the seamen of Hartlepool to ask their advice. The reply was:—"Upwards of 100 men have joined the force here, all like it, and the general opinion is that before long all the eligible men in Hartlepool will be included in it." They added, that there was going to be a demonstration to forward it; the scheme is popular with the men of Hartlepool, and they have every confidence in the Government not sending them on a foreign station—any man who is afraid of being called upon in a time of emergency is not fit to be a reserve man. That is their feeling—and very creditable it is to them. They say, "We are doing well in the merchant service, and we do not want to be sent out to any of your little wars to China or the River Plate, or any of those places where you are always carrying on some small hostilities; but when it comes to a regular European war, we will take our share in it with any man." Taking all these forces together, we have a total reserve of about 14,850 men, and, considering they are all good men, that is not a force to be despised. The noble and learned Lord says we ought to have enrolled a larger number of reserve men; and I have no doubt that, if we had gone about offering bounties to any sort of men, we should have made a much larger show on paper than we do at present. But that would have been a very injudicious course in the long run. The right course was to begin well, and to look to efficiency as much as numbers. I am told that if we had taken the worst class of men, the best class of men would never have joined. The course we have taken has two advantages—it does not involve so large an expenditure as if we had taken men of all classes; and it gives us the nucleus of a valuable force hereafter. The noble and learned Lord talked with a total disregard of economical considerations; but if we are to establish a force which is to last, we must pay some attention to economy. If we were to establish it on an extravagant and wasteful system, Parliament would very soon be for putting it down again. What the country wants is a force that shall grow and be efficient, and the cost of which will not be excessive. I believe by the measures we have taken we shall attain that result. The noble and learned Lord said we could not expect men to join for £6 a year. I have heard that before. Suppose you were to give £10 or £15 a year. In that case a seaman would never go into the navy, because he would be much better in the Naval Reserve with £15 a year, and serving in the merchant service, or picking up odd money in any way. Many of them would continue for their whole lives pensioners on the public. You ought to give a man just enough to be a tie upon him, but still not enough to make him better off than the sailor in the navy, nor so as to induce him to discontinue his service in the mercantile marine, qualifying himself for service in the navy. It has been said that we should give as much as £20 a year. If we did so, the men would live ashore, and in a few years they would be a set of drunken fellows, unfit to serve their country at sea. The Commission recommended £5. We raised the sum to £6, but I had great doubts about it, and it was only after consultation with experienced and competent persons that I thought, on the whole, £6 would be a better sum. There is another body to which the noble and learned Lord has not referred, but which I consider far the most important part of the force—I mean the boys. What we want is to bring in boys to serve in the navy. A boy who has been a couple of years at sea training in the Government ships is a better man for the Royal Navy than almost any man you can obtain from the mercantile marine. What, then, have the Admiralty done in respect of boys? In 1855, which was a year of war, we entered 4,000 first and second class boys; in 1856 we entered 3,000; in 1857, 1,800; in 1858, 1,690; and in 1859, 5,147. There are 8,200 first and second class boys now serving in our ships. It must always be borne in mind that in training boys for our ships the proportion of boys must have some reference to the proportion of men, and that, therefore, we must take in only such a number of boys as can be absorbed in the fleet. But we have not yet reached that point, and in the Estimates for the present year, besides the 11,000 excess that I have of men over the Estimates of last year, there is an addition of 2,000 boys. We are, therefore, training a large number of boys for the navy. I think that is a very wise course. Captains just returned from sea have told me that the boys make the best sailors in the navy, and that we cannot have too many of them. Accordingly, I have had some vessels prepared, and am now having more prepared, for the purpose of training boys. The House, however, is aware that a very great expenditure may be incurred if orders are too hastily given for anything that may be suggested, much of which may be avoided by proper consideration. The noble and learned Lord has referred to a kind of compulsory service. I believe that if anything could make your navy unpopular, and cripple your efficient force afloat, it would be the attempt to establish a compulsory service. The noble and learned Lord adverted to another point, which he seemed to think the root of all the evils he pointed out. I do not think, however, it is such a great misfortune that the First Lord should not be a professional seaman. I may refer the noble and learned Lord to a speech made by the late Sir Robert Peel, in which he showed the House of Commons what befel our naval First Lords when we had them. He described how Lord Howe had been hunted down, how Keppel had been treated, what had become of Lord St. Vincent. Lord Howe was absolutely hunted out of his place, and I do not think Lord St. Vincent was a very successful First Lord. We cannot, in fact, make a remarkably good show of our naval First Lords. After all, however, the question is not between civilians and seamen. In a Parliamentary Government the Board of Admiralty must be properly represented in Parliament. If you have got a good naval officer in Parliament, I see no reason why he should not be made First Lord; but I do not think it is absolutely necessary that the First Lord should be a professional sailor. Anybody who knows what the details of the Admiralty are, how many questions there are which have nothing to do with service afloat, must admit that for the administration of the navy it is not essential that a man should have had a naval education. I agree with the noble and learned Lord that it is a misfortune there should be such constant changes in the Board; but that evil is not now so great as it was formerly. When I came into office I found a gallant Admiral there who had been one of the Board in the time of the noble Earl opposite, and I think it is always desirable to retain the services of some Members of the Board. But there is also an advantage in some change. What is now done at the Horse Guards, with respect to a compulsory retirement at the end of five years, is done in an indirect way at the Admiralty. You change some of your men and retain others; there is an infusion of fresh blood, and other members of the profession have an opportunity of serving in the Admiralty, where they acquire knowledge which makes them better officers for high command when they return to sea. The noble and learned Lord has not referred to block-ships; but it has been frequently asked in "another place," "Why do you keep block-ships in different harbours?" I admit that they are useless for the purpose of going to sea; but for the purpose of drilling men, and as batteries to guard the mouth of rivers, they are useful vessels. If we were to condemn them, and send them back to the dockyards, they would be stripped, become hulks, and not worth refitting again. I think it is desirable, therefore, to keep them up as long as they will last, and can be turned to a useful purpose. Some of them are still good and efficient batteries, and, if their services were required, would be able to defend the mouth of our rivers. I shall not follow the noble and learned Lord into other questions upon which he touched. We may talk about them more conveniently when we come to consider the Budget. Let us not mix up anything of party with this question. What we all want is, that our navy should be powerful. It may be that difficult times are coming, and we ought to be prepared for them. Let no consideration of party, or of Admiralties, or of Governments, prevent us from doing whatever is necessary to render our navy efficient. That, I think, is the right course to be taken, and it is one in which I hope and believe all parties will co-operate together for the common good.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, the noble Duke had so fully answered the speech of his noble and learned Friend that there was very little left for him (the Earl of Hardwicke) to say in reference to the points to which attention had been more immediately called. But as his noble and learned Friend had enlarged very much on the whole subject of the navy, and had gone back to very ancient times, he might be permitted to say that so far as he had read the history of the navy, this question of the difficulty of manning the navy had been for a long period of time one of anxiety, and frequently the subject of debate in both Houses of Parliament. The country in former times relied upon the impress, and though he was sensible that this was an unpopular topic, yet he must remark that former Governments had taken very great care that the power of the Crown should not be injured in this matter. His own conviction still was that in time of emergency the necessities of the country might be so great that they might be forced to have recourse to the law which authorized them to compel seamen to serve in the defence of the country. His noble and learned Friend stated that he brought this subject forward, having first waited to see if precedence would be taken by any noble Lord who, as he was pleased to say, better understood the subject; but he (Earl Hardwicke) felt very happy that his noble and learned Friend had undertaken the task. He might, however, remind him that he (the Earl of Hardwicke) had not neglected his duty, inasmuch as he had early in the Session called the noble Duke's attention to the state of the Naval Reserve. His noble and learned Friend had stated truly that after 1815 there was great neglect in not keeping up our naval power; and he also stated that at the time we went to war with Russia our Baltic fleet was in a lamentable state, as to manning, in consequence of the condition of the Reserve of the country. But his noble and learned Friend forgot to state that though there had been great omissions under previous Boards of Admiralty, yet it was during the Government of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) that our power in the Baltic was mainly created by the Duke of Northumberland, who during the short time that he was in office had constructed no less than nine heavy screw ships. No doubt, after the Russian war, operations came to a standstill, and remained so until the attention of the country was again aroused by a sense of danger. It happened that his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was again called to the councils of the Crown, and during the short time that he remained in power the British fleet was much improved by extraordinary exertions, but also with economy in its true sense. During the time that his noble Friend was in office he believed that the fleet was increased by fourteen or fifteen sail of the line, and that there were also eight or nine more such vessels on the stocks nearly ready for launching; a Channel fleet of considerable power was formed, the Mediterranean fleet was strengthened, and there was a vote granted for an increase of 8,000 seamen and 2,000 Marines. Much attention had been excited by statements as to the supposed facility with which the French were able to man their fleet and send it to sea, and he himself knew it was a question with the former Government as to their power of doing this. It was stated that the French had a reserve of 60,000 men ; but he believed it was known to officers of their own fleet that not more than half that number was at any time available to man the navy : 30,000 trained seamen, however, was a most formidable force, and therefore it was that his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) issued a Commission to inquire if anything could be done to increase our power in that respect. He desired to do everything he could to forward the views of the noble Duke for the improvement of the navy, but he must say that he was surprised that more rapid execution was not taken in reference to the recommendations of that Commission for forming a Naval Reserve. The noble Duke said that it was not until the month of March last that efficient steps were taken ; but it was in May of last year that the Commission reported. The object of the Commission was to lay the foundation of a permanent Reserve, to be used in case of emergency ; and it was recommended that a system should be adopted for bringing closer together and interweaving the mercantile marine and the Royal Navy ; and with this object, it was proposed that in each of the twelve great ports there should be a school ship capable of receiving from 1,000 to 1,200 boys, who should be trained by a naval education, and who should, at the expiration of a certain period, go into the merchant service if they thought fit, or into the permanent Reserve. By now enrolling adults the late Government hoped to relieve the immediate wants of the service ; but the main object was to be effected by means of the school ships. What they had heard as to the Reserve was not highly encouraging, but he believed that if once the system took with the seamen there would soon be a very considerable body of men ready at the call of the country. He only regretted that so long an interval had been allowed to elapse between the presenting the Report of the Commission, and going seriously to work to form the Reserve. He believed that the raising 5,000 Marines, in addition to the 15,000 we already possessed, was a most important step ; but care must be taken that there were no more Marines than could from time to time be made available ; for, if there were more than were required for their proper duties, they would be no longer Marines, but ordinary soldiers. He thought, however, that 20,000 Marines would never be too many. Those men when trained were a most useful and efficient body. They could be sent to sea on all cases of emergency, and having received practical education in gunnery, they make capital artillerymen. If a 50-gun ship were to be sent to sea on an emergency, by putting 50 Marines on board of her they would have a trained artilleryman to each gun, who with the assistance of such men as could be got together for the service would be able to fight a tolerably good action. With regard to the Coastguard, the view the Commission took of them was, having ascertained that the number at present was insufficient to protect the revenue of the country, they thought that the amount of the force should be increased to 12,000. In the present uneasiness that prevailed as to the peace of Europe, he thought it would be wise to raise the Coastguard to that standard ; more especially as the number of the men stood at 10,000 according to the statute, although it had never reached that number. The noble Duke very properly remarked that the Coastguard service was considered as an honourable resting place for the most excellent of our seamen after they had rendered valuable service to the country for a series of years, and that it was intended to keep it exclusively for that purpose. That arrangement might be very good in times when there was no restlessness or uneasiness felt in reference to our foreign relations ; but in such times it ought to be opened at once and the number raised. The idea entertained by the Commission was, that if they got rid of the landsmen we should at any moment be enabled to obtain from the Coastguard service, if they were raised to 12,000, a sufficient number of seamen to man twenty sail of the line, and could replace them in the Coastguard duties by the Militia. We had the Coast Volunteers ; but the objection to that force was that they served under certain conditions, and could not be sent more than three leagues from the shore ; consequently, however valuable the services of that force might be in regard to ships cruising in the Channel, they would be comparatively useless for any other purpose. But after all, he should say that the Naval Reserves were nothing as compared with the importance of maintaining an efficient fleet of well-manned ships, which would form the nucleus of a great naval force in the event of war. The country must, therefore, be content to pay the amount of money that would be necessary to maintain for the service of the State a powerful Channel

The Duke of Somerset

as well as Mediterranean fleet. With a permanent peace establishment of not less than 60,000 seamen and marines, together with such a Naval Reserve as we might now hope to possess, he thought that they might reasonably consider the country in a perfect state of security. It became a matter of great importance to the British sailor, if he desired to preserve his liberty from any interference, and was anxious to be saved from seeing the press-gang again at work, that he should enter willingly those Reserves; for the country must be defended at all hazards, and their Lordships as well as all others must bear their share of the dangers of the crisis, and suffer the same inconveniences in times of invasion or of threatened invasion. If the seamen did not wish to be impressed, they must voluntarily undertake the duties which the State now asked them to perform upon terms easy in themselves and highly lucrative. A retaining fee and a pension was, after all, no small advantage to these volunteer seamen for the performance of those duties required for the defence of their wives, their children, and their homes.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had omitted to answer one portion of the speech of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Lyndhurst). He had omitted to state how it was that the recommendation of the Commissioners in reference to the increase of the Marines had not been carried out. The Commissioners had recommended an addition of 5,000 men to that admirable force, who, being organized and experienced in gunnery, were ready to go to sea at a moment's notice, and were as fit for service as any seamen who could possibly be obtained in times of sudden emergency. He trusted, therefore, that the recommendation of the Commissioners on this point would be fully carried out by the Government.

LORD COLCHESTER expressed a wish to offer a few observations in reference to compulsory service before the noble Duke answered the question just addressed to him. He thought the House must have been extremely gratified with the clear and satisfactory account which the noble Duke had given of the steps which had been taken by the Government to secure the efficiency of the navy and a good Naval Reserve. There was an impression in the navy that naval officers were never to be permitted to fill the office of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and he was therefore glad to hear the noble Duke express an opinion that members of the profession ought not to be excluded from such appointments. With regard to the necessity of retaining to the Government power to compel seamen to serve in cases of emergency, he admitted that the system of impressment formerly enforced was extremely unpopular, and he had no wish that that power should be used unnecessarily, or except as a last resort. At the same time he thought that the power ought to be retained, because he feared that the expectations entertained as to the result of the establishment of a Reserve might prove too sanguine, and that if occasion should arise for calling out the men forming the Reserve they might not be found forthcoming. No doubt, many men would accept the bounty, but would they be forthcoming when required? The First Lord of the Admiralty might "call spirits from the vasty deep; but would they come when he did call for them." He did not mean that the men would be unwilling to serve their country, but they might be absent on trading voyages. He would also remind the House that on the commencement of a great European war the merchant shipping interest would prove a powerful competitor with the Royal Navy, and the men whose services were calculated upon in case of emergency might, when that emergency arose, be found to have entered other services. It was essential that on the breaking out of a war we should have the superiority at sea; for if the enemy had the superiority for five or six weeks, he would capture all our homeward bound merchant ships, and instead of serving on board the fleet the men would be carried to foreign prisons. Under those circumstances, he thought it absolutely necessary that the Government should possess the power of impressment in case seamen declined voluntarily, when war broke out, to join the Royal Navy. The prejudice among seamen against compulsory service was not so much on account of its being compulsory, as in consequence of the indefinite period for which they, the seamen, had formerly been required to serve. That grievance was, however, removed by the Act of 1835, which limited compulsory service to five years; and he trusted that if the necessity should ever arise, the Government of that day would not be deterred by the fear of popular clamour from using the

The Earl of Hardwicke

ers with which they were, by law, altered.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in answer to his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alby) had meant to state that the number of marines was originally fixed at 10,000. The late Government provided for raising them to 17,000, and the present Government to 18,000; but he thought it undesirable to raise more than 10,000 additional in the present year, because if they were too hastily raised a prudence could not be exercised as to the quality of men accepted; it would increase the difficulty of drilling them properly—and it was of the utmost importance that they should be well drilled before they were sent afloat. There were now on shore 6,000 Marines—the number which the Commission had recommended that we should have in order to be on board in case of any emergency. As to impressment, of course that power belonged to the prerogative of the Crown. At present, he was sure, no advisers of the Crown, whoever they might be, would recommend the Crown to use, except in the case of such extreme necessity that they would not anticipate it.

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY AND LORD ALBOT thought the House and the country owed a debt of gratitude to his noble and learned Friend for having introduced the question, and it was most satisfactory to know that the debate had taken place without the slightest symptoms of party feeling. There was only one point on which he wished to make a remark, namely, in reference to the training of boys. He thought great advantage would result from training boys in the services of a man-of-war whether they were intended for Her Majesty's service or not, that when in after years a case of emergency arose and their services were required they would have little or nothing to learn. With respect to the power of impressment, it was quite clear that it must not be abolished, though it was also clear that in the present state of public feeling it could not be exercised except in cases of urgent and imperative necessity.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that though impressment had been in abeyance for a considerable number of years there was not the smallest doubt but that the power of exercising it belonged in full to the prerogative of the Crown. That power could only be abrogated or altered by an act of the Legislature of the country. He trusted that there would be no necessity ever again for exercising that power; but if the necessity should arise, he repeated, there was not the smallest doubt of the legality of it.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,
to Thursday next, a quarter
before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, May 1, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Census (Ireland)
Exchequer.
3^o Common Lodging Houses (Ireland); Customs.

COURT OF CHANCERY IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, if the Government intend to introduce a Bill into Parliament during the present Session, or to take any steps to carry into effect the Recommendations of the Commissioners relative to the abolition of the payment of Fees in the offices of the Court of Chancery, Ireland?

MR. SERJEANT DEASY said, the Government did not intend to introduce any Bill during the present Session for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners relative to the abolition of fees in the offices of the Irish Court of Chancery; and without a legislative measure it would be impossible to carry those recommendations into effect.

THE STADE DUES.

QUESTION.

MR. FENWICK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's and other Governments with reference to the abolition of the Stade Toll, and whether he will state to the House the exact position of that question?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said

not prepared at present to lay on the Table the correspondence which had taken place on this subject. Some time ago he had stated that, in consequence of the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown of the present and of the late Government, they thought it advisable to enter into negotiation with Hanover on the subject of compensation for the abolition of the Stade Dues. A proposal was subsequently received from Hanover as to the basis upon which that compensation should be granted; but on referring the proposal to the Board of Trade, it was decided that that basis could not be accepted by this country. There the matter for the present remained.

THE LATE OUTRAGE IN EGYPT.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received any further intelligence of the outrage said to have been committed in Egypt by young Cadets? He understood that it was really not committed by Cadets, and if the right hon. Gentleman has any information to that effect it might be satisfactory to the friends of the young gentlemen who went out by the mail in question.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had received no information on the subject further than that which he had already laid before the House. It was not stated in the Consul's letter that those concerned in the disturbance were cadets, but he talked of young gentlemen lately released from school.

THE POST OFFICE.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, Whether the Commission of Inquiry at the Post Office has terminated its labours, or has been dissolved; and, if so, for what reasons?

MR. LAING said, he believed that the Commission to which the hon. Baronet referred was only a Committee of some of the officers of the Post Office, who were appointed to inquire into the circulation department. That inquiry had been suspended for a few days in consequence of some alteration in the extent of the inquiries; but he believed it had been renewed, and was now going on.

Lord John Russell

MR. OGILVIE AND THE TARIFF.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Mr. Ogilvie, of the London Customs, who has been selected to assist in the revision of the French Tariff, as stipulated under the Treaty, is the officer of that name who, a few years ago, was engaged, under the direction of the present Chairman and Board of Customs, in getting up the prosecutions for alleged frauds against the various Dock Companies of the Port of London; whether Mr. Ogilvie was employed in revising the British Tariff which has just been abolished, and which was based upon the principle of levying Duties by specific rates; and, further, whether there is any objection to the Reports or Statements made on a former occasion by Mr. Ogilvie to the Board of Customs, or any member of it, or to any person connected with the Government, in opposition to the abolition or reduction of the Wine Duties, being presented to this House?

MR. LAING said, he must beg the hon. Gentleman to postpone his question until the Chancellor of the Exchequer was present. His right hon. Friend, he believed, would wish to make some statement respecting Mr. Ogilvie.

THE WINE LICENCES BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he wished to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take the Adjourned Debate on this Bill as the first Order on Thursday?

MR. LAING replied, that that must depend on the progress which the House might make with the Reform Bill. It was intended to take the Wine Licences and Refreshment Houses Bill on the first Government night after the termination of the debate on the Reform Bill.

SAVOY—THE CONFERENCE.

QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I observe that in "another place" the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs is reported to have said that the Conference respecting the Savoy question is postponed. That does not quite agree with the answer given by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell)

Friday, and perhaps he will state whether the Conference has been postponed, whether the bases on which it will be arranged.

MR. JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I do not know my noble Friend can have said that the Conference is postponed. What he has said, and what I believe he did say, was that the time of meeting had not been fixed. The French Government have always said that they did not think the Conference ought to meet until after the opening of the Sardinian Parliament had been decided upon the Treaty, because if that Treaty were for the rejection of the Treaty, the whole negotiation must fall to the ground. The time of meeting is, therefore, not fixed, and will not be fixed until the result of the vote is ascertained.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: The noble Lord has not answered the latter part of my question, as to whether the bases of the Conference are arranged.

MR. JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot say whether they are arranged, because there has been no agreement among the Powers of Europe with regard to those bases.

MANNING THE NAVY.

ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER, in rising to move for an Address upon this subject, said that in 1852 the Commission appointed to inquire into the manning of the navy recommended the adoption of the continuous-service system, which was partially carried out. Another recommendation was that a ship similar to the Britannia and other frigates should be maintained for the purpose of exercising the boys of the fleet. He had not heard, however, that that recommendation had been complied with. The Commission of 1852 recommended that 10,000 men should be stationed at different ports as a Reserve, and the Commission of 1856 had made a similar recommendation with regard to a force of 60,000 men, in addition to the crews on board the ships forming the Channel fleet, if that recommendation had been carried out he could have understood the declaration of the Admiralty that they had as many men as they wanted. But that recommendation had not been adopted, although the number had been reduced. Then, again, the country was paying for upwards of 60,000 Coastguard men, but of these only 6,362 were sailors, including officers. The regular ships' companies were not men who could be taken to complete the manning of a fleet, or to man a new one, and the 1,400 Revenue men were no more nor less than civilians. The Reserve, therefore, which, in the case of any emergency, they had to fall back upon, was 6,362 Coastguard men, instead of a reserve of 70,000 men, as contemplated by the Manning Commission. It was absurd to tell the House of Commons that they had a Reserve to fall back upon when all in the world knew the contrary. He was glad to find that there were entering the Naval Reserve more numbers than formerly, as he had formed that there were 400 at least of all good sailors. It was satisfactory also to find that the able seamen of the port of London were joining, and that every vessel of war had been stationed in the docks for the instruction of the crew. Still, 1,000 men were but a very small proportion of the 30,000 who were wanted, and every means should be taken to supply the deficiency. He could not see why the men who had served ten years in the navy should not be induced to join the Coastguard, and their time of service counted—say three years as two—for the long-service pension. He found that some of the recommendations of the Committee of 1852 had been acted upon, but a larger quantity of provision was made for the men, but this cause of objection was counterbalanced by the saving for saving being reduced or discontinued, and he believed the men would prefer going back to the old system. Then, as to the payment of wages, he could not see why there should be weekly payments as long as the men were in port. He thought much of the breaking and discontent that might be prevented if the men were allowed to draw any portion of their wages while in port, and then to have leave on shore, as the East India Company's service. The late Admiral opposite (Sir J. Elphinstone) had found that making the paymaster of the ship a sort of banker to the men, and allowing them to draw what they wanted, acted very satisfactorily to all. Some improvements, he admitted, had taken place in dispensing the money to seamen's wives; but he was not to complain that those allotments were made so soon as they ought to be, but he held that from the moment a man went on board a ship his wife ought to be entitled to the allotment, and that it to be paid to her once a week. He contended also that on returning home from a cruise, the moment the anchor dropped, a certain number of the men—say one of the watches—ought to be allowed to go on shore to see their families and friends, and to take with them, not the whole of the money due to them, for that led to extravagance, but a portion of it. The men did not like to be kept on board with their money in their pockets. They were often called reckless, but it was the Government system that made them so. When the army was paid once a month there was much more debauchery among the troops than there was now that they received their pay daily. In former days he had seen seamen receive thirty or forty or even fifty pounds the day before, or on the very day they sailed. He had even known them to throw their money overboard, because they did not know what to do with it. During the two years he commanded the Channel fleet there had been no discontent, because whenever he came to port he did not let his men go on leave by dribblets of 20 or 30 per cent, but he let a whole watch go at once, and for forty-eight hours. No wonder when one captain let a whole watch out on leave, and another only gave a similar privilege to 30 per cent of his crew, that there was discontent. He had been accused of causing dissatisfaction and discontent in the fleet. Not only, however, did he deny the truth of that imputation, but contended that hardly a single improvement had taken place in the navy for many years past that had not originated with himself, though the Admiralty had in some cases allowed a quarter of a century to elapse in carrying them out. His great aim had been to improve the condition of the seamen. He did not doubt that the Admiralty were desirous of improving their condition also, but they were so excessively slow in all their motions that he had long since lost all patience with them; however, the noble Lord had done what no Secretary of the Admiralty, whether in the service or a civilian, had ever done before him—he had said that corporal punishment should be abolished. He (Sir C. Napier) had always contended that it was impossible at once to put an end to it; and he had stated as much to his constituents, though they hooted him for it. The contrary declaration of the noble Lord had tended to produce more discontent than anything which he (Sir C. Napier) had done. What he had always laboured to effect was to improve the condition of the seamen; satisfied as he was that that was the true policy. The noble Lord's speech had been hawked and placarded about the seaports, but it had only been laughed at. Seamen were told that they were noble, fine, jolly fellows, only they were so suspicious, and above all, of the Admiralty. If that was so, what was the use of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty stating to the House not long ago that the number of seamen was complete, and that the Admiralty could not avail themselves of the services of any more. It was well known that neither the Channel fleet, the Coastguard, nor the 4,000 men required for service in the home-ports were complete. What, therefore, was the use of the noble Lord "bamboozling" the House and the seamen in that way? It would have been much better for him to say what number of men was wanted, for to state that the navy was abundantly supplied with men, at a time when complaints were made of the hesitation of seamen to enter the service, was the very way to produce the cause of complaint itself. He believed the position of petty officers in the navy was much improved, but he thought the Admiralty had behaved very shabbily in the case of pensions to the widows of warrant officers. They had restored the pensions which at one time they took away, but the manner in which they had been restored was wholly unworthy of the Admiralty. If a warrant officer died on the 25th of December, 1859, the pension to his widow was refused; but, if he died on the 1st of January, 1860, the widow got the pension—a distinction which was shabby in the extreme. With regard to the Naval Coast Volunteers, upon whom the Report said no reliance could be placed, there was a means of making them useful, which he would recommend to the attention of the noble Lord. He would take out of the block-ships at the various ports their masts and spars, making them what they really were—block-ships, and would put into them the Coast Volunteers. Those ships were of no use, lying as they now were; but they might be made serviceable should any disaster arise, by putting the Coastguard on board of them. It would be found a useful step, too, to call each block-ship by the name of the port to which it was attached, as men had a certain pride in belonging to a ship which bore the name of their own port. The Commission recommended a re-adjustment of the Merchant Seamen's Fund; but no step whatever had been taken towards that object. This was a very important matter, and if properly carried out, would be of great use to the men. Another matter to which he wished to refer was, that of admission to Greenwich Hospital. That might be made a strong inducement to enter the navy, but before seamen could be brought to care about Greenwich Hospital, that establishment must be reformed. A Commission had been appointed to consider the subject; but the Report of that Commission had not yet been laid on the table. He did not know why, unless it was that the Admiralty was ashamed of the exposures that would be made; but it was certainly high time that the House should have it, and that the hospital should undergo a thorough reform. Besides the Coastguard service, the opening of which would constitute a powerful inducement to seamen to serve in the navy, there were many places in the Custom House to which civilians and landmen were at present appointed, and which might be conferred upon the sailor. There were also the dockyard and victualling lighters, employment in which might be restricted to seamen after they had left the navy. Then, as to the propriety of not allowing men to go on shore after returning from a three or four years' cruise, he thought it was very hard upon them; especially as it was notorious that the officers were permitted to land to see their friends. This might be easily remedied by at once discharging the men into a ship that was ready to receive them upon their coming home, and placing the ship, from which they had been discharged with all her stores on board, into the hands of the dockyard authorities. On the subject of stores, he would tell the House what he himself witnessed on Saturday last. He was walking past a union-house in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth, when he saw a lot of what he supposed to be junk brought to the union door. Curious to see what sort of junk it was, he laid his hand upon a bundle of it, and it turned out to be a piece of six or seven-inch rope, that appeared to belong to the shears of a three-decker, and was bran new. Searching farther he found another piece of rope that was also without a rub upon it, and that, too, was quite new. Let the House fancy that system going on at every union-house in the vicinity of the dockyards at Portsmouth, Plymouth, and other ports, and imagine what the cost must be. Well, he asked the man who was in charge to give him a piece of the rope, which he did; and he (Sir Charles Napier) sent it to Admiral Grey, at Portsmouth, in order that some inquiry might be made as to how the rope had been thus cut up. And he thought that the best thing the Admiralty could do would be to have the whole of the rope sent back to Portsmouth, institute a survey, and whoever the offender might be dismiss him instant. His hon. Friend (Sir J. Elphinstone) had referred, on a former occasion, to the question of men breaking their leave, and the offence was one which ought to be punished; for it was totally inconsistent with the maintenance of order and discipline in the service. Some captains, if the men of the starboard watch broke their leave, kept the port-watch in the ship until the others returned, which was punishing the innocent for the guilty. Usually stopping his leave was the only punishment, if a man broke his leave; and the result was that when the man did get leave he broke it again. He contended that men ought to be more severely punished for this offence. He would not have them flogged, but would give them a week's imprisonment, with hard labour. He would not send these men to Exeter or Winchester gaol, for they came out worse than they went in. There ought to be naval prisons in the seaport towns. The crews in port would know that these men were in prison for breaking leave, and so forth; and it would do more than anything to prevent a repetition of the offence. It was said that the Admiralty had made a new code of laws for the navy, and he hoped it would soon be published. For desertion, and other serious offences, he would send men to the penal settlements; and if it were publicly known that this punishment would follow, there would be very little desertion. He implored the Admiralty to take this into consideration. He would give the sailors the same right to a court-martial that was given to the army. Let the sailor be tried by his own officers. He used to establish a certain sort of court-martial. He told the ship's company they might be present if they liked, and he took evidence; but he was obliged to act as judge, jury, and executioner. Unless, however, the Admiralty paid their men better, they would never make the service popular. He used to be opposed to giving better pay to the men, and was for giving it instead to the petty officers. But it was now found that men would not serve in the navy, if they could get employment elsewhere. The Admiralty, like every other employer of labour, must pay the market price. He would encourage every A. B. to look forward to becoming a petty officer; and he would approach the pay of the petty officer nearer to that of the warrant officer. If the Admiralty raised the petty officer's position, the men would respect him more. If the petty officer committed a crime, let him be tried by court-martial; and if he were dismissed the service and lost his pension, he would be very severely punished. The petty officers, however, should not be tried by the officers of the ship's company. They ought to be tried by the captains and officers of the fleet, with all the solemnity that could be given to the inquiry. The difficulty in procuring men, was shown in the case of the Ganges, Renown, Diadem, and Mersey. The Ganges was 10 weeks in getting 428 men. The Renown obtained 650 men in 17 weeks. The Diadem and Mersey were about as long in raising the same proportion. All that time the pay of the officers was going on; and he should like to know how much was thus lost in officers' pay, while the men were coming in by dribblets. When, as frequently happened, a ship abroad was kept waiting to be relieved, the Admiralty were paying half the men in one ship and the whole of the men in the other during the interval. The House might like to know the opinion of the sailors. He had received many letters from them, and they agreed that there were many seamen unemployed who might be got to serve Her Majesty. The watermen and lightermen of the Thames, in consideration of certain privileges which they enjoyed, were obliged when called upon to serve in the navy, but the Admiralty now-a-days rarely, if ever, enforced the claims they had upon them. In his opinion, however, the services of these men might be turned to good account. He recommended the Admiralty to establish a large and efficient vessel somewhere in the river, on board of which the watermen could be drilled. The existence of their privileges depended upon their responding to any call that was made upon them, and the Admiralty would have no difficulty in collecting as many as would form a complete ship's company. There were block-ships at Liverpool and Harwich, but none at all in the Thames, where a ship's crew might be had for nothing. It was his earnest desire to see the navy put in an efficient condition, and he saw no reason, if the proper steps were taken, why it should not become so popular that, instead of the Admiralty having to beg men to join, they would beg to be employed. It ought not to be said that this great maritime country found a difficulty in obtaining choice seamen for her fleet, which was not experienced by the great steam companies and private traders. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty indeed had stated that choice seamen had been procured for the navy; but from the information he (Admiral Napier) had received he was disposed to believe, though they might be choice seamen some years hence they could not be called so now. He wished particularly to press upon the Admiralty the necessity of establishing better discipline in the navy. A sailor must be ruled with a hand of iron in a glove of velvet; he should be treated with consideration and indulgence when well-behaved, but any breach of discipline should be severely punished.

Sir Charles Napier

Sir Charles Napier

Motion made and Question proposed,—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, expressing the regret of this House that, instead of a Reserve of 70,000 men contemplated by the Manning Commission, there only exists 6,362 Coast Guard Men, including Officers, 1,900 District Ships' Companies, 1,400 Revenue Men and 600 Cruisers' Men, and 5,000 or 6,000 Coast Volunteers not to be depended upon; and, as a Vote of this House has unanimously decided that the Report of the Manning Commission ought to be carried out, this House humbly prays Her Majesty will give directions that the Coast Guard should be completed to 12,000 seamen, as recommended by the Commission, ready to be placed in efficient ships at the several Ports, instead of the present block-ships, thus constituting a Reserve of ten sail of the line, ready for any emergency; that the number of Naval Volunteers, now under 1,000 should be completed as soon as possible, and the other recommendations of the Commission complied with; and humbly to represent to Her Majesty that the bounty for able seamen ought not to have been lowered till the number wanted was complete.”

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to second the Motion, as well as to express a hope that the important suggestions of his hon. and gallant Friend would receive due attention from the Admiralty. He seconded the Motion principally in the hope that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty would be able to give some good account of the Naval Volunteer force. He was very happy indeed to have heard since he came into the House that the reports which the noble Lord would be able to make were of a very faavourable nature. He always felt that there would be considerable difficulty in starting that force, but that when it was once put in motion the seafaring population of this country would cheerfully enter it; and that, inasmuch as it combined many advantages, it would go on constantly increasing in numbers and efficiency. The arrangements with respect to the reserve force had been completed only a short time, and it was not to be expected that the number of men enrolled before the completion of the arrangements would be very considerable. He thought the machinery for increasing the reserve force might be modified with great advantage. It was not politic to burden an overworked department like the Board of Trade with the formation and management of a Reserve force of 60,000 men, which must be greatly augmented in time of war. He thought that the many officers of high standing who were unemployed ought to be constituted a department for superintending that force. By means of a department of that sort the naval force and the mercantile service might be brought more into unison than they were at present. He would also press most strongly upon the Secretary of the Admiralty the propriety of devoting his most strenuous exertions to carrying into effect the recommendations of the Manning Commission with respect to the establishment of school ships, for it was on school ships that the whole matter depended. If we could only obtain 15,000 or 20,000 men for the Naval Reserve, the school ships would soon supply enough of men to make that body as numerous as the Manning Commission recommended it to be. The boys trained in these ships would rapidly become men, and they would be men of education and good character. The school ships would form a connecting link with the merchant service, and that was very much wanted. He would also urge upon the notice of the Secretary to the Admiralty the extreme injustice of carrying out only partially the recommendations of the Naval Commission in regard to warrant officers. Many cases of hardship had arisen from the restrictions which accompanied the restoration of pensions to the widows of warrant officers, and he trusted that they would be removed. A petition from no less than forty widows of warrant officers for compensation had lately been laid on the table of the House, but the informal manner in which it was drawn prevented its reception. He had on that occasion also presented a petition from a warrant officer's widow, which was to the effect that the petitioner, a person of very high character, was the widow of the gunner of the Sanspareil, Mr. John Alexander White, who died of cholera at the siege of Canton, and that, in consequence of her husband having died before the date of the warrant for restoring pensions to warrant officers widows, she was declared to be not entitled to a pension; and as she had no other means of support, she was now, notwithstanding the respectable position in life she occupied before her marriage, earning a livelihood for herself and infant daughter, by making shirts at 4s. a dozen. With regard to the question of breaking leave, it was impossible for him to coincide in the opinion that harsh measures should be taken against the men who broke their leave. When a ship's company could go on shore, and the officer could bring his liberty men back again on board ship, then they would be in a position to punish the men severely. But as long as a system was tolerated which was a disgrace to the country, of seamen being seized in seaport towns by the lowest and vilest of the community, drugged, robbed, and turned out stupefied and half-naked, without any organized police to keep this system in check or assist officers in recovering their men, they were not in a position to punish the men for breaking leave very severely.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could not but think that the practice, in which the hon. and gallant Member indulged almost weekly, of bringing before the House a recapitulation of details as to the discipline and management of the fleet in one stereotyped speech, was not conducive to the interest of the service for which the gallant Member professed great anxiety. He would not enter into all those details, but would endeavour to inform the House in a short statement taken from official sources, of the actual position of the Reserve and the fleet. With regard to the Motion, he believed it was founded on many misconceptions, and he should, therefore, ask the House not to agree to it. The first part expressed "the regret of this House that, instead of a Reserve of 70,000 men contemplated by the Manning Commission, there only exist 6,362 Coastguard men, including officers, 1,900 district ships' companies, 1,400 revenue men and 600 cruisers' men, and 5,000 or 6,000 Coast Volunteers, not to be depended upon." He thought that paragraph was offensive to the seamen of the country [Sir C. NAPIER : it is in the Report of the Commission.] He maintained there was no reason to suppose that the Coast Volunteers were to be depended on for the service for which they were intended. The Coast Volunteers were enrolled for service on the coasts, and not for foreign service, which was a very different thing. He maintained that they were to be depended upon, and that the contrary assertion was offensive to the seamen and to the public. The Commission on Manning the Navy, after going into various details, recommended various improvements in the position of the men with regard to pensions, pay, provisions, and clothing, many of which had already been effected. The Commissioners then recapitulated their propositions for the service of the country, and to those points he wished to limit his observations. They proposed that there should be reliefs in the home ports to the number of 4,000 men. Every gentleman connected with the Admiralty was equally as desirous as the Commissioners to see that carried out, and he believed that this year, supposing they got all the men for whom Parliament had voted the money, they would not be far from the desired end as there would be a considerable number of reliefs in the home ports. As to the Coastguard, to which the hon. and gallant Member next referred, he stated the other day their number, and he would repeat it on that occasion as he thought it desirable that the amount of that invaluable force should be generally known. In the Coastguard there were 6,862 sailors, officers, and boys. It might be said that the number did not represent the true strength, because the officers were included ; but men without officers were a mere rabble, and in a reserve force there must be a number of officers corresponding with the number of men. There were besides 476 Marines who were attached to the Coastguard. There were besides 1,381 civilians, about whom he would only say he believed that they would, if necessary, do good service. The gallant Admiral said it was desirable that the Coastguard should be increased to 12,000 men. He agreed with the gallant Admiral, and knowing the extreme value of that body, the Admiralty were daily increasing the numbers. It was not the work of this particular Board of Admiralty ; but for years it had been a rule that whenever a man-of-war was paid off every seaman who had served ten years, with a good character, was allowed to go at once into the Coastguard. The result was to increase the Coastguard, but, at the same time, to lessen the number of men fit for petty officers. They could not, to use a homely phrase, eat their cake and have it too. If they would have a numerous and efficient reserve of Coastguard they must take the best men from the fleet. With regard to block-ships he fully admitted that it was more desirable to have 80-gun ships in our ports. The gallant Admiral no doubt supposed that he was forwarding his object by continually coming down to the House and making the same stereotyped speech. The Admiralty were most desirous of replacing those block-ships in the way proposed. The Hastings, lately at Liverpool, a very old ship, and failing in speed, had been replaced by the Majestic. Again, at Portland, where there was a good harbour, the Colossus, or a sister ship,—an 80-gun ship—would be placed there. But there was expense attending these changes, and he wished the gallant Admiral would always mention the cost when he alluded to these notices. There was, besides, great difference of opinion as to the policy of placing sea-going ships as Coastguard ships. The gallant Officer desired that the Admiralty should be able to put men on board their ships, make them ready for sea in cases of emergency, and that the ships should be in good order and prepared to fight the enemy next day. Well, the Admiralty had just had a proof that, without making this change, ships might be made available in a few hours. Not many weeks ago it was decided by the Admiralty to place the Majestic 80-gun ship at Liverpool, instead of the Hastings block-ship, and orders were accordingly sent to Liverpool that the crew of the Hastings should proceed by railroad to Sheerness, and that the men should take possession of the Majestic and proceed to sea. The men left Liverpool at 8 o'clock one night and having reached Sheerness went on board the Majestic, and were ready for sea the next afternoon. The next point to which the gallant officer's Motion alluded was the number of the Naval Volunteers, and he stated that the number, now under 1,000, should be completed as soon as possible. He must first of all say that the gallant officer was incorrect in his figures. The Naval Volunteers did really amount to 1,000 ; and, considering that the force had been scarcely more than two months in existence, he thought the progress made satisfactory. He did not believe that a great volunteer force could be raised suddenly. Seamen's wages were now £3 10s., and there was a great scarcity of real good seamen; and, as a great force could not be got suddenly, the Government must be satisfied with a gradual progress, unless they entered an inferior class of men, a proceeding, in his opinion, highly undesirable. The suggestions which had been made by the right hon. Members for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell), and others, had not been neglected, and shipping-masters had been consulted with respect to them. In proof of this, he might mention that one emanating from the gallant Admiral himself had been especially considered—namely, whether it would be advisable to pay men in advance upon their enrolment instead of at the end of the quarter. But upon this point he had received a letter from a very hard-working officer in the north, whose opinion was well worthy of respect, saying "Pray don't do anything of the kind; it will disgust the good men; men who wish really to become efficient men know that there are those who come merely to get the £1 10s. enrolment fee to get drunk upon it, and they feel that if this were carried out as a rule, such men would very soon not only disgrace themselves but the force too," and it really seemed that if the suggestion of the gallant Admiral were adopted it would probably prevent a great many men from joining the force. With respect to the short-service pensioners, the gallant Admiral asked why they were not allowed after a short service of ten years to go into the Reserve, joining the Naval Volunteers, instead of being kept in the ship. Such a proceeding could not be adopted without damaging the fleet. If all the men of ten years' service in the fleet were invited to join the volunteers, what was to become of the fleet? There would be no seamen in it. The country had got a young fleet, and he was about to show to the House what the Government had done within the last year in creation of a fleet; and, so far from the state of things being matter for censure, it was a subject for congratulation that in so short a time so many men had been raised for Her Majesty's service. The Commissioners recommended that there should be a body of Marines on shore amounting to 6,000. The gallant Admiral's view was to show the poverty of the nation's forces, and the gallant Officer had entirely overlooked the fact that the body of Marines on shore amounted to 6,178, being greater than the Commission recommended. With respect to the short-service pension Marines the same argument held good as with respect to sailors, for, if all the Marines who had served ten years were to leave for the purpose of joining the Reserve, the best men would be lost to the active service. No doubt, in some years hence, when the navy was well manned and the men could be spared, it might be desirable to have recourse to the short-service pensioners, both seamen and marines, as a reserve. The number of men enrolled in the Royal Naval Volunteers from the 1st of January, 1860, to the 30th of April, 1860, was 894; and the number of applications awaiting verification of service before the grant of certificates was eighty-three, making a total of 977 men; and he had since seen a return, according to which the number was stated to amount to 1,000. With regard now to the Coast Volunteers, there were on the registers, available for immediate service, 7,015 Royal Naval Coast Volunteers. It was essential that hon. Members should bear these figures in mind; because in the assertions made by the gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) all official figures were entirely set aside, and his own fanciful estimate alone adhered to. These were all important points connected with this Manning Commission, but the most important point of all related to the boys; for, let what would be done with the Reserve, the means of enabling the country to have a really efficient navy must depend materially upon educating boys. A statement for the years 1857, 1858, and 1859 would show the increase which had been gradually taking place in the establishment of the boys. In 1857 the number of boys was 1,898, in 1858 the number was about the same, but in 1859 the number had increased to 5,147. At the present time we had no less than 8,535 boys. The hon. and gallant Admiral was therefore sadly incorrect in his estimate of the naval force. He wished to be candid, to have no reserve, because he believed the more the public knew of these matters the better for the service. Opinions might vary as to the percentage of boys which it was desirable to have in the fleet, and he did not think that point was yet satisfactorily ascertained. The percentage at present of boys was about one-sixth, but some authorities thought it ought to be as high as one-fifth. However that might be, the fact remained that we had at present 8,500 boys, who would become in a short time first-rate seamen. The hon. and gallant Admiral had talked of the impossibility of getting men for the navy—that our ships were undermanned, that the men were discontented and were unhandsomely treated. The answer to that was, that in the whole Channel fleet, consisting of twelve sail of the line and three large frigates, there was only a deficiency in warrant and petty officers and able seamen of 377. In the Mediterranean fleet, of about the same strength, the position was almost precisely similar, and a draught of about 150 men were now on their way out to fill up those vacancies. He maintained therefore that these facts did not justify the gallant Admiral coming down to the House and asking for a censure upon the Government, past as well as present, for not creating a Reserve as fast as his quick and ardent imagination led him to believe it could be created. The next point he would mention was as to training ships both for exercising volunteers in gunnery and for the education of boys. Training ships were a most important portion of the scheme, and he would state what had been done in that matter. For the Naval Coast Volunteers there was the Hastings at Liverpool, which had been transferred from the Coastguard, and the Castor at Greenhithe. Those ships were fitted up as complete men-of-war with bedding, utensils, boats, &c., because the men lived on board during their month's drill. There was also the Brilliant in the City Canal, which was not so fitted up, because the men only went on board during the day, and there was the Trincomalee fitting to be sent to the north of England. A small steamer, the Weser, was also being got ready to take men to the mouth of the Thames in order to practise firing at targets. Those training vessels were only in addition to the innumerable guns and batteries all over England. For the training of boys one line of battle ship was fitting at Devonport, and she, no doubt, would be the forerunner of others. There were also the four brigs—one at Cork, two at Portsmouth, and one at Devonport. He thought he had shown by the facts he had adduced that the Admiralty had endeavoured to increase our Naval Reserve, and by promoting the introduction of boys to create a nursery for seamen. There was only one other point to which he felt it necessary to refer, and that was in relation to the latter portion of the hon. and gallant Admiral's Motion, that "the House is also of opinion that the bounty for able seamen ought not to have been lowered till the number wanted was complete." He (Lord C. Paget) thought he had already answered that opinion, as he had shown that our fleets were only a few men short of their proper complements, and the deficiencies were only such as the ordinary casualties would create; that we had a vast number of boys who were growing into good sailors; that they were daily entering seamen sufficient to fill up any vacancies that might exist; and that therefore it would have been unwise and unnecessary to continue the payment of a large bounty. But this was not his only reason, for he demurred to the proposition of the gallant Admiral that bounties were good things, and, indeed, he regarded the system of bounties as an unwholesome one. He admitted that last year there were strong reasons for the course which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) took in offering a large bounty, which certainly did enable the country to obtain a good many men. The present Government had lowered the bounty because they thought the offer of a large bounty was, in ordinary circumstances, an objectionable system. He believed it had been one of the causes of that craving for leave which had become apparent among the men, because they had their pockets full of money, and were always wanting opportunities for spending it, and, therefore, he held the opinion that the offer of a large bounty, except under peculiar circumstances, was unwise and detrimental to the public service. He thought he had proved to the House that the Admiralty had not been unmindful of their duty, and that it was their continual study to improve the condition of the navy, and therefore he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Admiral.

Lord Clarence Paget

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord that the Motion of the gallant Admiral was too extensive in its terms and peculiar in its phraseology, and his speech too general to make it an easy task to follow him. With respect to the last portion of the Motion, indeed, he doubted whether it was framed in accordance with the rules of the House, and whether the Speaker could put a Motion which commenced by an Address to the Crown, and concluded with a Resolution. He was glad, however, to hear that the Admiralty had decided to lower the bounty, as he did not consider it was desirable to retain the bounty system as a permanent system. His sincere belief, however, was, that under the peculiar circumstances that existed last year, the late Government were justified in taking the step they did take, and the noble Lord had very frankly admitted that he took a similar view. But the adoption of that exceptional course last year did not at all imply an approval of a permanent system of bounties, and he had felt some apprehension lest the present Government might intend to continue that system. He had heard with great pleasure what had been said by his noble Friend on this subject, and thought the Government had acted with great propriety in reference to it. At the same time, while he could not concur in censuring them for what they had done, he was glad that the gallant Admiral had brought this Motion forward, because the practical question which he had submitted was one of great interest to the House and the country. What were the exertions which the Admiralty were now making to attain the all-important object of a permanent and reliable naval reserve? That was the point for consideration, and the gallant Admiral's Motion had elicited from the noble Lord a statement which would, he thought, give much satisfaction. With regard to the maintenance of reliefs at the various ports, there was no subject on which the late Board entertained greater anxiety. The Committee on Manning the Navy and the Royal Commission had made a wise recommendation on this point, and he was very glad to hear from the noble Lord that if the numbers voted by Parliament were completed, there would be in the ports somewhere about 4,000 men available for immediate service afloat. He did hope the successive Boards of Admiralty would never lose sight of this point, and that the House of Commons would never hesitate to grant every year the necessary funds to prevent the disgraceful spectacle of men-of-war lying in harbour for weeks and months before they could complete their complement of men. With regard to the Coastguard, he was glad to hear what fell from the noble Lord. He understood the noble Lord to say that, the Royal Commissioners having recommended the raising of this force to 12,000 men, the Admiralty were now aiming to procure that number. He feared that the Estimates on the table were for a number far less than 12,000, but if he understood his noble Friend rightly, the Estimates of the present year did not ask 12,000 Coastguard men, as they could not hope to obtain them this year, but that it was the intention of the Board of Admiralty to raise that amount. He thought that was a very important statement, and to no one would it be more satisfactory than to the gallant Admiral. With regard to the Royal Naval Volunteers, the statement of the noble Lord was not so satisfactory as he could have wished. Now, it might appear a trifling matter, but he would ask whether the Board were doing well to retain that name. We had already the Naval Coast Volunteers, and would it not be better to have a distinct title for each, and to call the new force by the very intelligible name of the Royal Naval Reserve? The main point was how soon this would become an effective and available force. He did not despair of seeing the number of men who came forward considerably increased, and he trusted that the Admiralty would spare no exertions to complete the number. The noble Lord had spoken of the scarcity of seamen as one reason for the slow increase of this Reserve force. It was most undesirable, both in the interests of the Royal Navy and of the merchant service, that such a scarcity should exist, and, with a view to supply the want, he quite agreed with the noble Lord as to the great importance of increasing the number of boys in the service. Whether the proportion of boys to seamen should be one-fifth or one-sixth, he would not venture to say; but it should be remembered that whatever abstractedly might be the desirable proportion, it must be difficult, if not impossible to fix that proportion with precision so long as the House of Commons were in the habit of voting at the request of the Government a fluctuating number of seamen each year. However this might be, the surest way of maintaining the navy was to train up men for ourselves, and always to take care to have a large number of boys in training. From the latter part of the speech of his noble Friend he hoped it might be inferred that the Government intended to carry out the whole recommendation of the Royal Commission on this subject. [Lord C. PAGET: Hear.] He was glad to hear that cheer, and wished also to know whether the recommendation respecting school ships would be followed. This recommendation most wisely went far beyond the mere requirements of the Royal Navy. The Commission contemplated the training of boys, so as to supply the merchant marine also, and no part of their Report was sounder and more judicious. It was to be hoped that, as the result of the measures suggested by the Commission, cordial relations would be established between the two services, so that merchant seamen might be led to enter the navy freely in times of emergency. Altogether he gladly accepted the noble Lord's statement that the Admiralty were doing all they could to insure the efficient manning of the navy, and the formation of a Reserve which should be instantly available in case of need.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR observed, there could be no question, either in that House or elsewhere, of the great importance of carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, as there could be no more important question for the country than that there should be always ready a sufficient number of seamen in reserve to man our ships to meet any emergency that might arise. He looked upon the statement of the noble Lord as highly satisfactory, and he had no reason to doubt that the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners would be carried out in a manner which would prove satisfactory to the House and the country. The subject of manning the navy, however, could not be too constantly dwelt upon. He must say that, with our voluntary system, we had hitherto laboured under great disadvantages as compared with the nations in which compulsory service was the rule. We stood alone in our arrangements in that respect, as we were in effect living under a free trade in seamen. One by one the proclamations and orders in council and Acts of Parliament — by which our seamen were to be made available for manning our fleet — had been withdrawn or fallen into desuetude. Our navigation laws had been swept away under which a numerous and hardy race of able-bodied seamen had been bred as apprentices in our coasting trade, and the whole tendency and character of modern legislation had been such as to diminish our command of able-bodied seamen for the navy. At the same time our commerce had not declined, but had steadily increased; nor had our colonial interests diminished. At the present moment we had a great number of our seamen in the United States Navy, tempted there, of course, by the larger pay, and the system which enabled them to remit their pay to their families if

Sir John Pakington

in this country. He trusted that the day was far distant when any hostile emergency would arise; but as things stood at present he was at a loss to understand how we were to furnish the requisite number of men to meet a sudden and urgent increase of armament. In 1812 we had troops and volunteers to the extent of 800,000, and we had in the navy 600 ships in commission, of which ninety were line-of-battle ships. It is difficult to understand how our power then displayed could be now equalled in the event of any interruption to our friendly relations with other countries. If peace were maintained, it must be by the maintenance of a force which should be able to continue the supremacy we had always possessed; and he would only express his most earnest hope that the Government, by carrying out without delay the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, would best secure the interests and maintain the honour of the country.

MR. CORRY said, that he had been taken to task last year for talking upon such a vulgar subject as expense in relation to the question of substituting more efficient vessels for the block-ships. He did not think they should incur useless expenditure, and he believed that great expense would be occasioned by such a measure without any corresponding advantage, as, on the block-ship being put out of commission, the stores and materials, on which a large sum had been expended, and which were sufficient to last out the commission, could not be made available for the ships which replaced them, and after the new ship had been in commission for some time, before she could go to sea all kinds of repairs would be necessary, such as relaying the decks and recaulking, which would occupy as much time as to bring forward a new ship. In illustration of the loss which would thus be occasioned, he would state that the first cost for masts, yards, sails, and other stores for a block-ship was £16,000, which would make a total of £128,000 for the whole, a great part of which would be lost, and, as he thought, for no adequate object by the proposed arrangement. The best way to deal with the block-ships was to let them die a natural death and wear themselves out. He was very glad to hear the noble Lord's statement, that the Reserve force was going on satisfactorily. He had always, however, he confessed, placed more reliance on the Reserve that was kept by the Admiralty in permanent pay than on that portion which was obtained by a retaining fee, and he trusted that every effort would be made to complete the Reserve of 4,000 seamen in the ports recommended by the Commission. He hoped his noble Friend would see to the organization of the Marine Reserve Force to the full number of 20,000, as recommended by the Manning Commission. They were men well trained in gunnery, and would be most useful in case of emergency. With regard to the Royal Marines he understood the noble Lord to say that the Commission recommended a Reserve on shore of 6,000. He thought that was a misapprehension on the part of the noble Lord. What the Commissioners did say was, that the usual number of Royal Marines in reserve on shore was 6,000; but they recommended that an addition of 5,000 should be made to that number, so as to raise the whole number to 11,000. He believed that since the Report was issued there had been 3,000 added to the Reserve, so that it only required the addition of 2,000 more Marines to give effect to that recommendation. He hoped the Government would make that addition during the present year; and that a large portion of that increase would be composed of Marine Artillery. No better reserve for handling guns on board ship could be had, in conjunction with a sufficient number of blue jackets. With regard to the question of leave, he thought that that was a matter that should be left entirely to the officers, and that it would be most injurious to discipline to establish any regulation by which the men could, at any time, claim leave as a matter of right, but he also thought that caprice in granting leave was a great misfortune, and that in large fleets a uniform system should be established by the Admiral for each ship, leaving to the captain a discretionary power to be exercised under special circumstances only. With regard to the Coast Volunteers he certainly could not support the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, if only from the mode in which he spoke of that body. The hon. and gallant Admiral said that force was not to be depended upon. [Sir CHARLES NAPIER: It is in the Report of the Committee.] He believed they were a most valuable corps. They were effective, well conducted, and very willing to perform their duty. He hoped after the satisfactory statement of his noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty, his hon. and gallant Friend would not think it necessary to divide the House. If he did he (Mr. Corry) must vote against him.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he believed his noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty had a sincere desire to carry out all that the Commission required. He was glad to hear many of the statements made by his noble Friend, but he heard none with greater pleasure than that which he had made about the great increase in the number of boys in the navy. He believed there had not been a naval discussion in that House for twenty-five years in which he had not endeavoured to impress on the Government the necessity of training boys for the navy. By the present system of training the Volunteers they went on board a block-ship, in which they had not to take care of their own clothes or to wash their own linen, but the seamen had to do all the work; and that was one of the points in which seamen on board the block-ships thought they were ill-used; and another result was that the Volunteers were not taught their business. The Commission had recommended the abolition of the system of allowing freight for specie. The existence of that system had been the source of great favouritism and jobbing. He thought that the freight should no longer be received by the captains, but that it should be applied towards the pensions for the widows of warrant officers, who were now told by the Admiralty that pensions to them did not come within the scope of the regulations.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I think there are many subjects bearing upon the navy and those engaged in its service, which would be more properly left in the hands of the Admiralty than brought under the notice of the House of Commons; for the consequence is that the men, instead of looking to their officers are taught to look to this House, to the great injury of naval discipline. I regret to hear that there are many seamen seen in the streets of Portsmouth and Devonport in a state of drunkenness; the remedy would be a regulation of the number allowed to go ashore by the Admiralty, but at the same time the endeavour should be made to induce better habits among the men by means of libraries, so that they may be able to instruct and amuse themselves on board in a rational manner. I see no advantage derivable from the increase of the Coastguard to 12,000 men, with a large reduction of Customs' duties; there should be rather a corresponding diminution in their numbers, while at present the best men are being transferred by the Admiralty from the navy to the Coastguard. Fetty officers should not thus be removed, but men who had passed a long period of unbroken time should receive a larger pension. I regret to see so many instances of insubordination in the navy; every such display should be crushed, as we would trample on the hot cinders that threaten to set fire to our houses; for, unless this be done, when England wants her navy, she will find it a discredit and of no use. The block-ships are perfectly suitable to the nature of their employment, and had better remain until their stores are worn out, instead of being replaced by fine ships that ought not to lie idle. Eight years since, in 1852 when I first entered Parliament, I denounced the custom of ordering ships home and dismantling them while they were in a state of the highest efficiency, and their stores, not half worn out were, instead of being made available, worked up as junk. Another ship should be provided by the Admiralty for the reception of the officers and crews, the riggers should dismantle them and return their stores for future use, and hundreds and thousands of pounds would be saved. Within the last thirty years I have no hesitation in estimating the amount that would have been saved at £1,000,000 had this course been followed. In 1853, and on every subsequent discussion on the Naval Estimates, I have impressed upon the First Lord of the Admiralty the necessity for securing boys in the seaports for the future manning of the navy. The merchant service employs 180,000 seamen, of whom we cannot expect any great number to enter the Royal Navy in time of peace. On the occurrence of war, however, they would, being out of employment, naturally turn to the Queen's service. Every year 3,000 to 4,000 boys should be draughted into the navy, and a training ship should be stationed in every mercantile port; we should now have had, if my recommendation had been followed, a large reserve of 10,000 to 15,000 able seamen for the fleet. The great matter of importance is to place in such training ships, officers of skill, temper, and kindly habits and disposition, such men as Captain Harris of the Britannia and late of the Illustrious, who had trained up several valuable lads for the navy; at eighteen years of age they would be fit for the mizen-top and other duties of the ship. I have heard with considerable pleasure the noble Lord announce that independently of frigates, we have twenty-four sail of the line ready for any emergency. With dependencies and colonies widely dissevered, and an extensive commerce to protect, and bearing in mind the great uncertainty as to the maintenance of peace, it is the first duty of precaution and fidelity to our country to maintain and make provision for a navy in the highest possible state of efficiency and strength.

Admiral Walcott

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he believed that the admission of boys into training ships was a step of great value to the service. He had received a letter from a young officer on a foreign station, which, as it bore upon the question, the House would, perhaps, allow him to read. The writer begged of him to bear his testimony to the value of training ships for boys. There were half a dozen lads on board his ship who had come from a training brig. Every one was the picture of a sailor, and they had astonished the old hands by their aptitude in the duties of a ship. As an instance, he added that one of his men who entered as an able seaman and got a bounty of £10, being ordered by the boatswain to make a mat, half an hour afterwards he found him fiddling with the rope. The boatswain abused him for his ignorance, and called one of the boys, from the training ship, who set to work, and did it in a workmanlike manner. As a civilian he could not help feeling astonished that when a ship was paid off the country should lose the valuable services of men who had perhaps been for years in training. It was not so in the army, but soldiers acquired an esprit de corps which made them proud to belong to the regiments of which they had been members. Could not some such feeling be introduced into the navy?

MR. BENTINCK said, the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) deserved the gratitude of the country for the energetic and determined manner in which he had called the attention of the House and the country to their national defences, or rather to their want of defences at a time when it was less directed to the subject than its importance demanded. On that occasion he had elicited very important information from the noble Lord, but having done that, he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would rest satisfied, and not press his Motion to a division. He (Mr. Bentinck) for one was highly gratified that he had brought it forward. The first topic which the gallant Admiral had touched upon was that of a bounty to sailors, and was glad to hear from the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Clarence Paget) that, in his opinion, the system of bounty was a very unwholesome system. He (Mr. Bentinck) had always been of that opinion, and it appeared to him to be a matter of regret that a system once established had not been continued by the Admiralty until the number required for the naval service had been completed. He, therefore, considered that the discontinuance of that bounty was premature until the requisite number of men was obtained. His (Mr. Bentinck's) principal object in rising was to say a word or two about the Coastguard, and although his gallant Friend near him (Admiral Walcott) anticipated that as they had adopted the principle of free trade there was no necessity for a Coastguard, he would admit that if they really had free trade in operation there ought to be a Coastguard, but if his gallant Friend wished to see that he feared that he would have to wait for some time. As to the services of the Coastguard, a return had that day been sent to him by an officer commanding that body, and from that he found that they had performed services to an extent that few were aware of. The amount of property saved by the Coastguard of Great Britain in the year 1859 was £791,000, while by the energies of the same body of men in the same period they had saved 1,243 lives. Surely, then, the utility of that force ought not to be estimated only by the services which it rendered to the revenue, or by the addition which it made to the defences of our coast, and such being the case he hoped it would be brought up to the proper standard as early as possible. His noble Friend had stated that it now numbered 6,862 efficient men—a statement which he (Mr. Bentinck) had heard with pleasure and surprise; for his noble Lord in “another place” had said a short time ago that it was composed of only 3,200 really efficient seamen. The gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) in speaking of the improvidence of seamen, had said that when going to sea they had thrown their money overboard; and he (Mr. Bentinck) could not help thinking that if they had seats in this House those gentlemen would be found steady supporters of the financial policy of Her Majesty's Government. He could not understand what advantage there was in making use of ricketty old ships that were not fit to go from one port to another in bad weather, instead of good, seaworthy vessels. The question of manning the navy lay in a nutshell. The merchant service showed no difficulty in obtaining good men, because they paid the market price for them, and the Admiralty could get them, too, if they only pursued the same course. It was a simple question of pounds, shillings, and pence, and it was to him a matter of regret that while millions were wasted in various ways, the Government should pursue an unwise parsimony with regard to manning the navy.

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, they had held out every inducement to obtain men from the merchant-service; but it had proved a total failure, and for that there must be some important cause. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, seemed to think it was because the Government did not offer the seamen the market price for their services; but, taking all things into consideration, there could be no doubt that the Royal Navy offered the sailor more advantages than the mercantile marine. Men, however, would not enter the navy, notwithstanding the high wages which were offered to them, and he had communications from all parts of the country stating that the cause of this was that men would not enter the navy on account of the flogging. As it was, with every inducement offered, not one thousand men could be found to enter the navy; and he (Mr. Williams) believed the cause of all that was because they disliked the flogging. He saw within the last two days, in an American paper, that a motion had been made in the House of Representatives for a return of the different modes of punishment adopted in the navy of the United States, instead of flogging, where it had been found impossible to obtain seamen, so long as a system of flogging prevailed; but as soon as it was abolished, some years since, men enlisted willingly. Of the 10,000 seamen obtained by us during the last year, by means of the £10 bounty, only 1,400 belonged to the mercantile service. He repeated there must be some cause for this reluctance on the part of the merchant seamen to enter the Royal Navy. They were most probably disgusted at that system of flogging which still continued in the Royal Navy, and was a disgrace to the country. There was no such thing in the American navy; and that was the only country in the world whose navy we did not look in the face with a hostile feeling. Flogging had ceased in the American service; and if it were put an end to in our own service, the effect would be as beneficial as in the American service. If they were not satisfied that he was right, they ought to inquire and ascertain what was the real cause.

R

LORD LOVAINE said, he was rather astonished at the statement of the hon. Member for Lambeth, that the Admiralty had never attempted to discover the real cause of the difficulty experienced in getting men for the navy. Within his recollection there had been three separate Commissions for that very purpose. The £10 bounty had not failed, as it had enabled them to man a larger fleet than we had had for the last thirty years. He had never heard of a single protest from seamen against flogging on board ship. It was very rarely, indeed, that men were flogged in the navy. The hon. Gentleman forgot what was due to an honourable service, when he talked of brutal punishments being administered in the navy under the eyes of naval officers. On the part of a class who were distinguished for their humanity and kindness, he protested against the implied censure cast upon them. The hon. Gentleman wondered how it happened that the Naval Reserve was not rapidly filled up with able seamen; but the truth was that able seamen did not exist. He found, from the evidence given before a Committee sitting up-stairs, that in the great mercantile City of London it was becoming more difficult every year to obtain able seamen. The introduction of steam into the mercantile navy, had to a great extent dispensed with the services of able seamen; and that was the reason why the Royal Navy found it so difficult in these days to obtain able seamen from the mercantile service. The men on board steamships could not be called able seamen. They might be made so; but they were not able seamen when they went on board Her Majesty's ships. He believed that the only plan which offered the slightest chance of success was to retain a proper reserve, and to train boys from childhood for the service in school ships. With respect to the suggestion as to the pay given to seamen in the Royal Navy, it should not be forgotten that, to whatever amount the Admiralty raised their pay, the owners of merchant ships were sure to raise the pay of their men to the same amount. Many men, no doubt, had been deterred from entering, by having read in their youth unfounded statements as to the cruel treatment of men on board ship; but he was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Lambeth repeat such boys' tales.

Mr. W. Williams

MR. WHITBREAD said, it was not the fact that men were not entering the navy, because they were entering in great numbers. The entry of ordinary seamen was stopped about a month ago. They were only entering able seamen, except in the case of a few ordinary seamen in whom the officers had confidence. There was considerable difference of opinion among the Commissioners on Manning the Navy, whether the abolition of the lash would be popular among the able and well-conducted men, and there was a great deal of reason to believe that the discipline of the service was not at all too severe for ill-behaved and skulking fellows, who would throw additional work if they could on their better-conducted shipmates. As to the Coastguard, the capacity of the men to man the fleet in time of emergency was not to be measured by their numbers. They were the pick of the men, and by a mere proportion being put on board a man-of-war, the rest of the crew could be easily organized and brought into order. The wisdom and forethought of the Commissioners in recommending a reserve had been proved by the difficulty experienced in providing it suddenly. It required time to bring together a proper reserve. The public had seen the difficulty, but were determined that it should be overcome. He hoped that the gallant Admiral would not trouble the House to divide, as the figures in his Motion were inaccurate. When he said that the Naval Coast Volunteers were "not to be depended upon," he was not borne out by the language of the Commissioners' Report. What they said was that the country could not place reliance on men who could not be taken more than 100 leagues from the coast, which was very different from the offensive phrase of the gallant Admiral.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER replied. He thought that the Report of the Manning Commission did justify the terms of his Motion as to the Coastguard. With reference to the observation of the Secretary to the Admiralty, that his constant complaints about the management of the navy had produced great discontent amongst seamen, he might retort that he had never made an unfounded charge like that made by the noble Lord against the management of the navy—namely, that within a few years there was an apparent defalcation of £5,000,000. The Surveyor of the Navy had satisfactorily explained what was done with that money. There had been five mutinies in the fleet since the noble Lord became Secretary to the Admiralty. Having shown to the House how very far the Admiralty were from having carried into effect the recommendations of the Manning Commission with respect to the Naval Reserve, he thought he had discharged his duty, and would not press his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. PEELE said, he rose to propose the Address of which he had given notice for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the manner in which the last election for Berwick had been conducted. A Committee of that House had unanimously reported their opinion that bribery extensively prevailed at that election for Berwick, and there existed an Act of Parliament authorizing an Address to the Throne upon such a Report. He was informed that his Motion, contrary to his anticipation, would be opposed, and he wished therefore to state that he had no party object of any sort to serve, but that he simply took the course he was pursuing for the purpose of discharging the duty which devolved upon him in consequence of having been the Chairman of the Berwick Election Committee, and on account of the nature of the evidence which was given before that Committee. The election which they had inquired into took place in the month of August last, a vacancy having been caused by the retirement of one of the two hon. Members who had been chosen at the previous general election. Two gentlemen appeared as competitors for the vacant seat; one, Mr. Hodgson, the petitioner before the Committee; and the other, the hon. Member for Berwick (Mr. Marjoribanks), who was defending his seat. The inquiry before the Committee took the form of a scrutiny, and he would state to the House without exaggeration the effect of that scrutiny. Evidence from both sides was before them. And, first, with regard to the seat of the hon. Member, Mr. Hodgson did not succeed in showing that any of the votes which had been given for the hon. Member had been given upon any corrupt consideration; but he did succeed in showing that two of these votes were the votes of persons who had offered bribes, and those votes were therefore struck off by the Committee. He (Mr. Peel) did not mean to say that these were the only acts of bribery committed on the side of the hon. Member at that election; but he felt bound, in justice to the hon. Member, to state that the cases which were proved before the Committee appeared to stand very much by themselves, and did not seem to form part of any systematic or organized plan of bribery in the town; and if the petition had been of the usual character—a petition simply to obtain the avoidance of the election and unseat the sitting Member—he did not think that the evidence given for that purpose would have warranted the Committee in coming to the conclusion that bribery had extensively prevailed at that election. But the inquiry before the Committee was a scrutiny, and the charges which were made against the hon. Member for Berwick were met by him with counter-charges against the petitioner, and the effect of those counter-charges upon the poll of Mr. Hodgson was this. The votes objected to by the hon. Member were distributed into two classes. One class comprised the cases of persons who had received money; the other the cases in which money had been offered; and it was not permitted to the hon. Member to go from one class to the other. He was required, when he entered into one class, to exhaust that class before proceeding to the other; and, at the time when Mr. Hodgson desisted from the inquiry and resolved to abandon the further prosecution of his petition, the class of cases in which money was said to have been received was still under consideration, and had not been exhausted; while the other and more important class of cases in which money had been offered was not open, or under the consideration of the Committee at all. The inquiry, therefore, was altogether of an incomplete character. The hon. Member for Berwick nevertheless succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of the Committee that four of the votes polled for Mr. Hodgson had been given for money bribes, and he (Mr. Peel) believed it was the nature of the circumstances of three of these cases which caused the Committee to be of opinion that bribery had prevailed in the borough. For, in what manner had the persons been bribed whose votes had been struck off? They appeared to have gone into a house at Berwick, where they found an individual alone, whom they all recognized as Wm. M'Gall, and he appeared to have given to each of them different sums of money, with directions to go and poll. Other evidence was given which showed that a number of other voters had been directed to the same quarter, and introduced in the same way. There was reason, therefore, for the Committee to conclude that they also must have been bribed. The question, then, for the House to consider was—whether or not they would carry the inquiry further. He had already observed that the inquiry was incomplete; and that it had not entered at all into the cases on the side of Mr. Hodgson in which persons were charged with having offered bribes. It was an inquiry which was carried so far as, and no further than, it would serve the ends of the petitioner or the hon. Member in establishing the right of the latter to the seat. The question of bribery as affecting the character of the borough itself was hardly under consideration; and it was upon the character of the borough that, in his opinion, it was necessary some additional light should be thrown. The House was very well aware, in a general way, that the borough of Berwick had acquired some notoriety for corruption, and, as Chairman of the Committee, he felt bound to bear testimony to the fact that many of the voters who came before the Committee—not merely freemen, but some of the £10 householders—did appear to have an impression that a vote was something out of which they themselves were entitled to make something; that it was something which they had to give away; and that when they gave a favour they were entitled to receive a favour in return. He felt assured, therefore, that the House would not object to the adoption of any course which might tend to the uprooting of habits of corruption which were apparently so firmly established. A Committee of that House, however, would never accomplish that object. It was not the first time on which a Committee of the House of Commons had sat upon the subject of bribery and corruption at Berwick. He believed that Mr. Hodgson himself was a petitioner some years ago, and succeeded in unseating two Members for the borough for bribery and treating. He trusted, therefore, that the House would consent to an Address for the issue of a Commission. He was aware that the seats for Berwick were filled at that moment, and consequently it might not be open to the House to follow up any results from the Commission by depriving the town of its representation in the House of Commons; but it would be of great service if, through the medium of a Commission, the extent to which corruption had prevailed at the last election amongst the voters, and especially the freemen at Berwick, were brought to light. It would also be of great service, if it could be ascertained who were the persons who supplied the money by which they were bribed, and if it were proved that they were persons resident in the town, and the House should afterwards think proper to prosecute them, more would have been done in that way to prevent the repetition of corrupt practices than could be effected by any other means. The only objection to the Motion that occurred to his mind was the expense which attended the issue of a Commission. But the constituency of Berwick was not large. The case did not appear to be at all intricate or involved, and he did not anticipate that the inquiry would occupy many days, or that the expense would be very considerable. He should have been glad had he been able to give timely notice to the House of the gentlemen whose names he proposed to insert in the Address as Commissioners. But he had thought it best to consult the Attorney General upon the subject, and the hon. and learned Gentleman had it not in his power to acquaint him with the names he had selected until this evening. The names which the hon. and learned Gentleman had selected, and which he (Mr. Peel) now proposed on his authority, were James Vaughan, Esq., Thomas Irwin Barstow, Esq., and Franklin Lushington, Esq. The hon. Gentleman then concluded by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty as followeth:—

Mr. Peel

“Most Gracious Sovereign,—We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to your Majesty that a Select Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to try a Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, have reported to the House that there is reason to believe that bribery extensively prevailed at the last Election for the Town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. We, therefore, humbly pray your Majesty that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, passed in the 16th year of the reign of your Majesty, intitled ‘An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament,’ by the appointment of James Vaughan, Esq., Thomas Irwin Barstow, Esq., and Franklin Lushington, Esq., as Commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such bribery.”

that the said Address be communicated to the Lords at a Conference, and their concurrence desired thereto. That a Conference be desired with the Lords upon the subject matter of an Address to be presented to Her Majesty, under the provisions of the Act of the 16th of Her present Majesty, c. 57, and that the Clerk do so to the Lords, and desire the said Conference.

MR. HODGKINSON seconded the Motion.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, that being induced to address the House, he did not do so for the purpose of making a speech, but simply with the view of vindicating his own honour and that of his supporters in the borough of Berwick, to which he felt at justice had not been done by the Report of the Committee. What had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken fortunately rendered it unnecessary for him to make more than a few observations, and he should preface his remarks by stating that he should have deemed it his duty to call attention to the subject under the notice of the House himself had he not been assured that it was contemplated, on the part of the Committee, that some further steps in the matter could be taken. When he had first gone

Berwick, in the spring of 1853, he found at a great number of the respectable inhabitants of that borough were disgusted with the practices which had prevailed at former elections, and had determined to give their support to no candidate who would not pledge himself to seek the suffrage of the electors by fair means, and by fair means only. That determination on the part of the gentlemen to whom he alluded was so completely in accordance with his own feelings that he had unhesitatingly given the required pledges. Not only privately, but publicly on the hustings, he declared that he never would spend a single sixpence upon a vote—not even if it were to save his election. He might add that since 1853 he had stood no less than in four contested elections, the first of which had taken place previous to the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, when the employment of colours and bands was legal, as well as the custom of chairing. At that first contest had, therefore, cost him £714; but the last three, which were among the most severe on record, had cost him only the sums of £475, £448, and £432 respectively. He could say with the truest truth that he had faithfully kept the pledge which he gave on his appearance as a candidate at Berwick. He might add that he had never infringed it. What was as much to the purpose, he could state that he might at any of those elections have incurred fifty or sixty additional illegitimate expenditure of money, but he was sure that if he had done so, in the next election he should have lost the corresponding proportion of his supporters. For the last year, politically speaking, had been a bad one, and he doubted whether, under the circumstances, any borough in England could come better out of the ordeal. Berwick had been harshly treated, not by the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman; that was the natural result of the Report of the Committee. His Motion went to a division, and he was bound to give the right hon. Gentleman his support. He felt that neither he nor his constituents had the slightest reason to shrink from the most searching inquiry.

MR. MACAULAY said, that he could be more fair or candid than the right hon. Gentleman, in the manner in which the Motion was framed. He thought there were grounds sufficient to justify the House in presenting an Address to the Crown for a Commission of inquiry. There were six or seven instances on which Addresses of that kind had been presented to the Crown since the passing of the Act, but they had not been presented for reasons which were in the present instance. In 1841 and 1842 were carried and Commission was appointed in the cases of Cambridge, Hull, and Barnetaple, but in a fourth instance election petitions had been presented for the purpose of unseating the Members, on the ground that they had been vitiated by corrupt practices. That it was necessary to provide against such practices had taken place by the agency of those Members. The consequence was that the inquiry by the Committee was limited to the proof of the minimum of bribery necessary to affect the seat, while at the same time incidental evidence was given which fairly gave rise to the suspicion of corruption upon a much larger scale. It had been actually practised, and it was very properly decided that a Commission should be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining how far those suspicions were well founded. The result in every case was that the petition was refused. Bribery, in the Act of Parliament, had been extensively practised. But this was a wholly different case. The election took place upon a casual vacancy, during the sitting of Parliament, the hon. Gentleman was returned by a small majority, his opponent petitioned against him, and was unsuccessful. It was true that the Committee found that bribery had been practised on the side of the petitioner, but they also found that it had been practised without his cognizance; and there was the strongest reason to suppose that he must have thought when he demanded a scrutiny that no practices had taken place which could affect him or his agents. The right hon. Gentleman said that the inquiry into the evidence offered to the Committee was incomplete. The incompleteness was this,—a certain list of charges, as speculative, probably, as such documents usually were, was not investigated. On that the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to put the public to the expense of inquiring into the culpability of the persons on that list. It might be a very natural curiosity on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to know whether the charges of the list were true or not; but that was not sufficient reason for issuing a Royal Commission. A certain number of voters were proved to have received money through Mr. M'Gall; but the Committee found no evidence showing that M'Gall was an agent of either party. It might be very satisfactory to learn who supplied the money. But the only witness who could say that was the man accused of the malpractice, thus the mouth of the chief witness was effectually stopped. It appeared to him, on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman himself, that there was no sufficient foundation for voting an Address to the Crown. To justify such an Address there should be a distinct judicial finding by the Committee that bribery had been "extensively practised." This must mean something different from the bribery of two or three persons. The Act of Parliament did not intend that a Commission should be issued on any degree of surmise by any Member of the Committee, but only on a distinct finding that there had been extensive corruption.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he believed his hon. and learned Friend had fallen into some mistakes with respect to the supposed corruption in the case. His hon. and learned Friend stated that the Committee were satisfied that there was no agency which could connect the petitioner with the corruption which had been practised upon his side. But the fact was, that no evidence one way or the other had been offered to the Committee upon that point, and they could not, of course, undertake to pronounce any absolute decision with respect to it. The Committee left, in short, the matter in the uncertainty in which it found it. The ground for believing that extensive corruption was practised in Berwick was, not only the fact that some three or four voters had been bribed, but the existence of the machinery for corruption. M'Gall was traced to different public-houses, well-known agents were traced to him during the election; large crowds gathered at the stairs of the room in which he sat; and there was what was popularly called a "man in the moon." These were the grounds for believing that there had been bribery on the side of the petitioner, though, like the Committee, he forbore from expressing any opinion on the matter. But bribery had also been established on the side of the sitting Member; two cases had been distinctly proved to the satisfaction of the Committee, and anybody who read the evidence must be satisfied that there was a third case, of the gravest doubt. A person who had been very active on the part of the sitting Member, and who was the owner of a public-house in which these proceedings had been carried on, was convicted of bribery by the Committee. It was true that these were individual cases, but, according to all experience, it was exceedingly unlikely that these men had not bribed to a greater extent. He therefore was disposed to agree with the right hon. Gentleman that bribery had extensively prevailed at Berwick-upon-Tweed, and that inquiry would be perfectly justifiable; but the experience which he had of the Gloucester Committee, upon which he had acted last year—he was fortunate in such matters—was precisely what rendered him very much disinclined to the passing of the Motion. He was not merely influenced by the consideration of expense, which, though by no means large, was such as he ventured to say the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he were now in his place, would feel it his duty to call attention to; but he felt that these Commissions of Inquiry were an absolute delusion and a sham. A great paraphernalia was employed, Commissioners were sent out, an act of indemnity was passed, witnesses were examined, and the evidence of corruption was published at considerable expense—corruption of the possession kind was brought home to a borough, and then the House stayed its hand. It had been done at least ten times, and the utmost punishment inflicted was the withholding of the writ for a few months. The same course would, doubtless, be followed in the case of Wakefield and Gloucester. The House was bound to act on one of two principles. Of late a good deal had been said about the influence of wealth counteracting the effects of a restricted suffrage. If wealth were to be adopted as a constitutional safeguard, they had nothing to do but to smooth over the evil which they were content to endure; or if they were determined on eradicating bribery from the electoral system, more vigorous measures must be adopted. He had already expressed his opinion that by lowering the suffrage so as to admit persons whose means rendered the sale of their vote a matter of serious importance to them, it was in vain—constituted as human nature is—to expect that such men would not receive a bribe. In order—he would not say wholly to eradicate, but to lessen bribery—the offending boroughs must be punished; if bribery once became confined in a place, it was like gangrene, and could only be cured by cutting off the whole limb. The evil effected by the purchase of twenty freemen's votes in a borough was not confined to a single election, but the neighbours of these men, seeing that the others had their rent so easily paid, became desirous of disposing of their own votes to equal advantage; and, finally, they came to regard as a right what at first was a matter of barter. When corruption thus settled in a borough, it was like malaria and became endemic; and a cure was not to be effected without suspending the writ until a generation had passed away. The equivocal course pursued with respect to these Commissions of inquiry reflected no credit on the country. We prided ourselves much on the purity of our institutions and of our public men, and were apt to declare that no such things would take place in our country as happened abroad. But what view did foreigners take? If we were to say that our Chancellors of the Exchequer were better than Austrian Ministers, and that they had never been discovered in peculations of the public money, an Austrian would laugh at us and reply that, although they might occasionally buy an official, they never tions and bringing them to light, was but disgracing the country in the eyes of foreigners. It must either resolve that these Commissions should be followed by some energetic and active measure for the suppression of bribery in the places where it was proved to have taken place, or it must entirely abandon this expensive and useless sham.

Mr. Macaulay

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that his first impression, upon rather curiously reading the evidence before the Berwick Committee was, that there had been substantially no case made out for the issuing of a Commission; but the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) must have satisfied every Member of the House that the case before it was pre-eminently one in which a Commission ought to be issued. Only four cases of bribery appeared to have been proved before the Committee, and it could hardly be said, a priori, that that was a sufficient ground; but the noble Lord appeared to have fully satisfied himself that the borough was highly corrupt, and certainly made out a much stronger argument for the Motion than the right hon. Gentleman who proposed it. He had felt much disinclined to support the issuing of a Commission, because, as the hon. Member for Cambridge observed, nothing seemed to result from that course. In every case in which a Commission had been issued, the Government had abstained from pledging itself to take any further action after the expenditure had been made. In moving for the appointment of the Gloucester Commission, he had stated that the Government, in his opinion, were bound to say that in the event of that Commission reporting that corrupt practices prevailed at Gloucester, they would take some action upon it; and the hon. Member for Nottingham had expressed the same opinion. It was true that the writ was suspended in that and other cases; but in the case before the House the seats were full, and he considered it to be the duty of the Government to tell the House and the country, that, in the event of the Commission issuing a Report that corrupt practices had prevailed, ulterior steps should be taken, and that they would propose the disfranchisement of the borough. Before voting for the Commission he should expect to have an answer to that effect from the Government. No doubt bribery had prevailed at Berwick, sive as the statement of the noble Member for Stamford. which must satisfy the House that there had been extensive bribery of various kinds—gifts of money, which he would call pecuniary bribery; and gifts of drink, which he might call gastric bribery. But as he had said, unless the House took some security, that the Government would take active steps against the borough in case the Commission found that bribery prevailed there, it would leave the country to infer that its efforts to put down bribery were a mere mockery, and that those Commissions were so many proofs of the impotency of Parliament to contend with this wide-spread evil.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he hoped the House would not be induced to sanction the issuing of this Commission. There could be no doubt that bribery extensively prevailed at Berwick. That was satisfactorily proved enough already by the statement of the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) without a Commission. Enough money had been uselessly spent on these Commissions already, without going to further expense merely to produce another voluminous blue-book, and to add another to the list of boroughs convicted of corruption. No good whatever had hitherto been done by these Commissions. They merely proved what everybody knew perfectly well before; and he should, therefore, oppose following the same fruitless course in this instance.

MR. COLLIER said, it was very inconvenient for the House to review the opinions of Election Committees. The Berwick Committee had reported that systematic and extensive bribery prevailed, and the evidence supported that charge. The chairman of the Committee (Mr. Peel), recommended the issuing of a Commission. On the other hand he thought the premisses and the conclusion of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford totally irreconcilable. Because Parliament had not gone as far as he wished in the way of putting down bribery he would have them retrace their steps altogether. There was much wisdom in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that in regard to any place reported upon by Commissions as guilty of bribery, the writ should be suspended for eight or ten years. That proposal was worth consideration. But, because this had not been done, must the House shut its eyes to the corruption that was going on? He apprehended that the mere exposure of these crimes was in itself an advantage. There was a Committee then sitting for the purpose of considering the most efficient manner for putting an end to corrupt practices, and the most important information which it had received had been derived from the Reports of these very Commissions which were set at nought, and from the Commissioners themselves, and without which they would have had much difficulty in arriving at the conclusion to which they had come. He thought it would be a strange thing for the House to refuse to issue the Commission asked for. If it should be refused in this case he did not see how there could ever be another Commission issued.

Mr. Edwin James

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, the case before the House was a very exceptional one. The Committee had not reported the existence of systematic and notorious bribery at Berwick. It should be remembered also that in this case the hon. Member for that borough had been seated by the decision of the Election Committee, but if this Commission were issued, their decision might be found at variance with the Report of the Commissioners, who might find that he was not entitled to his seat. This was an inconvenience which the House ought not to lose sight of. But what advantage was derived from the appointment of these Commissions? What had been done in connection with their Reports which would prevent bribery? Why, the offenders were always indemnified, and thus escaped punishment. The Committee on Corrupt Practices, who were just going to make their Report, could not expect any information from a Commission which would not conclude its inquiry for some months to come. The House had now before it the evidence on which the Committee decided, and it appeared that the evidence was very slight. The case, therefore, did not seem to warrant the appointment of a Commission, and seeing that the Committee on Corrupt Practices might possibly recommend the discontinuance of these Commissions, he thought it a very inopportune time to bring forward the present Motion. He was quite sure that the country looked upon the appointment of these Commissions as a farce, and did not believe the House of Commons to be sincere in its wish to crush bribery at elections. The country thought that hon. Members satisfied their own consciences by the appointment of Commissions whose Reports were placed upon the table and nothing was done upon them. Believing because the Act had passed cutting off the representation of that borough. As to Berwick if the Commission issued, if the gross cases were brought out which the hon. and learned Member for Truro said would be brought out. [Mr. M. SMITH: No, no !] He (Mr. Bright) heard the hon. and learned Member say, that if it brought out all the evidence of gross corruption, the result would be the same.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH explained that he had said, that although whatever bribery did take place would be brought out, yet the persons who had been guilty of bribery would be indemnified and thus escape punishment.

MR. BRIGHT: No doubt indemnities would be given, but what was wanted was information; and when that had been obtained it would be competent for any Member to introduce a Bill for the purpose of taking from the borough one Member if it was not wished wholly to disfranchise it. There were many towns, such as Dundee, Aberdeen, and Salford, asking for an additional Member; and one Member might be transferred from Berwick to one of those towns. He knew something of Berwick himself. Many years ago he was there, attending a meeting in favour of free trade, and he took the opportunity of giving a serious lecture to the electors upon the question of bribery, because it was then notoriously one of the most corrupt boroughs in the kingdom. He had also been told that upon one occasion all the ministers of religion—Churchmen and Dissenters alike—took an opportunity of preaching sermons in condemnation of the bribery that always prevailed. He never heard that either his speech or their sermons had been effectual in curing the evil or even produced any great result. He was, therefore, of opinion that when they had found a borough notoriously so corrupt, condemned unanimously by a Parliamentary Committee, when his hon. Friend the Member for the borough himself actually wished the Commission should issue, and when what he might call the least corrupt portion of the constituency were also anxious for it, the House of Commons would commit an act more perverse, he was going to say, than any he had ever known it to commit, if it were to refuse to agree to the Motion now before it. The more the evil was probed, the more the foul cancer was exposed to the public eye, the more chance there was that some day the remedy would be applied—if remedy there was to that deep stain upon the character of our representative system.

Mr. Bright

MR. MALINS observed, that in the present state of the public finances, the House ought to be sure that some practical result would be gained before it agreed to the expense of another Commission. The expense of the Gloucester Commission was £1,924, and of Wakefield £1,423; and those sums did not include the cost of printing the Reports. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) had said that he would only consent to the issuing of a Commission for Berwick upon the Government pledging itself to take some decided steps afterwards. But why was Berwick, if found guilty, to be more severely dealt with than Gloucester or Wakefield? At the latter place it was shown that an hon. Gentleman now in the House, and well known to the hon. Member for Birmingham, had communicated to a relative his intention to sell £4,000 of railway stock, the produce of which was placed in that relative's hands, and the whole was spent in bribing the electors of Wakefield; but no measure had been suggested to be taken against that hon. Gentleman. In the case of Berwick, the only ground for a Commission was, that a Mr. M'Gall had been seen to go into a dark room, whither he was followed by certain electors, who were supposed to come out of it with something in their pockets; but was there not a M'Gall in every borough in the kingdom? ["No."] Did not every hon. Member know that in every borough containing 500 electors there were forty or fifty who always held back until the last? ["No."] He would like to know the happy place represented by the hon. Member who cried "No." Was it Birmingham? [Mr. BRIGHT: Yes.] He was surprised to hear the hon. Member make such a declaration. One of the hon. Gentleman's reasons for the issuing of a Commission was, that he had made a speech to the electors of Berwick against bribery, and it had produced no effect. That was not an unusual consequence of the hon. Gentleman's speeches. The best friend the Conservatives ever had was to be found in the hon. Member for Birmingham, for his extreme views always alarmed, instead of convincing, his hearers. But he wanted to know what was to be the practical result of the proposed Commission. Would it be only another blue-book? Assuming it would be proved that a certain number of voters had received bribes, what would the House do with them? But if

Would the House tell the world that they would disregard the law? It would be the fault of the House alone if they did not do their duty. The Act of Parliament was sufficient for its object, if the House was not wanting to that Act. He repeated the pledge he had given to the House, that so far as he was concerned his best efforts would be directed to carry the law into effect. He had no doubt that the House would find means to involve the guilty parties in an adequate punishment for their political offences, and he would take care to involve them in an adequate criminal punishment. It had been said that the Committee had not reported in the terms of the Act. That was not correct. The Committee had reported in the very words of the statute, which did not require the Committee to find as a fact that there had been extensive bribery, but allowed them to tell the House that there was reason to believe that there had been extensive bribery. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, however, had an arrow in his quiver, and that was the acknowledgment of the prevalence of bribery in the boroughs. His hon. and learned Friend made a confession to the House. He told them that he did not know a single borough in which there did not exist a little knot of voters who waited till the last hour, and then made their bargain. [Mr. MALINS: I did not say that anything of the kind occurred at Wallingford.] Nay, nay, it was the exception that proved the universality of the rule. But these things were unworthy of the great importance of the subject. If they wished to show their sincerity, if they wished to maintain their position, they ought not to cover themselves with reproach, not to tell the public that the Reports of their Election Committees were to remain dead-letters, but to enforce the law against every person who should be proved guilty of electoral impurity.

MR. HUNT said, he was delighted to hear that the hon. and learned Attorney General intended to use the sword of justice against guilty parties, and he hoped he would not raise it in vain, but he was afraid the hon. and learned Gentleman would find a great practical difficulty in his way. He had himself intended to move that the Attorney General should be directed to prosecute the persons who had conspired to corrupt the electors of Gloucester, but on turning to the Report of the Commissioners he found that every one of these persons had received a certificate of indemnity. Now, if a Commission should be issued in the case of Berwick, the first persons who would apply to be examined would be those whom the Attorney General would single out for prosecution, and when they had obtained certificates of indemnity from the Commissioners they might snap their fingers at the hon. and learned Gentleman and his indictment. He hoped, therefore, the House would pause before deciding that a Commission should be issued. Another question which ought to be considered was whether a certificate of indemnity protected the person holding it, not only against a legal prosecution by the Attorney General, but also against disfranchisement. If that were so the Act under which the Commissions issue ought to be amended. He thought that the expense of Commissions should be borne by the offending boroughs themselves, and not by the country at large.

The Attorney General

MR. MELLOR said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it would be a great improvement of the law if the expenses of the Commissions were borne by the places to which they were issued, and he trusted that Government would insert in the Act a provision to that effect. He trusted that the Commission would be issued in the present case, because the Commissioners would inquire into the circumstances, not only of the last election in Berwick, but also of the previous one. There were facts connected with that election, and with the compromise by which the seat was vacated, that were full of the gravest suspicion. As a Member of the Corrupt Practices Committee he could state that the Commissions of Gloucester and Wakefield were not without value from the publicity which the facts obtained, and though the indemnity was given to great extent in Gloucester the Wakefield Commissioners were much more chary in granting indemnities, notwithstanding which no prosecution had been instituted. Still he thought that the suspension of the writs would have a great effect. In places where there was proof that bribery prevailed one Member should be taken from the town, and the expense of the Commission should be charged upon it. The indemnity merely protected the voter from legal consequences, but did not give a pledge against his disfranchisement.

LORD LOVAINE said, that the fact was that some difficulty existed respecting the borough of Berwick. The first Reform Bill placed the borough in the county of Northumberland—he did not know why;

Committee, he had abstained from moving for the issuing of a Commission in that case, because he believed, as had, indeed, proved to be the case, that it would be perfectly valueless. Every person who had been guilty of the worst acts of bribery had been indemnified if he gave his evidence boldly before the Commission. The Attorney General had told the House that he was determined to carry out with vigour the duties of his office, but he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether there was a single individual in Gloucester whom he could prosecute for bribery? Again, in the case of the Galway freemen, the House refused to disfranchise persons who had obtained certificates from the Commissioners. There was an hon. Member in that House who stated that he had been a party to the bribing of 250 of the electors of Galway; but his statement, instead of exciting indignation, was received with a shout of laughter, and he had not heard that it had at all affected the estimation in which that hon. Gentleman was held in the House. He was not singular in his opinion as to the valuelessness of these Commissions, for the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), in an address to his constituents, stated that their only result was the production of immense blue-books, which not three persons would read, and that, as regarded the suppression of bribery, all such proceedings ended, and were intended to end, in nothing. What, then, would follow the issuing of a Commission in the case of Berwick? They had done nothing in the case of other Commissions, except St. Albans, which was a Commission under a special Act. It was admitted that they could not deprive the sitting Members for Berwick of their seats. They could not disfranchise the borough, because they had refused to do so in other cases of the very worst description. [Sir GEORGE GREY: Not refused.] The refusal consisted in not having done it. They had not dealt with Wakefield or Gloucester at all. In the Gloucester case the hon. Member who was returned tendered his evidence to the Committee which sat. When he was asked whether he knew where the money came from, he said he had no knowledge of it; but when the Commission sat again, he said he had been misreported, and that he said he had no knowledge of it at the time of the election. In the Wakefield case means for a prosecution might have been adopted long ago; but if prosecutions took place after a Commission, for the future Commissions would not obtain the facts. For if the Commission was issued, those persons who would give evidence before it having had warning from the Attorney General that they would be prosecuted if they gave their evidence truly, they would not give evidence truly, and thus the object of the Commission would be defeated. In short, if he thought that the issuing of this Commission would tend to put down bribery, he would freely vote for it; but as he believed that they could not deal with this borough differently from others, and that, therefore, the Commission would be attended with no result at all, he should vote against the Motion.

Mr. Hardy

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am willing to accept the footing upon which the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has placed this question. He says that you ought not to deal with this borough in a manner different from that in which you have dealt with others that have been similarly reported upon. That is exactly what we wish to avoid. We wish the House to deal with this borough in the same manner in which it has dealt with others that have been similarly reported against. I believe that I am correct in saying that there has been no case in which a Committee has made such a Report upon a borough as has been made in this instance in which a Commission of Inquiry has not been issued. I really should hope that the House will not listen to the arguments of those who are opposing the Motion of my right hon. Friend. The only grounds upon which I have heard that Motion objected to are—first, that the House has not settled beforehand what it will do when it gets the Report of the Commission; and next, that we ought to be deterred from making the inquiry by the expense with which it will be attended. I must say that more flimsy arguments against that which I hold it to be the duty of the House to do I never heard advanced. Is it possible that the country will believe that the Members of this House are really averse to bribery at elections, that we are in earnest in wishing to put down corruption, if we refuse to do now, in regard to Berwick, that which has been done with respect to the boroughs concerning which similar reports have been made to Parliament? It is said that the witnesses will be indemnified. In the case of Wakefield all the witnesses were not indemnified. It rests with the Commissioners to determine with regard to each witness whether he has so completely answered

ed the questions put to him, and so entirely deposed to the whole truth of that which he knows, as to entitle him to the indemnity which they are legally empowered to give. In cases in which the witness has not made a clean breast of it, that indemnity has been refused, and in those cases, undoubtedly, my hon. and learned Friend would be able to institute a prosecution. I cannot bring myself to believe that the House of Commons, which is now engaged with a Bill to improve the representation of the people—which has, moreover, a Committee sitting up-stairs for the purpose of preparing measures to prevent bribery and corruption—will, in a case of manifest bribery and corruption, refuse to issue that Commission which, according to the law and practice, it is, I think, bound to issue. It has been said that you cannot disfranchise the individual. But my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has shown that there may be individuals who may be the subject of prosecution. But, even supposing that by any circumstance all the guilty persons may individually be protected, still Parliament may disfranchise the borough, and may deal with it as it dealt with St. Albans. It is, therefore, futile to say that the issuing of a Commission can lead to no result. I think, on the contrary, that if this House should refuse to issue a Commission to inquire in what degree bribery has prevailed, it will shrink from its duty. And let it not be said that the exposure of gross delinquency of this kind has no effect. It has been justly said in the course of the debate that the very exposure of the delinquency of individuals acts as a preventive against other individuals following that example. If no other result followed from this inquiry but to expose to public censure and contempt a large portion of the electors of this borough—I say that if Parliament should take no other steps, a great public good will be accomplished. I trust that, in consideration to its own character, the House will not listen to the flimsy arguments by which this Motion has been opposed.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that something more substantial was wanted to put down these practices than anything either the noble Viscount or the Attorney General had promised. He remembered the Galway case, and he wondered why the Attorney General was not then animated by the virtuous indignation that now possessed him, and why he did not admonish the Attorney General of that day of his duty. He agreed that the Attorney General ought to prosecute every person who was guilty of corruption. But the Report on the Wakefield election had been lying on the table for a great many months. He should like to ask what had been done in that case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had stated distinctly that the evidence in the Wakefield case was in process of being dissected, in order to see whether the evidence affected persons who had not claimed the certificate, and to take legal proceedings against those who were not so protected.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he was glad to hear that the hon. and learned Gentleman was pursuing the science of legal anatomy with so much zeal, and he trusted that the House would see some obvious and satisfactory result from the anatomical operation. For himself, he should be very glad that all these corrupt boroughs should be disfranchised. He gladly voted for the disfranchisement of St. Albans, and thought the House had been too chary of many of these corrupt boroughs. He wished to ask the noble Viscount whether anybody in the commission of the peace had been refused a certificate in the Wakefield case. If so, it was a perfect farce for a Minister to affect great political prudery and a great anxiety for Parliamentary Reform, and to be very zealous for exposure, and yet when that exposure was made to refrain from doing that which he had the power to do, and not venture to strike a person reported as having committed such practices from the commission of the peace. He admitted that if they merely acted on precedent the Commission ought to issue; but what would the Government do when they got the blue-book? They did nothing in the cases of Wakefield, Gloucester, and Galway, and he believed that their present zeal would end in the same way.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman to assert that one of the persons reported by the Wakefield Commission as guilty of bribery, and who had not received a certificate, was a borough justice. [Mr. WHITESIDE: I heard so.] The hon. and learned Gentleman then proceeded upon something he had heard—upon mere surmise, in fact. The hon. and learned Gentleman had heard it alleged, and would have the Government proceed on rumour. He could only say that the rumour had not reached his ears. If, however, it turned out to be true, when the Attorney General

ATTORNEYS, SOLICITORS, PROCTORS, AND CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCERS
BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1, 2, and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Persons having been bonâ fide Clerks to Attorneys or Solicitors for Ten Years may be admitted after Three Years' service).

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would move the omission of the word "managing" in line 31. The word managing clerk conveyed no legal meaning; and in a similar Bill which had been brought forward, there had been no such phrase. The clause was sufficiently stringent without the word "managing," which might prove an obstacle to the scrupulous, while to the unscrupulous it would prove none. He also would suggest that the term for serving under articles should be reduced from five to three years.

MR. BOVILL said, that the object of the clause was to extend to managing clerks the same privilege as persons who had taken a degree in one of the Universities, and he hoped the House would assent to it in its present form.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend, that the word "managing" should be expunged from the clause. If retained it would exclude a number of meritorious persons from enjoying the privileges the Bill was intended to confer. The latter portion of the clause guarded against the admission of mere engrossing or copying clerks. It contained a provision that its operations should be confined to those persons who should be engaged in such businesses as were ordinarily performed by attorneys.

MR. DENMAN said, "managing" was not a satisfactory word. A managing clerk of ten years' standing, he had been informed, was a rare animal in country offices. By the retention of the word the privileges of the Bill would be limited instead of enlarged, as they would only apply to the London firms and some few large firms in the country.

MR. MALINS said, he thought the word ought to be retained, but he would suggest as a compromise that the term ten years should be reduced to seven, and then with three years as articulated clerks the full term of ten years would be made up.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL expressed a hope that the proposed Amendment would be accepted by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill).

MR. BOVILL said, he was willing to accede to the proposal, but he would suggest whether it was not desirable that the last three years of the service should be with the same employer.

MR. BRADY said, he objected to the proposition. It would give employers the means of preventing clerks from being admitted, by putting an end to the service before the expiration of the three years' continuous service.

MR. HENLEY suggested, that some restriction should be introduced as to age, so as to prevent young men obtaining the privilege at too early a period. He thought the period of service should date from 21.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that this was unnecessary, as boys could not be said to be persons engaged in the transaction and performance of business usually performed by attorney.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought an Amendment should be introduced, extending the provisions of the Bill to proctors' clerks.

MR. HADFIELD suggested, that the Bill should allow attorneys to become proctors.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, attorneys already, under a recent Act, had obtained nearly all the business of proctors, who had become virtually an extinct race.

MR. BOVILL said, he would propose, by way of Amendment, words to the effect, that the last three years should be with one master.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, it would be better for the hon. and learned Member to withdraw the clause and substitute another of a more ample character.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that making the last three years a continuity of service with one master, gave the masters power to defeat the objects of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford appeared to look upon attorneys' clerks as a predatory class who wished to destroy their employer's practice. He appeared to forget that some Lord Chancellors had been attorneys' clerks, and that they had not been ashamed to acknowledge it. He contended there was no need for these restrictions, and suggested a clear stage and no favour.

MR. BRADY said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone that much injustice might be done under the clause, and he hoped the House would not assent to it.

MR. MALINS remarked, that the restriction was unnecessary. Whether a man had served in one or several offices surely was of no consequence. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL considered the restriction uncalled for, and urged that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause, with verbal Amendments, to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 to 12 agreed to.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he wished to move an addition to the clause, making Clause 12 applicable to attorneys of the Court of Common Pleas of the County Palatine of Lancaster and the Court of Pleas of the County Palatine of Durham, and to the Judges of those courts respectively.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 17 agreed to.

Clause 18 (Empowering Attorneys, Solicitors, and Proctors to act as Justices of the Peace in certain cases).

MR. JOHN LOCKE moved the omission of the clause, and stated that the object of the Amendment was to prevent an attorney from acting as a magistrate. He contended that it would be most injurious to place an attorney in such a position that he would be enabled to adjudicate upon a case in which the interests of his own client were concerned. The proviso that the attorney should not practise within forty miles of the county of which he was appointed a magistrate would be altogether inoperative in remedying the evil of which he complained. There was no objection to attorneys out of practice to act as Justices of the Peace.

MR. BOVILL observed, it would be a very invidious distinction to say that no attorney should be capable of being placed in the Commission of the Peace; and there were plenty of safeguards against the appointment of any improper person. Barristers were enabled to act as magistrates; and all that this clause did was to give the Lord Chancellor power to appoint attorneys to the Commission at a distance of forty miles from the place where they practised. The clause had been approved by all the law Lords.

MR. COLLINS said, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that barristers so appointed were not practising at their profession.

MR. BRADY said, it was clear that the clause was meant to meet some individual case in which attorney influence was strong. Was it not well known that attorneys had a great deal too much power over the election of Members to sit in that House? Nothing could be easier than for an attorney to turn his political influence to account with the Lord Lieutenant.

Mr. Brady

MR. COLLIER said, he agreed that it was not desirable for attorneys, as a rule, to sit on the bench; but there ought to be power in the Lord Chancellor to meet specific cases. The Bill merely removed the positive exclusion under which attorneys suffered as a class.

MR. AYRTON said, that an attorney's status was not a local but a personal one. He carried his profession with him, wherever he went, and he would be ready to see a client anywhere. He should therefore oppose the clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had had experience of both branches of the profession; but he could not altogether agree in the tone of his remarks. No doubt it was desirable that the administration of justice should not even in appearance be exposed to suspicion, and that if it were in any considerable number of instances to happen that gentleman occupied seats on the judicial bench within the area to which their practice in their profession extended, such a result would not be unlikely to be brought about. No one, of course, supposed that the exclusion of those to whom the Bill related from the bench of justice would be advocated on the ground of any personal unworthiness on their part as a body to hold such a position. And he would therefore say, let the existing rule remain so far as the area of a solicitor's own practice extended. But he certainly thought that the inadmissibility of an attorney within 40 miles of his office would satisfy everybody except the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. ["No, no!"] He could not agree with hon. Gentlemen that an attorney who had an office in London, and who happened to be in Wales, would be angling for clients.

MR. KNIGHT said, the distance of forty miles did not exclude the probability of an attorney having many clients in the place where he might, under the provisions of the Bill, be appointed as magistrate. He thought that 100 miles at least ought to be required in order to render the principle effective.

MR. MALINS said, it was admitted that attorneys who had retired from practice

I made some of the best magistrates that had ever presided in a court. Well, then, he asked whether they thought that professional gentlemen who had only partly retired from practice, were likely from that fact to become less competent to act as magistrates than if they retired altogether? He was of opinion that the supporters of the Amendment were imposing most unfair restrictions upon the members of an honourable and respectable profession. He granted that as a rule it was not desirable that attorneys or solicitors should be on the bench; but there were many districts in which the number of educated and properly qualified men to fill the office was so small, that it would be most advisable that the respectable attorney should be allowed to act as a magistrate. He should, therefore, support the use.

MR. EDWIN JAMES complained that the learned Solicitor General and the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford had greatly misrepresented what had been said by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. All that had been said was, that there was an ubiquity about a solicitor's business which rendered it unadvisable that they should sit on the bench. Nothing was said about their voracious habits in the dining-room, or their piscatorial habits in North Wales. He was fully convinced of the respectable character of the solicitors as a body, but he was opposed to the existing rule being altered.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he did not much care about English solicitors; but he thought the present proposal was just as it should be. He had heard it said, that if there were no solicitors in the county, there would not be two honest men in it. In Ireland the prohibition which existed in England against solicitors becoming magistrates did not exist. He had known practising barristers in Ireland, men of large fortune, of good family, and of the highest education, refused the magistracy, when they only wanted to be on the Commission in order to be ex officio guardians of the Poor Law Unions. At the same time, by the law as it stood in Ireland, a Queen's counsel might be a magistrate for any county.

MR. COLLINS said, that to alter the law of the land merely to suit the convenience of a few wealthy solicitors in North Wales was rather too much to ask; and he should oppose the clause alike in its original and amended shape. He concurred with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) in thinking that attorneys always carried about their attorneyship with them.

MR. DENMAN observed that there was a class of attorneys in London who did agency business for the attorneys and solicitors in the country, and thus one might do business for almost all the attorneys in a particular-county or borough, by which he would possess very great influence there, although practising in London. It would give rise to discontents and suspicions in the administration of justice.

MR. HENLEY said, he would like to hear the opinion of the Solicitor General as to the meaning of the words "practising in the county" in the clause, for he thought that would determine, to some extent, the course they ought to take, in reference to this matter. If the restriction were removed altogether, it might safely be left to the Lord Lieutenant of the county not to exercise his privilege except in unexceptionable cases. But to specify forty miles distance would only create confusion. A solicitor might come down where his client resided to arrange family settlements or look at a lease, and questions would then arise whether he was practising in the county or not.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had no hesitation in saying that the expression "county in England or Wales in which he shall carry on the profession of an attorney" meant the county in which his place of business was, and in which in the ordinary sense he carried on his profession.

MR. HENLEY said, in that case there was nothing to prevent the Lord Lieutenant of a county from appointing to a seat on the bench his London solicitor, who conducted all his business.

MR. BEAUMONT said, the subject was a very important one, and the hour was advanced. He accordingly moved that the Chairman do report progress.

MR. MOWBRAY suggested that his hon. and learned Friend should withdraw the clause.

MR. BOVILL said, the present Act of Parliament was felt by the profession to throw a slur upon their body. He did not feel at liberty to withdraw the clause, which had been introduced under the highest authority connected with the law, and sanctioned by Her Majesty's Attorney General.

MR. LIDDELL said, he must protest against the House of Commons being told that they must pass a clause, because it had been introduced by a high legal authority in "another place."

Clause put, and negatived.

The House resumed.

Committee report progress; to sit again Friday 11th May.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

On the question that the adjourned debate on the second reading should be postponed till Thursday,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I wish to mention that I hope we shall be able on Thursday further to advance the Bill. At all events, it will be my duty to take the sense of the House if a further adjournment is moved on Thursday.

MR. HUNT: Will the Reform Bill or the Paper Duties Bill be taken as the first order on Thursday?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Reform Bill.

MR. HENNESSY: Will the second reading of the Irish Reform Bill be taken before we go into Committee on the English Reform Bill?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We shall see about that.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, the Irish Members had not yet spoken on the Reform Bill, and yet the noble Lord wished to take the sense, or perhaps the nonsense, of the House, on it on Thursday.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at a Quarter
after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, May 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment; Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment; Bank of Ireland

AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, its object being to amend the Act for the punishment of persons convicted of aggravated assaults on women and children. That object would be generally admitted to be important, referring, as it did, to matters affecting the personal safety and comfort of women and children. This question had been frequently brought forward, on account of the many instances of these aggravated assaults of late years; and from the feeling that the law, as it stood at present, was unable properly to deal with them. It was generally deemed that some amendment was required, and the main alteration which he proposed was, that for these offences magistrates should be enabled to inflict corporal punishment for the first offence, but that for the second conviction of the same offender such punishment should be rendered compulsory. Notwithstanding that he looked forward to these offences being put an end to by the infliction of corporal punishment, he was of opinion that, under peculiar circumstances, it might not be desirable to inflict that punishment for the first offence, and, therefore, he left a certain discretionary power in the hands of magistrates in dealing with those cases when they came before them for the first time. Long imprisonment was, in some cases, injurious to the wives, and the infliction in this respect of an injury upon the wife was a principal reason why many wished to substitute flogging as a punishment for brutal husbands. There were many cases, however, which had come to his knowledge, in which so far from the imprisonment being injurious to the wife, it was beneficial to her. Men who were so brutal as to commit aggravated assaults on their wives and children seldom adequately supported them. It was argued that corporal punishment degraded a man, and made him, if possible, a still greater brute than he was before his conviction. He could not conceive such a result possible in the cases to which his Bill applied; but whether it were so or not, it was not a function of criminal jurisprudence to consider the after conduct of the convicted man; but only how he could be made sufficiently to suffer, so that others might be deterred from the commission of a similar offence. Flogging was objected to as a degrading punishment. What was there in the punishment of flogging more degrading than in the act of assaulting women and children? and such an offence should meet with a degrading punishment. It should be borne in mind, too, that soldiers and sailors were subject to corporal punishment, and that military and naval authorities did not consider that a man once flogged was degraded and brutalized, and

Mr. Liddell

ered less fit to continue to discharge duties. He should wish to abolish flogging in the army and navy as much as possible, yet as those who might be supposed to know best on this subject were not prepared entirely to do away with the lash, he submitted to their better judgment. Still, corporal punishment were maintained in army and navy, why should it not be extended for atrocious assaults on women and children? What he wished to try was, whether the discipline of the lash might prove effectual. Even civilians, too, were liable to that very punishment for offences such as theft, when they happened to be committed for trial at the Court of Quarter Sessions. In the town of Hertford, a man was at present under sentence of imprisonment for six months at hard labour, with the additional penalty of thirty lashes, for stealing a pair of boots and umbrellas. It was, indeed, his second conviction; but as on his former trial he was sentenced only to two months' imprisonment, it might be fairly inferred that the offence had not been very serious. He did not know why they should evince such want of confidence in the magistrates as to refuse to allow a proper punishment to be inflicted upon men for the most atrocious offences, simply because they must be summarily disposed of by magistrates in petty sessions. The question was, whether the law was satisfied with the present state of the law. He acknowledged that the effect of the late Mr. FitzRoy had operated officially in preventing the entire impunity of these offenders, but he maintained that they deserved a greater punishment than six months' imprisonment? Were the most outrageous assaults upon the most defenceless persons to be put upon the same level as the most trivial class of offences? Was nearly killing a woman and child to be classed with the offence of stealing a dog? Could not be hoped that the offences would be reduced unless some Amendment to the present law was adopted. Although he would give up with great reluctance the clauses relating to corporal punishment, yet, rather than lose the Bill, he would abandon them, hoping that the other provisions which he proposed enacting—an increased term of imprisonment, requiring bail for good behaviour, and abolishing punishment by fines, would be productive of some salutary effect. However, let it not be supposed, therefore, that he abandoned in any degree his conviction that the infliction of corporal punishment was the only just and efficacious punishment with the offences referred to. It was said that the punishment was not conformable to the age. So much the worse for the age. He thought, however, of the age was malignant, as said of it. The spirit of the age put down such atrocious punishments was not to be done by than corporal punishment. Government—who he understood opposed his Bill—would not in a measure of their own. He thought the House of Commons the Government in its present thought it was a moderate and much more moderate than intended to introduce. only crime which the law punished capitally, but death of the blows given on the persons of the delicate and children, and the punishment could not be sensible, for these offences. that if a man were flogged his wife he would never return to her; but in such case or never made a charge had reduced her to a misery, and therefore it was corrigible the case would be before, while if he became of his punishment imbuings, he could live again with his wife afterwards. But the immediate question to be considered was whether the punishment was in proportion to the offence committed; and if the precedent for the adoption of punishment, they had the introduction of a similar punishment upon our gracious the adoption of that measure was suppressed. The desirable result which corporal punishment, the effect of this punishment in the neighbourhoods where these offences occurred. It was inconceivable law to remain in its present state if corporal punishment was it retained at all? a sentence of flogging or a sentence of imprisonment had been passed except upon a jury, was a puerile thing which would apply rather to the mode of trial than to the mode of sent, however, he did not think the House had sufficient information as to the working of the existing law to be in a position to act.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The question before the House is the choice of measures for the accomplishment of an end for which we are all agreed. But the choice of the means must depend in a measure upon whether it can be shown that the present law is ineffectual, and whether there has been any increase in the number of offences of the kind we are considering. The noble Lord has not attempted to show anything of that kind, but he appeals to what he calls the evidence of notoriety—the reports in the newspapers, and he deduces from them, and the amount of public attention that is bestowed upon them, a totally opposite conclusion from that which I have arrived at. I infer that the increasing horror with which these cases are regarded by the public has induced the conductors of newspapers to devote an increased space to reporting them. I think that the increase in the number of reported cases is no proof of the increase in the number of cases themselves, and I am not aware that there is any ground for supposing that cases of cruelty towards women and children are on the increase. As far as they depend upon intoxication, which is the chief cause of such offences, we must look to—what there is evidence to show has already taken place—an improvement in the habits of the people as the best remedy for them. The principle of this Bill is, that the present law is ineffectual, and that the proper way to make it effective is to make it more severe. That is proposed to be done in several ways; by prolonging the periods of imprisonment, by increasing the time over which recognizances for good behaviour extend, and by giving to one magistrate or two justices the power of ordering one, two, or three whippings. My hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) seemed rather to undervalue the additional imprisonment to be awarded under this Bill. At present the maximum is six months, with no minimum. Under this Bill, for the first offence it is to be a minimum of four months and a maximum of six months, with an additional period of six months, during which the offender is to be under recognizances. For a second offence the minimum of imprisonment is to be eight months and the maximum twelve, so that for a second offence a man, if he cannot give recognizances, may undergo eighteen months' imprisonment and three whippings. Under the present law whipping cannot be ordered except for offences tried before a jury, and it would be a great innovation to give such a power to a single magistrate. The noble Lord said he was willing to withdraw that portion of his Bill. ["No!"] At least, so I understood him, and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) truly observed that the power of flogging was the very principle of the Bill. But the question for us to consider is, whether increased severity would tend to the repression of such offences. I think it would not. The person who must put the law in motion is usually the wife. At present the punishment is severe, but not too severe. Is it likely that a woman will be induced to prosecute her husband, with the knowledge that this severer imprisonment will await him, and that he may be privately whipped? I believe that increased severity will tend to prevent wives from coming forward, and make them reluctant to prosecute, when the result will be to condemn their husbands to a lengthened confinement and a disgraceful whipping, while they themselves are left to starve or be supported by the parish. It is no uncommon case now for wives to petition the Home Office for a remission of their husbands' sentences, upon the ground that the man is penitent, and that the woman is suffering from being deprived of her usual means of support. Therefore, I do not think that this Bill would tend to repress offences of this description, and though I am ready to give the noble Lord every credit for his humane intentions, I must vote against the second reading.

MR. BRADY submitted it was the duty of the Home Secretary to have produced positive evidence that the existing law was sufficient to repress the crime with which the Bill proposed to deal. He (Mr. Brady) asserted, on his own observation and knowledge, that the crime was on the increase. Magistrates, also, were in the habit of stating that it was on the increase, and that men were committed to prison for it as often as three or four times, facts which proved that the existing law was inadequate for its repression. As it was, many a poor woman suffered in silence, and did not come forward until the last moment; and although the right hon. Gentleman said the wife would not come forward, he thought that was no argument why a sharp punishment should not be inflicted upon offenders; for if they refused to do that these ruffians

LONEL DICKSON said, he wished the Bill to be disposed of, because there were several Bills on the paper in which Irishmen took great interest, and the one before the House was a matter with which men had not the smallest possible concern, for Irishmen never did beat their wives. He left it to moral philosophers to say how it was that in this highly civilized country a crime should prevail which was entirely unknown in the sister island. MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, the assertion that the wife was the first to be punished in punishing a husband who had maltreated her was hardly consistent with experience. He thought she seldom had recourse to the law for the first offence, and it was only a long course of brutality which she could no longer conceal from her neighbours that drove her to seek redress. He knew instances where the poor husbands of women who had been brutally treated had clubbed money from their small earnings to keep them and their children out of the workhouse while the husbands were undergoing imprisonment. There was in general against the infliction of corporal punishment, but he thought it was needed for to repress an offence which had defied all ordinary means of legal correction; and he believed the knowledge that a class of offenders would receive a corporal and degrading punishment would be more effectual in deterring men from the commission of the offence than any amount of imprisonment. His experience as a magistrate induced him to think that corporal punishment would be a fair proportion to use for the protection of the woman in those cases; and in her instance, and in that alone, he cordially supported the Bill.

MR. CLAY said, he should have been disappointed if this question had come before the House on a Motion for a Committee of Inquiry, for he knew that among police magistrates great differences of opinion existed with respect to it, and it was very desirable to have further information before the House sanctioned the Bill. He was aware how unpopular it was to say anything against the other sex, but really some hon. members spoke on this subject as if there was no such thing as a bad woman. A magistrate of great experience in a district which comprised some of the lowest parts of London had assured him that cases of drunkenness and the pawing of their husbands' clothes had been much more frequent among women since the increased severity of the law against men committed aggravated assaults upon their wives. It was common among women to say those wiles to say to a husband, "brute! If you hold up your hand to me I'll give you a 'sixer.'" Irishmen had probably some experience of the venom of an angry woman's tongue if the Legislature so far added to which a woman already possessed of a husband who maltreated her, to enable her to say to him, "You will have you whipped like a dog." (Clay) believed that the apprehension of a degrading punishment might so inflame an infuriated husband's mind as to have worse consequences than an assault—namely, to murder.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman was in error when he said that corporal punishment could be only inflicted on a civilian by the verdict of a jury. He would remind the House that flogging was a punishment which was already inflicted in breaches of prison discipline; in visiting a magistrate for a period of three months; and he had seen a number of offenders sentenced to be flogged for the repetition of those offences, but he did not know one instance of a man repeating an offence after being flogged. He would say that amongst the worst female prisoners there was more conduct than among the most ill-conducted of the men. The highest punishment that could be inflicted on a woman was being put in irons; but it did not appear efficient as flogging was found to be so in male wards. That circumstance had convinced him that flogging was the last resource was more likely to deter from crime than any other punishment. He would say the law was that any person who committed a larceny was liable to be flogged, but larceny was not so bad an offence as an aggravated assault on a woman; therefore he did not think the Bill was objectionable as it had been represented.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, he supported the Bill, believing that if whippings were added to the existing punishment, it would go far to repress aggravated assaults.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, it was not his intention so to alter the Bill in Committee as to give the magistrates, acting separately, only power to sentence to a period of imprisonment; but he should propose to give the magistrates in

MR. BLACK said, he thought that words should be omitted so as to make the provisions of this clause applicable to all persons fishing with a double rod or nets, and he would move an Amendment to that effect.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE supported the clause, as he deemed it most desirable that this illegal system of fishing should be put an end to.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had brought forward this Bill entirely in the interest of the public, to protect them in their sports, in opposition to the number of persons who were in the habit of coming from Glasgow at night, and, by means of lines and other means, exhausting the rivers of large quantities of fish for the purpose of sale.

MR. BAILLIE said, the object of this clause was to punish a man for stealing fish—a power which did not at present exist.

MR. STEUART said, he would support the clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that when the whole of a stream belonged to a single individual no one could wish to interfere with his right to fish in any manner he might please; but in those cases in which the entire stream did not belong to him, he ought to be prevented from having recourse to practices which would put an end to fishing along the whole of its course. He would suggest that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh should be adopted, and that a provision should be introduced at the end of the measure securing the rights of proprietors to whom the whole of a stream belonged.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BUCHANAN moved to omit from the clause the words “set lines;” and he did so in the interest of the children of the rural population, who were in the habit of setting lines from time immemorial. To attempt to prohibit this would be about as reasonable as to prohibit football.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, no one could wish to interfere with the amusement of children, but, as he believed as much damage could be done by set lines as cross lines, he must say “No” to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Buchanan).

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said; these set lines often had dozens of hooks, and, being put in the best parts of the river, were most destructive to the fish.

MR. CAIRD said, as this was an attempt to put a stop to the amusements of the people, he hoped the hon. Member would persevere in his Amendment.

MR. LONGFIELD opposed the setting of these lines in every direction, as it was poaching in a river in the most mischievous manner in which it could be carried on.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE believed that they ought to put down the practice of fishing by these lines.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that by the last clause of this Bill children were not prevented from fishing by single lines, but fishing by cross lines was not the act of children, inasmuch as they were only put in at night, and by means of boats.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, as was also

Clause 2.

Clause 3 struck out.

Clause 4 (Power to seize fishing implements in the possession of unqualified persons).

MR. BUCHANAN proposed as an Amendment, to insert, after the word “person,” at line 19, the words, “having the authority of the proprietor of the land.”

MR. CAIRD objected to the clause as too stringent. It would come to this, that the gamekeeper was to be the judge of the intent of a person travelling over the country.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the power given under this clause was even more stringent than that given under the game laws, which only gave power to seize suspected persons by night.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Locke) that such a stringent power did not exist under the Game Act, and he should move the rejection of the clause.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that they could only be seized if their owners were caught in the act of committing an offence.

Amendment agreed to. Clause agreed to.

Clause 5,

MR. BUCHANAN said, he objected to the justices having jurisdiction. It would be better to vest it in the sheriff of the county. The justices in many cases would be the complaining parties.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought the justices would be glad to be rid of such a troublesome jurisdiction.

Clause agreed to.

e that the Bill of the right hon. Gen-nan the Secretary for Ireland would not be slightest degree diminish the agitawhich prevailed in Ireland. A tenant gave up his holding, or was ejected making improvements with the landl's consent, was to be paid an annuity he rate of 7½ per cent on the value of improvements. If a tenant laid out
, and two years afterwards was ejected, ording to the Government Bill he would entitled to £3 10s. premium for twenty-years. As a general rule, tenants gave up in Ireland wanted to emigrate,
he suggested that it would be more venient to them as well as to their lands to substitute a capital payment in of the annuity. The measure intro-ed by the Government of the Earl of by was a most excellent Bill and much er calculated to carry out the object in than the Bill of the right hon. Gen-an opposite. He did not wish to in-ero with the rights of landlords. He the importance of preserving those ts intact, and he believed his Bill, by cing the expenditure of £11,000,000
apital on the land through the security
ould afford to tenants would tend to the value of land, increase the prosy of landlords as well as tenants, and up better feelings between them. He did not propose such a measure if he not believe that it was just and equitne hon. Member was proceeding with speech at a quarter to Six o'clock,

Mr. SPEAKER interrupted him.
Second Reading deferred till To-mor-

House adjourned at thirteen minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, May 3, 1860.

res.] Took the Oath—The Lord Onslow.
10 Bills.—1st Customs; Common Lodging
ises (Ireland).

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS ON SUNDAY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

der of the Day for the House to be into Committee read.

and CHELMSFORD moved that the House do now go into Com-

Selling and Hawking Good Bill, and reminded their L
on the second reading of th
been understood, at the sug noble Duke (the Duke of N
the full discussion of the
should be taken on this Mo
from there being any desire and fair discussion it appear
the present was a kind of tremely liable to misunder
misrepresentations. Before however, what this Bill act would state what it was no
was not one of those which to time been proposed for t enforcing a stricter observ
Lord's Day. Their Lordsh
asked to cope with all the diff must beset such a delicate lation; the experiments th
made in this matter went to
was not possible to legisla pel persons to observe the L ligiously, or as they ought.
lation could effect was to r
the way all impediments and that existed to the proper that day, leaving it then to
of each individual to employ ought, and leaving it to the ministers of religion and of th
who helped in such a holy utter futility of any attempt religious by legislation was the provisions of that very A the governing Act with regar trading. In the preamble of 29th Charles II., the Legislat in an authoritative way, that "
person and persons shall, on Day, apply himself or them observation of the same, b themselves thereon in the du and true religion publicly and That solemn invitation to pi existed on the Statute book
dred years, and with what ef
not say. Now the Bill wh brought before their Lordship Sunday-trading prevention Bi what prejudices would have upon this subject if he had give the Bill a title which b former occasions as a rallying adversaries of such a measu
therefore chosen for his Bill
adapted to describe its nature
The Bill did not introduce any against Sunday trading which did not at present exist by law ; it imposed no restraint which the law at present did not impose ; but the law being weak and inefficient, in consequence of the defect of the penalties which had been imposed, it was now proposed to strengthen the arm of the law, and make that effective which was now inefficient and powerless. Their Lordships would therefore, he hoped, be willing to consider it not as a Bill of restraint, but of relaxation. Even if its object had been restraint, it was remarkable that this was restraint implored by the great majority of those who would be affected by it, and who had prayed their Lordships by petition to pass a law to repress trading of this description, and leave them at liberty to employ their Sunday in a way which corresponded with the conscientious obligation of some of them, and the inclination of others. This subject of Sunday trading had engaged the public attention for twenty-eight years past. It had been investigated by three Committees—two Committees of the House of Commons, in 1832 and 1847, and one Committee of their Lordships' House in 1850. The evidence collected on the subject was contained in three blue-books, and so of course had been consigned to neglect and oblivion ; but in a pamphlet which had been published on the extent, the evils, and the needlessness of Sunday trading, the whole of that evidence was analysed and classified under distinct heads. Their Lordships would be astonished to learn the enormous extent to which Sunday trading was carried on in the metropolis and in its populous suburbs. The witnesses described the appearance of their own neighbourhoods on a Sunday as like a fair. Traffic in every sort of article was busily carried on, and not confined to articles of immediate want or of a perishable kind, but including everything which might be as easily and much more properly procured on other days of the week. The witnesses spoke of the congregation of thousands of people at certain spots, the whole place stirring with mountebanks exhibiting their articles and pickpockets plying their vocation, the whole presenting a scene that would defy description. This evidence applied to a distant period ; but there was no reason to suppose that any diminution had taken place in this Sunday traffic since 1850. On the contrary, the other evening a petition was presented by the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of the diocese from the Sunday Rest Association, stating that in certain parts of the Metropolis not less than half the shops were open on Sunday. This estimate might at first sight seem exaggerated ; but when they considered that in the most populous districts all or nearly all the shops were open on that day it would not appear to be far from the truth. The existing law was quite powerless to repress this traffic, because the statute imposed a penalty which was utterly ridiculous—namely a fine of 5s. which could only be inflicted once in a day, and which, moreover, could not be enforced without proof being produced not merely of the exposure of articles for sale, but of an actual sale having taken place on each particular day, and it was consequently very difficult to procure the necessary evidence. There was one peculiar circumstance which spoke strongly in favour of the Bill. The great majority of persons engaged in these trades carried them on reluctantly on Sunday, and it was their earnest desire that some law might be introduced which would place them all upon the same level and enable them to follow the dictates of their own consciences. Every movement in that direction and every attempt at legislation on the subject had been instigated by these very parties. This was proved by the Reports of the Select Committees, and by the numerous petitions he had himself presented, signed by upwards of 60,000 tradesmen, earnestly imploring their Lordships, for their sakes, to pass a measure of this description. He was not insensible to the difficulties which beset the task he had undertaken. He saw about him the wrecks of former failures, and he was thereby warned not to expect smooth sailing in waters which had been so easily troubled. Nor did he desire to conceal from their Lordships the unsuccessful attempts which had previously been made. Bills for the same object as that of the Bill he now proposed, had been introduced to Parliament at various times from 1832 downwards ; namely, in that year, in 1848, in 1850, in 1851, in 1852, and finally in 1855. The Bill of 1850, which in many respects resembled his own, was referred by their Lordships to a Select Committee, who reported upon it ; and the Bill, having passed through all its stages, was sent down to the other House ; but, in consequence of the lateness of the Session, did not pass. In 1855 the noble Lord opposite (Lord Ebury) proposed another Bill, which, in principle, was also similar to the present one. It was affirmed by the House of Commons, having passed a second reading without any division; but when it got into Committee, certain persons interested in its failure contrived to get up an excitement upon the question, and collected Sunday after Sunday large assemblies of persons in Hyde Park. The Government of the day became alarmed, and at their solicitation his noble Friend was induced to abandon the Bill. He thought that the Government might have taught a fatal lesson to the people, by yielding to a combination such as he had described. If the measure was a proper one, as appeared to be the case from its second reading having been assented to by the House of Commons, it ought to have received the sanction of the Legislature. He was not disheartened, though to a certain extent discouraged, by these former measures; but feeling most deeply the necessity of the measure, and disregarding his own ease and comfort, he engaged in the undertaking, in the earnest hope that it might ultimately prove successful. In this enterprise he found himself assailed from opposite quarters and by totally different descriptions of adversaries. In the first place, a number of pious and excellent persons objected to any Bill which would permit any relaxation of the law as to Sunday trading, regarding it as a legislative connivance at the desecration of the Lord's Day. He would ask these excellent persons were they satisfied with the existing state of things? If not, and if they thought his measure would at least afford to thousands and tens of thousands of tradesmen the opportunity of better employing their Sundays than they now did, he asked whether it was wise to refuse assent to a Bill, which, as far as it went, proceeded in the right direction, only because it might not effect all that was desired? The relaxation proposed was forced on by circumstances. Unfortunately the practice of paying workmen their wages late on Saturday nights, still prevailed to a considerable extent. This engaged many poor persons to spend a portion of the Sunday in making their little purchases. He rejoiced, however, that a better state of things was arising. Through the exertions of the Sunday Rest Association, and the Early Closing Society, a general disposition was gaining ground to alter the practice now adopted in the government departments, and in many private establishments; namely, to pay wages on Fridays, or, at all events, early on Saturdays.

Lord Chelmsford

turdays. He did not despair of seeing, before long, this custom generally adopted, and then they might remove this objection, making the prohibition of Sunday trading general. The other class of objectors, he believed, had the support of the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of St. Germans). They objected to any interference with, or attempt to regulate Sunday trading, as an invasion of private right. His answer was easy and obvious. The present law prohibited parties from doing that which his Bill prevented them from doing: it happened, however, that the law imposed so insignificant a penalty, that they could afford to despise or defy it, and carry on their trade with impunity. They could not urge that he imposed any new restraint; the law was rather relaxed in their favour; but the amount of their objection was, that the law was weak, that it could not enforce its prohibition; and that he was endeavouring to add strength and vigour to the law, so as to make it effective. Then, it was said, there should be a matter of voluntary arrangement among tradesmen. That experiment had, according to the evidence, been frequently tried, but had entirely failed. Why? Because, unless all agreed to close the shops—if four or five out of a multitude of tradesmen chose to keep open theirs—those recusant tradesmen would attract themselves the whole trade. It was also said that every man should decide the matter for himself, and there was no need of the assistance of the Legislature. This he was satisfied, would be putting a yoke upon these men which they were unable to bear. There might be some who, from conscientious convictions of the propriety of it, might incur the loss involved by closing their shops on the Lord's Day; but in the great majority of them the claims of family, the eagerness of competition, the certainty of loss if their shops were closed, combined to render the temptation too strong for them to resist; and if their Lordships were to legislate on the subject, they must deal with men as men, making allowance for those worldly influences by which men are ordinarily actuated. They might condemn them for not making the requisite sacrifice, but the appeal was made to their Lordships not to judge of the morality or propriety of the acts which had been done, but to leave their legislation to open the way by which these men might pursue a different course. Could they conceive anything more prejudicial than the state of things he had described? It not only affected the trade

Simply because there would be a closing; the same thing which now on Saturday night, in driving purchases from Saturday night into the Sunday will operate then. The same stream of customers directed to the shop at the hour when it is to close; the same desire on the part of the customer to make the best bargain, and to the last moment on Saturday morning to put off to the last moment the purchases which they are to make on the Saturday night; and it is next to impossible for the shop to receive of thirty or forty customers who are waiting outside. It will be more painful to me, and more difficult; they will have more difficulty in enforcing the law as that than in closing the shops, no exceptions being allowed which the Bill contemplates. I speak my own opinion of the evil of the case as I believe it is the opinion of Mr. Champneys, I expect, and he might add that I had been read a second time on an occasion to ascertain the opinion with respect to its provision by Sir Richard Mayne, who told him that he did not think it could be enforced. Owing to the fact that many of the labouring class during the week, they would have considerable difficulty in rising early on Sunday morning to make necessary purchases before they would at all events defer them until the last moment, so shopkeepers would find it almost impossible to shut their doors at the present against the crowds by which they would be besieged. It had been proved that many of the streets by the working men in London were so crowded and impassable that it was almost impossible for them to purchase fresh articles there; they were therefore necessarily obliged to purchase those articles they required for the last moment. The noble and learned Lord, however, proposed that the Bill should not apply to the sale of any fruit or pastry, or of any other article which may by law be sold without licence, before the hour of closing in the morning and after, the hour of closing in the afternoon, but he said, "I will not cry;" but from that categorical and popular refreshment was excluded; he should like also to know what was the difference between a public and a private cry. But be that as it may, to endeavour to enforce the provisions of the Bill would be attended with great trouble and annoyance to the police. Let him suppose, for instance, the case of an old woman with a basket of oranges or apples, who happened to be found by a policeman in the streets at half-past 10 o'clock on Sunday morning. Under the provisions of the Bill she would be liable to have her fruit seized and taken off to the police-station. But she might say in her own defence that she lived at so great a distance from the spot at which she was found that she could not go to her home and return before 1 o'clock, when she might expose her fruit for sale again. She was therefore only sitting there waiting for 1 o'clock. The policeman might be satisfied with that explanation and pass on; and the old woman would immediately begin to sell to any one that would buy. Suppose, however, the policeman returned and detected her in the fact; she might then say, "Well you must carry off the fruit if you will; but let the basket alone"—there is nothing about that in the Act. So the policeman would have to fill his pockets with her apples and oranges, and take them off to the next station, the whole proceeding taking place in the midst of a crowd who would have probably gathered around her, who would very probably take the part of the old woman, mob the policeman, and create more confusion and scandal than could arise from selling any quantity of oranges between 10 and 1 o'clock. Were the fruit having been taken to the station unless the number of apples and oranges were counted by the Superintendent, the old woman would very naturally say that she had been robbed of half the quantity which her basket contained. Next morning she would be brought before the magistrate, to whom she would make a mournful appeal, vowing that she could not possibly pay a fine of half-a-crown; the upshot of the whole affair not improbably being that her loss would be refunded out of the poor-box. The noble and learned Lord stated in the course of his speech that the Bill was intended merely to remove obstructions in the way of persons who were desirous of keeping the Sabbath properly and was not to be considered a penal enactment. The penalties under it were certainly not very severe; still they were penalties; and the measure could be considered in no other light than a penal statute. The cases of the tradesmen have been much exaggerated. No tradesman need keep his shop open on Sunday. The working people will deal on week days hands of Sir Richard Mayne, and the Attorney did not prefer resigning to enforcing the law, it would be fully sufficient to put an end to trading. Irrespective of the disapproval on God's Fourth Commandment, trifling, the result must be to transfer the business to others outside the magic circle. The offensive measure to the poor and workmen would be productive of much trouble to the Government if it were passed and collisions would inevitably take place with the police if it were sought to enforce the provisions.

DUNGANNON said, the resolution introduced by the noble Lord was watched with great interest. A large portion of the trading community in support of this view he would not support, for which he had received from many with whom he was wholly unacquainted. It stated—

"Your Lordship will pardon the liberty I am taking of addressing you for the purpose of soliciting your Lordship's aid in support of the Bill in relation to Sunday trading. I have carried on the business of a butcher for the last ten years, and have a wife and five children entirely dependent on my support. I am obliged to keep my shop from half-past ten till one o'clock on Sunday, because others do; if I did not, I should lose my customers; and thus have little time to devote to my family, or to attend to my religious duties on Sunday."

It is not necessary to know that the sentiments expressed in that letter, which was written, were shared in by many of the trading classes; for at present it is nearly impossible for them to pay attention either to their families or to the duties of the Sabbath. The Bill, therefore, should be considered in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR said, he had been honoured by a letter from the noble Lord who had just sat down. He must confess that the arguments which it contained had made a deep impression on his mind. He hoped that the House would not go into Committee, where endeavours would be made to frame such a measure as would meet an admitted evil, without incurring the odium of unpopularity.

THE EARL OF MARLBOROUGH thought that the difficulty would be found to consist not so much in answering the objections as in the want of a measure that would be found as to the mode of dealing with the subject. At the same rate, the objections that had been raised were not, he thought, sufficiently strong to prevent the going into Committee. Most of the objections were such as could be removed in Committee; and if the Bill were once passed the public would become accustomed to the law just as they had become accustomed to the closing of public houses. There was a general disposition in this country to bow to the law. Sir Richard had been laid on the statement of Commissioner Mayne, that it would cause great trouble to the police; but considering the large amount of police rates with which the Metropolis was saddled it ought in such a matter to have the benefit of their service. Some remedy was loudly called for to remove the evils that existed in connection with Sunday trading in the Metropolis, and he hoped, therefore, their Lordships would not refuse to make the attempt to frame a measure which attempted to deal with them.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he was willing to go into Committee on the understanding that very great modifications should be made in the Bill. He supported it solely because the law was at present in an unsatisfactory state: it was extravagant in both directions—it imposed little or no penalty—was calculated to sweep all classes of buyers and sellers into the same net. To one clause, the 7th, which made it the duty of the police to interfere, he must give his decided opposition. He was willing that the police might lodge an information the following morning; but to permit bodily interference by them would inevitably lead to riot and tumult, and should have his decided opposition.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he should be very glad to go into Committee on the Bill if there were any hope of framing out of it a measure which would be desirable to pass. He desired as strongly as any one to accomplish the object of the Bill, but his fear was that attempting this they might create a greater mischief than that they were dealing with. He thought it would lead to riot and disturbance; and a noble Lord—always of great authority with their Lordships—he said on one occasion, "I am ready to lay down a riot, but I will not provoke one," and in that spirit he should vote against this Bill.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON had had a great difficulty in making up his mind with reference to this Bill; but, being charged even without any reference to the grounds for an observance of the Sabbath. The Rev. Gentleman further stated to the same Committee that he was not in favour of any voluntary exertions would be made to put down Sunday trading. He also reminded the noble Earl (the Earl of St. Germans), if he had forgotten in him of the fact if he was not aware of it, that amongst the petitioners in favour of the Bill of his noble Friend was the Rev. Canon of Bath. The Bill of his noble and learned Friend was an attempt to effect a permanent though a most difficult object, not to compel a religious observance of the Sabbath, but it was a Bill to deprive a number of tradesmen in this country of a species of slavery. The vast majority of the well-informed and intelligent classes were in favour of legislative interference on this subject, believing as they did that the present law was insufficient for the purpose of preventing Sunday trading. The Bill of his noble and learned Friend might be open to some objections, but it might be improved by some modifications. It was nevertheless a sound, rational, and temperate Bill, and for this reason he hoped the Committee would decide that it should be referred to a Select Committee, not into a Select Committee of the House, but into a Committee of the Whole House, in which it may be improved in such a manner as to their Lordships might seem

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS explained that he rested his allusion to the Rev. Canon of Bath upon the statement of the Rev. Gentleman, that he believed the law as it was were left an inch open it would be improved altogether. The inference drawn by the Rev. Canon was against any legislative interference which did not go the length of an absolute prohibition of Sunday trading.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS stated that the question of their Lordships divided:—
In favour of the Bill 25; Not-Contents 25; Majority 0.

and in the affirmative.

CONTENTS.

Archbp.	Beauchamp, E.
(L. Chan-)	Belmore, E.
	Carlisle, E.
D.	Derby, E.
	Effingham, E.
	Elkington, E.
M.	Hardwicke, E.
	Lanesborough, E.
	Lucan, E.

Malmesbury, E.	Calthorpe, L.
Romney, E.	Castlemaine, L.
Shrewsbury, E. [Teller.]	Chelmsford, L. [Teller.]
Stradbroke, E.	Colchester, L.
Winton, E. (E. Eglington.)	Congleton, L.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)	Cranworth, L.
Dungannon, V.	Crews, L.
Eversley, V.	Egerton, L.
Hardinge, V.	Overstone, L.
Stratford de Redcliffe, V.	Plunket, L. (Bp. Tuam, &c.)
Bath and Wells, Bp.	Polwarth, L.
Carlisle, Bp.	Ravenworth, L.
Cashel, &c., Bp.	Redesdale, L.
Chichester, Bp.	Saltoun, L.
Hereford, Bp.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clancarty.)
Llandaff, Bp.	Sondes, L.
London, Bp.	Stewart of Stewart's Court, L. (M. Londonderry.)
St. Asaph, Bp.	Stratheden, L.
Abinger, L.	Wensleydale, L.
Barnes, L.	Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Newcastle, D.	Chesham, L.
Somerset, D.	Daore, L.
De Grey, E.	Dartrey, L. (L. Cremorne.)
Ellenborough, E.	Foley, L.
Granville, E.	Harris, L.
Grey, E.	Hunsdon, L. (V. Falkland.)
Harrington, E.	Manover, L.
Saint Germans, E. [Teller.]	Lyveden, L.
Spencer, E.	Rivers, L.
Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Sydney, V.	Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
Camys, L. [Teller.]	Teynham, L.
	Wodehouse, L.

THE EARL OF GRANVILLE said, it seemed to him that the machinery provided for carrying out the provisions of the Bill was so imperfect that he thought he was right in asking whether the noble and learned Lord intended to introduce any Amendments, and if so he would suggest that it would be better to postpone the Committee to a future day.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that although no doubt Amendments would be proposed yet he saw no reason against going on with the Committee at once.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1.

LORD TEYNHAM was understood to object to it.

LORD CHELMSFORD then said, he would adopt the suggestion offered by the noble Earl opposite, and agree to the postponement of the Committee, being anxious that all the clauses should undergo the fullest investigation.

House resumed, and to be again in Committee on Monday next.

persons of Irish birth found beg-
t be taken before a magistrate, transport them to any one of a number of ports in Ireland—not to
of their birth—thence to find to their own parish as best they Committee of the House of sat on this subject in 1854,
commended certain modifications,
ld undoubtedly be improvements,
much soften the rigour of the ce that period, however, nothing done; and he hoped to hear from Earl opposite that Her Majesty's nt had considered the matter and prepared to bring in a Bill on t.

RANVILLE said, the evils of
at system arose from the fact arent law of settlement prevailed
d and Ireland, neither country
ng to adopt that of the other.
ty's Government were about to Committee in the other House ent to consider particularly two he reduction of the number of dence necessary to acquire a set-
this country, and also the ex-
of parishes or unions in Ireland.
that Committee would report in nable the Government to introasure on the subject during the ession.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock
till To-morrow half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, May 3, 1860.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.—For orks, Benyon, esquire.

A.—1^o Nuisances Removal and Dis-vention.

ntation of the People; Exchequer (3,230,000).

tical Courts Jurisdiction.

GUNBOATS.—QUESTION.

NG said, he would beg to ask ary to the Admiralty, Whether ntention of the Government to mediately the Gunboats now be in a rotten condition, and, if
r any addition to the Naval Esti-be necessary?

LARENCE PAGET said, the repairs of the gunboats had cost a mor

considerable sum than was anticipated, bu
in the Estimates the Admiralty had taken a sum for repairs, and there was also a item for gunboats, so that it would not b necessary to propose an addition to th Estimates in consequence of these large repairs.

THE WAKEFIELD ELECTION COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to ask the Attorney General, Whether an proceedings, civil or criminal, has been commenced against the persons implicated in the Report of the Wakefield and Gloucester Commissions; whether the intention of the hon. and learned Gentleman has been directed to the period (April, 1859) when those offences were committed; and whether he is of opinion that the limitation of proceedings under the Corrupt Practice Act, applied to civil proceedings only, o included criminal proceedings as well?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir
I am very much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for putting this question, for it has just been communicated to me that some persons imagine they have discovered that these delinquents can escape. I can only assure the Gentlemen who think so, that they have succeeded in finding a mere nidus equinus. Now, Sir, I was never my intention to proceed against these persons for any penalty, pecuniary fine, or forfeiture. I stated clearly that I should bring them to the bar of a Criminal Court. The offence they have committed is first of all a misdemeanour at Common Law, to which I would resort if there were any difficulty under the statute.
But the statute leaves no doubt upon the subject to any informed person who will take the trouble of reading it. It enacts in the clearest manner that not only shall the offence be punishable by penalty, and that the party committing it shall be liable to forfeit £100, but that he shall also be guilty of a misdemeanour; and when the fine is imposed the language of the section limiting the fine for recovering the penalty is applicable only to civil, and not to criminal process. It is impossible for the most morbid ingenuity of a lawyer to straiten
the language of the statute so as to bring the criminal offence or the criminal proceedings within the limit of twelve months.
I intend, therefore, and I have given directions accordingly, that criminal informa-

again proposed.

sumed.

CAULAY said, he had been in the course of the debate as a member who had supported the late Government, and it was, in his opinion, right that he should be in- guilty of a similar eccentricity to the measure now before the House. He could assure the hon. and learned Member, Mr. Denman, that he was not in the least in- tention. The topic which had attracted the attention of the House in the present debate was the borough franchise, and to that he should confine his remarks.

If he understood the noble Lord, who introduced the Bill, it was not the intention of an imaginary compact at the passing of the Reform Bill, that the labouring classes would assist the middle classes in passing that Bill, the middle classes would by-and-by support the labouring classes in their endeavours to secure the franchise also; but in order to remedy the newly-discovered defects in the franchise, that the present measure was proposed.

For a number of years the Government was not sensible of these defects, and he believed that the noble Lord who introduced the Act of 1832 was not in the spirit of our ancient representation. It was laid down as a principle by Sir James Macintosh that the distinguishing characteristic of English representation is variety of franchise.

Qualification must either be so framed as to exclude truly popular election, or to let in a greater portion of the population on universal suffrage."

In the Reform Bill, no doubt, the intention was to produce a franchise which would include the higher and middle classes, just as the stratum beneath. The intention of the Reform Bill was that it did not include the working classes; and the great difference between the two Houses was upon what principle the franchise was to be cured. The noble Lord introducing his present Bill, had intended the representation of boroughs to be the representation of the hands of the payers of scot and lot being resident householders; and he understood that scot-and-lot resident householders were to be the franchise in ancient times and in modern times the presumption of that the payer of scot-and-lot was the franchise in fee simple of the house, and the fact corresponded in a great degree with that presumption. But the term "householder" at the present day expresses no such thing. In fixing the borough franchise at £10 in 1832, the intention was to adapt the old franchise to the altered circumstances of the times. Before the Reform Act there was a great variety of franchises, which had disappeared under the auspices of the noble Lord. There were boroughs with close corporations representing the wealthier middle classes; there were populous boroughs with numerous constituencies of householders; there were boroughs with constituencies of freemen; there were boroughs with burgage tenures; there were boroughs with freehold constituencies; and there were nomination boroughs. The result was a reflection in the House of the whole of the feelings and interests of the country; and the change contemplated by the Reform Bill was to change the indirect for the direct system of representation. It was never intended that the power should be transferred from one class to another; but only that direct should take the place of indirect representation. It had been said that the £10 qualification did not adequately represent those below the class of small shopkeepers; but it had been untrue, that was inaccurately stated that it did not represent the working classes at all. He was of opinion, founded on his knowledge of a populous town, that, as a matter of fact, among the occupiers of £10 tenements there were large numbers of persons living on weekly and monthly wages. In his own constituency, Cambridge, consisting of 1,800 voters, there were several hundreds of that class. Unhappily, it might also be said that in most populous constituencies there were a considerable number of persons who were extremely poor. Many hon. Gentlemen knew that the receipt of parochial relief operated as a disqualification for the franchise; and that there were about the country political clubs who subscribed funds in order to prevent their partizans, on the one side or the other, from going to the parish and so becoming disqualified. Yet it was said that a constituency with the £10 qualification was a too aristocratic body. Asserting, as he did, that labour and also poverty were represented in the £10 franchise, he was prepared to admit, and he did admit, that below the £10 occupation we were likely to find a class or a stratum of persons who were not only as respectable, but even more respectable, than those who occupied the £10 houses.

[Sixth Night.]

principle, and he only regretted not to go into Committee, in order that the principle might be fully, fairly, and discussed. It was possible, he thought, to have hung the two principles together, and that the introduction of a qualification for persons renting at a lower value than £10 had been accompanied by the introduction of others possessing those qualifications which he thought so desirable. What he wanted was a measure to ascertain the character of the man, instead of bringing the qualification to the man, he would hold it in the man, and the man was to rise in the man. That he thought was one of the most effective means of securing a qualification; and the application of the principle of personal qualification, but reverting to the principle of the most popular qualification, which was based. The principle of qualification of freemen was actually in Coventry, and so impressed upon the hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) with its excellence, and he did the right hon. Gentleman in this House to speak upon it, but they heard of the Coventry. What was that? Why, that the man who had been years' apprenticeship with in that town, and received a qualification of conduct and character from as a good and true man, was entitled a freeman; and he could have of this franchise by some conduct of his own. Now, to give as that—so to be attained, so to be lost—he (Mr. Macaulay) was willing to give his assent and opinion, there was the qualification of the noble Lord himself proposed in 1854, arising from residence in receipt of annual wages. Why did the noble Lord drop that provision? Why did he not legislate on this subject for those who were in receipt of wages? Why did he not refer his proposal to qualify persons in boroughs and in the receipt of wages? At that time, too, the noble Lord proposed a qualification for persons in the receipt of £10 in the public stocks. Why had he not reproduced? He further introduced a qualification for the payment of wages. This, also, had been omitted in the present Bill. It could not be, moreover, that that measure, of which Mr. Bright was so decided a supporter, did not come up to, but was rather in contravention of the theories and principles which had been expounded in that hon. Gentleman's speeches. He was almost ashamed to refer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, whose name had been so often brought before the House in the course of the debate; but the hon. Gentleman had stated in public that a £6 qualification, without giving equal elective power to each voter, and in the absence of the Ballot, would be worthless. He had propounded a parochial franchise, which he seemed to like for the sake of its uniformity, its antiquity, and its constitutional character. What, said the hon. Member, is more laudable than a parish-rating franchise? He did not appear to remember that the parish franchise was one that would yield to the voter an influence proportionate to the value of the property which he occupied. Now, if this question of extending the franchise would receive a quiescent by every rated occupier having the right to vote for Members of Parliament, was the hon. Gentleman prepared to give the man the same amount of influence at a Parliamentary election that he now exercised in an election for guardians of the poor? There was plainly no other test in his case than that of paying a certain rental and the accompanying taxes. Now, in that view of the case, why should not the power of voting rise according to the increased wealth, and the increased influence of the voter? It was quite certain that the country would not tolerate, and that the noble Lord was not about to carry a measure that would simply and crudely add 200,000 or 300,000 persons of a particular class to the present list of voters, and at the same time perpetuate all the inequality and unfairness of the Reform Bill. The first recommendation of any measure of Reform should be that it held out a fair and reasonable hope of permanence by reason of its containing within itself the elements of stability. But if he were not greatly misinformed, a considerable party in this House, without whose support it would be impossible for the noble Lord to persist in his Bill for a single day, accepted the measure grudgingly, and with the avowal that this Bill was for them but the commencement of a new agitation. Was that so or was it not? He wished to have the question answered. He did not put it offensively. The hon. Member for Birmingham had already spoken in this de-

[Sixth Night.]

e; he was, therefore, precluded from re-sassing the House again; but some
 . Friend of his might answer the ques-
 : for him. Had not the hon. Member i this:—"I will be content with a rat-
 -suffrage, but do not let me prejudice case of those of you who would have hood or universal suffrage. Go with for what I think it advisable to ask,

I will go with you as far as it is rea-
 able or possible to go in the extension
 he suffrage?" The hon. Member shook head; if he had expected that he would e brought down the pamphlet containing
 hon. Member's own words, and which had been reading not more than an r ago. But he certainly did state it Bradford or some other place, where he obviously surrounded by an audience
 nanhood suffrage or universal suffrage
 ple; and in order to render his advocacy
 a rating franchise palatable to them, he

them, "If you back me up in this, it uthout prejudice to my going with you
 he full extent; for no suffrage can be large for me." [Mr. BRIGHT again dia-lected.] Well, were the hon. Gentleman

his friends prepared to open or to go ing with a new agitation next year for till further extension of the suffrage?
 re not their political interests, in fact,
 nd up with those of the parties who
 e in favour of manhood or universal rage? He judged by the nature and ber of the petitions which had been sent to the House. The other day
 hon. Member flaunted in their faces petitions upon the table for the total immediate abolition of church rates, gh he did not say how they had been
 up. He stated that there were 500,000 100,000 signatures to those petitions—ould not stand for a hundred thousand we either way. Would the hon. Gen-an refer to the Report of the Com-tee on Petitions, and inform the House
 t proportion the petitions in favour of

Bill bore to the petitions in favour of hood suffrage, vote by ballot, and equal toral districts? He very much doubted
 e hon. Member would find more than a dozen altogether, including that from immaculate corporation of Norwich, in ur of the Bill; whilst popular support
 m to the Bill out of doors was derived a those societies which favoured politi-views that a few men only were found ncourage in this House. The other at the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lan-er said, "If you do not approve of this

Mr. Macaulay

measure, why not move an Amend-and divide the House on the second ing of the Bill." But Amendments sort were only moved at the begin-a debate, and after due notice had given. ["Move!"] Of course an Ament could be moved at any time
 that was not the usual practice,
 however, it had been given notice
 should have felt it to be his duty
 he should have performed it with a
 to vote, though doubtless in a mi-in its favour. But the course which debate had taken to his mind vinmost amply the foresight of those who determined to prefer a free discuss-
 a division on a party Amendment.
 House had experience in 1859 of
 was the effect of moving a party Ament on a measure of this sort, and ting in issue the existence of a M-instead of the merits of a measure form. Why, one-half the Gentlemen formed the majority in the last ment, would gladly have seen the Lord Derby's Government consider Committee of the Whole House; but issue then raised was one upon which was impossible to obtain either a vote or even a full and free expression of ion, upon the merits of the measure.
 Now, supposing a similar course had taken by my hon. Friends on this oc-what would have happened? Supposing second reading had been opposed—
 the House have had an opportunity of ing the instructive arguments of the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), vigorous invective of the hon. Mem-Salisbury (Mr. Marsh), or even the of the hon. Member for Berkshire Walter). He thought not; indeed, sure not. The House would have lost valuable speeches; whilst the Opposi-
 would not have gained their votes.
 there was the hon. Gentleman the man of Committees (Mr. Massey).
 the merest feeling of etiquette—not attachment to his party—would have pelled him to suppress a speech that absolutely conclusive, and which was lowed by a notice that was intended destructive of the Bill. There was a
 hon. and learned Member for Mary
 (Mr. Edwin James); if this had been a party question the House would heard nothing of those alarming state-which he had produced to discredit a sure to which, with admirable consid-he nevertheless continued to give his support; but stern duty and a truth had compelled the hon. and member to bring forward those though they did tend materially to the Bill. The present disclosed this fact, that the opposite Bill was not the growth of (conservative) side of the House. He hoped that when next a Minister asked the question, "Why not move the question?" he would address it, not to the Opposition, but to the members immediately behind him. Was it to be doubted that those hon. Gentlemen spoken in a sense that was adequate main details of the measure, the voices of their own constituents? Was it to be doubted that that proved to be the clear and unanimous opinion of moderate men on both sides? Was it also clearly shown to be the sense and convictions of the country? By Gentleman rise and quote in the name of any considerable authority who gave even an ostensible assent to the Bill? Would he cite the name of any distinguished person, be it a thinker, or public man, who withheld the least favour? On the same (Mr. Macanlay) ventured to speak in a private society, as well as in the name of this House, the measure was met with universal dislike and opposition. He invited Her Majesty's Ministers, to reconsider this question in relation to the measure itself, and in relation to the nation, as well as in relation to their own credit and reputation. He ascertained that the matured mind of that House was opposed to the measure let it be withdrawn. The noble Lord nor his colleagues should be by incur discredit or peril, for they had taken upon itself the duty of supporting them of the embarrassment they had fallen. He hoped and trusted that course would be followed. The Bill could be carried with a high majority. The Parliament was not to be deterred for a moment. Twice before the noble Lord had given a pledge on this subject and had redeemed his pledge by the introduction of a Bill which he had since withdrawn. But it was not the fault of the noble Lord that he had not been able to persuade his colleagues and to give him that cordial support which alone enable him to carry such a measure with satisfaction. The noble Lord's strong personal attachment to this subject, and, as the sole author of the Bill, it was but natural he should take a peculiar interest in its career. Indeed, his affection for the measure had been not been inaptly compared to that which parents often lavish on deformed offspring. The opinion of the House and of the country had been fully expressed on this question and further information of an important character was likely to be obtained, and he submitted to the noble Lord that the measure might very fairly be allowed to stand over for the consideration of Parliament at another occasion. He thought it would be well that the same House which had so recently sanctioned the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should sustain the labour, responsibility, and glory of dealing with that deficit of 1861 which had been so gratuitously made. He held that the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was mainly indefensible on that ground that, while he enacted the destructive part of a financial revolution, he did not invite the same Parliament to share the responsibility of carrying out the reconstructive portion of the revolution. It was on no light grounds therefore, that he called on the Government to employ the present Parliament on that task, and not to intrust it to those who would be elected under such a Bill as this.

MR. GREGORY: Sir, I shall follow the example of almost every one who has addressed the House, and avow that I accept with a feeling of resignation, rather than with thankfulness, the second reading of a Bill for which not ten Members out of every 100 in this House have any inclination, and upon which I am fully confident that forty out of every fifty look, in their hearts, with disapprobation and alarm. One of the causes of what I may call the dissatisfied assent which tolerates the second reading of the Bill, arises from the feeling among hon. Members that there ought to be a settlement of the Reform Question—that we ought to have, if not finality, at all events, some quiescence on the subject of Reform for twenty or thirty years to come. I acknowledge that if I could look upon this measure in that view, I should range myself among the supporters of the Bill; but when I remember the Resolutions that were passed at that Manchester meeting, of which so much has been said, the closing part of the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), in which he said he accepted this measure as only an instalment, and a very small instalment, of what is to come. I can-

[Sixth Night.]

but the beginning of the end, and that so great are the anomalies and increased inconsistencies arising from this Bill, that as the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey), observed, it will be impossible to avoid or resist the fresh Reform Bills that will arise one after another, until we arrive, aye, and before many years, at universal suffrage. In forming, by anticipation, an opinion of what is likely to be the consequence of the increase of democratic principles, of the transference of power from the middle classes to the masses, we are not left to mere conjecture or to abstract reasoning. We have on the other side of the Atlantic one of the greatest nations of the earth—identical with our own in family, in language, and I may almost say, judging from the resemblance of the different sects, in religion. Different political institutions, and unbounded territory constitute almost the only differences. If, therefore, we are to assimilate our political system to that of America, I think we ought to examine, not only how that system works under the most favourable circumstances that can be conceived for its development, but also into the changes which are springing up from day to day in the American Constitution, and to ascertain whether those changes redound to the credit and happiness of the country, or the reverse. We fortunately are not left to feel our way in the dark, or to be guided by mere hearsay. We have one of the most intelligent guides who ever directed an inquiry of this kind—a man whose attainments and impartiality are universally acknowledged, whose intimate acquaintance with the inner springs of American democracy is a marvel, even to Americans themselves, and who is admitted to be the apostle of democracy. I mean M. de Tocqueville. If, therefore, we find that during the period of twenty-five years, since M. de Tocqueville visited America, great changes have taken place, that many of those changes were predicted by him, and that many changes have occurred, not for the benefit or credit of the country, which he predicted as possible but not likely to occur—then I think we shall not incur the imputation of running counter to Liberal opinions by endeavouring to save England from steering on shoals upon which beacons have already been erected, and which ought to serve, if they do not serve, as a warning. During the last five months, I have been in the United States, and as did not go there merely to race over an immense tract of country, but to endeavour to ascertain, as honestly as I could, the working of American institutions to find out what was worthy of imitation, and I am bound to say there is much worth of imitation, such as their mode of dealing with religious questions—and also to point out what warnings their system conveyed. I may venture to detail some of the observations I made, and the truth of my deductions I shall corroborate by American authority. My hon. Friend (Mr. Caird) the other night deprecated speaking of American institutions lest we should give offence. I can assure the House that I have received too great kindness in that country to use of a single expression which could possibly give offence in America. As a general rule, Americans are well educated in politics, and this Reform Bill was carried in almost every house and excited a most anxious and painful interest in America. We are too much accustomed in England to think that there is a hostile feeling in America towards us, and that impression is strengthened by the ebullitions of certain newspapers. But, so far as my experience goes, there exists a most warm and kindly feeling towards the old country in America, and it is that feeling which induces many in America to beg of me to tell them I had seen in that country, without the slightest fear of causing any pain to them. When I was at Washington during the past winter I had the honour of the acquaintance and friendship of many Members of the Houses of Legislature, and I was particularly asked respecting my political opinions when I stated that I sat on the opposite side of the House that remark was well received, for Americans like the liberal policy; but when I added that the policy induced me to vote for a very considerable extension of the franchise, and as it is called, the working classes, they lost the confidence of the House, then I was bound to say the opinions of my friends underwent, as it appeared to me, a great what of a revulsion, and a suspicion seemed to be entertained either as regards my honesty or intelligence—I trust in the latter with respect to the latter. "You have travelled," they said to me, "from north to south and from east to west in this country, have you closed your eyes and shut your ears to everything that is going on? Are you so wedded to theory that nothing can give you a warning. Have you seen the decay of this young and vigorous nation produced by men of education, intellect, and character; or, on the contrary, have you not of those cast aside, and our Legislature reduced to the dull level of the dullest mediocrity? Have you perceived a purity in our municipalities and Legislature, which we cannot hope to reach at home under our present system, and which requires universal suffrage to establish among you, have you found the most wide-spread morality and corruption? Have you seen in every department of the State frugality and parsimony, or an anxious desire for the most lavish expenditure? Do you consider our course of justice purer here than in England; and do you think to improve the authority and reverence due to the judiciary by making your Judges elected for a short period and by universal suffrage? Have you found that you are so oppressed by the Throne and the aristocracy in England that it is necessary for you to adopt social equality to enable every man to say as he likes and to say the thing that cometh him best, or have you seen here that the iron will of the majority fetters the rights and paralyses the utterance and hinders the actions of men in this land of liberty and universal suffrage." To all this I could only answer in the language of Cicero, "Infandum jubes renovare dolorem;" or, to use words more appropriate to the case of America, I felt bound to express the "fix" in which we find ourselves in England. I told my friends that a great statesman, the hero of the first Reform Bill, conscious of the success of that measure, and animated with a wish for future triumph, thought right to initiate a fresh movement, and I added that it was, as he said, with a view to regain his somewhat worn-out popularity. I said that these ill-natured persons, who most probably took the motives which actuated that statesman. I next stated that the great conservative party afterwards came into power, and they also sanctioned the movement for Reform. I said that the same ill-natured class of censurers contended that the party preferred to risk the Constitution by risking their tenure of office; from which censure I, of course, observed I entirely dissented. Then I explained that Mr. Gentleman had been in the habit of bringing forward Motions for the reduction of the county franchise from £50 to £20, and a great number of Gentlemen voted with him; and ill-natured people I remarked, that they did so under the impression that they might by their votes obtain a cheap popularity without any political consequence being likely to follow.

Mr. Gregory

I was obliged to admit that the people on this occasion were, perhaps altogether mistaken. The result, though I might have satisfied my friends of the admirable manner in which we maintain our consistency, I cannot satisfy them of our wisdom; and I furnished me with different documents and statements, with some of which I venture to trouble the House. I then called the attention of the House to the first results that were produced arising from universal suffrage, the nullity of public men. We have men in America of the highest intellectual capacity, eloquent, and well formed. Do we meet them in person? M. de Tocqueville's remarks on this are worthy recording:—

"Many people in Europe are apt to be without considering it, or to say it without believing it, that one of the great advantages of universal suffrage is, that it intrusts the management of public affairs to men who are worthy of public confidence. They admit that the people is unable to govern for itself, but they say it is always sincerely disposed to promote the welfare of the State, and that it instinctively selects those persons who are animated by good wishes, and who are most fit to exercise supreme authority. I confess that the notions I made in America by no means tally with those opinions. I was surprised to find much distinguished talent among the people, and so little among the heads of the Government. It is a well authenticated fact that on the present day the most talented men of the States are very rarely placed at the head of the Government, and it must be acknowledged that such is the result, in proportion as democracy has stripped all its former limits. The American statesman has evidently dwindled remarkably in the course of the last century. . . . The people has neither the means which are essential to investigate, nor the conclusions are hastily formed from a superficial inspection of the more prominent questions. Hence it often assents to the proposals of a mountebank, who knows the secret of flattering its tastes, while its truest friends fail in their exertions. Moreover, the people is not only deficient in that soundness of judgment which is necessary to select men real of its confidence, but it has neither the inclination to find them out. It is denied that democratic institutions have a strong tendency to promote the feeling of the human heart; whatever transcends the lower orders appears to be an object of desire, and there is no kind of supererogation ever legitimate it may be, which is not in their sight. In the United States it is not disposed to hate the superior class, but it is not very favourably inclined to them, and it fully excludes them from the exercise of power. While the natural propensities of democracy induce the people to reject the most distinguished citizens as its rulers, these individuals are apt to retire from a political career in obtained his election. M. De Tocqueville points out very clearly that, if you have a Government of the middle classes, you will have a frugal Government, because taxation comes home to them; that an aristocratic Government will be a comparatively extravagant Government, because they do not feel where the shoe pinches; but that in all Governments the most extravagant is a democratic Government, inasmuch as it appears, however erroneously, to a vast number of the masses that the money spent by the State is spent for their advantage, and because the masses form the only power which imposes taxes and which at the same time escapes the payment of them. I have given the House an instance of venality drawn from an American municipality. I now hold in my hand a very curious book given me by a Member of Congress, and called Reports on the Alleged Corruption of Members of Congress. In this book, which is published by authority in Washington, I perceive that in 1857 our Gentlemen were expelled from the House of Representatives for being bribed and corrupted in their capacity as Representatives. I have never heard that in the course of my life any Member has ever been expelled this House upon such charge. But some papers which I have been lately reading have sought to convey an impression that these delinquencies in America are perpetrated not by the real nobility but by the aristocracy of the Southern States. In reply to that, I can only say that, although we have heard the representatives of those States accused of rash and violent demeanour, I never heard an imputation that they were guilty of any act of corruption. The persons expelled the House in 1857 were three members from the State of New York, and another from the State of Connecticut, one of the oldest, the most settled and most populous States in the Union. This state of things tallies again with what M. De Tocqueville says. I quote him because he is universally recognized as an authority in America, and I have also invariably heard him quoted as an apostle of democracy in Europe. He says:—

“In democracies statesmen are poor, and they seek their fortunes to make. The consequence is that in aristocratic States the rulers are rarely accessible to corruption, and have very little craving for money, while the reverse is the case with democratic nations.”

at principle is certainly quite upset if it be true, as the Member for Birmingham asserts, that the great expenditure of this country is intended to provide for the needs of the aristocracy. I have you two other instances. I have heard of certain statesmen in the public printing department. When I was at Washington, I was perhaps excited as much in the question who should be the printer of the President. For I could not understand why we were talking about it; but at last I was informed that it was a great thing to be this printership. The public printer is a professional man, but he is not the printing to a professional amount allowed him is 200,000 which he makes a clear gain. But out of that there are other things. A newspaper—an ordinary one—can be bought and paid. Certain persons can be paid in certain constituencies. Certain individuals who have influence in certain constituencies have also been considered.” So gross and so general is the corruption existing in America that the report of the Committee of Congress that these cases are known and sanctioned by the President of the United States himself. It is on another day, in looking over the list to me by my democratic friend, I found a passage bearing upon The New York Times, which may be one of the most modern and best written papers in America. A Bill for a City railway, said to be worth £200,000, levelled charges of wholesale corruption against the Government concerned in the affair. It is “Most of the American people are different to the proofs of corruption of their representatives. It seems to be granted, and to whatever extent it excites no astonishment, and no indignation.”

I could go on furnishing examples, names, date and proof of the corruption of men in authority in America, and as it were sanctioned by the Government. I have placed them in situations but if I were to mention other names I should also mention the names of those to which it would be ungenerous to allude. I only wish I could call one of our courts to substantiate all I have said on this subject, and that witness the honour of the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Cobden). I now come to the point. How stands the reputation of justice in America? And

ed a somewhat amusing aspect persons, not contented with p nce to payment of rent, cho se themselves as Indians and to arious outrages. They were l put in prison. Great pressur
it to bear upon the Governor Fright, to pardon them; but office was inflexible. At th
n for Governor the test for th
s was "Will you pardon and r nen if you are elected?" The ven—whether the election pro
t ground or no, it is, of cours
is for me to say; but the pledg ed of the successful candida
t, and shortly after his electio
s were liberated. I will now case which happened a few da y arrival in Baltimore in the f this year. A religious meetin held a little distance from th
he river. In the evening, as id attended it were returning ber of men got on board the ste
t all the lights, robbed and illt
n, while the women experien fate. The perpetrators of thes were all well known; they we ly" population of Baltimore
nfluent electors of the city.

who tried the offenders, a
, owed his election to these ide
s. When the case was brought m the offences were proved, an rs clearly identified; and he im
hem fines of fifty cents, or 2
while he read the captain a r a severe lesson for allowin to break into his vessel. Oth enders who were caught in the l were tried before Judges who
sted by the same class of c experienced a different fate
were sentenced to three years
nent; but the Baltimore Judge to punish. He could not afford on those persons who direct sm of Baltimore, of which row
the notorious representative,
ar similar instances quoted in s
State where the Judges are el versal suffrage. I may be told tements I have made are mer
and histories; but here is Ame ty, and moreover official auth
llowing is the first presentme
and jury of the city and coun
ork, in October, 1859:—

grand inquest in and for the cit

many of New York do not feel justified in closing their labours without presenting as a grave evil, and one calling for the earliest correcting, a practice too generally prevailing in our lower tribunals of criminal jurisprudence. After wasting as much time as the grand inquest could devote to the examination of the police records, identifications of irresistible character had been furnished to show that, after the police has faithfully discharged its duty in detecting and arresting the offenders, their laudable labours and assiduity have been 'waste labour' by the proceedings thereon by police justices and aldermen, without any formal trial. In many (far too many) cases the evildoer after detection and arrest by the police has, without justifiable cause, been discharged and permitted to go at large by these functionaries, and numerous cases exist showing a peculiarity that furnishes strong ground for suspicion that justice to the community is blinded, however near-sighted it may be to some other interest which does not as clearly appear on record. A grave evil exists here of infinitely more interest and of more practical importance to this community than a casual view of it would furnish, and while an active interest is kept awake as to who will be President or who shall be Governor, a far sicker matter is ignored or overlooked which comes nearer home to the pockets and security of the community. By the present lamentable system of the ballot-box to decide who shall fill offices for judiciary purposes, we trace the evil we now complain of and present as an evil. When the ballot-box is an index of national choice, or the voice of a large portion of our people, the cost of evil of a bad choice is measurably met and felt by a large constituency; but, when the same system is applied to small communities, such as wards in a city like ours, it may be in some cases of most serious consequences, for in some cases the evildoers may by combined efforts elect their own judiciary, and this judiciary in turn, by extraordinary lenity, reward the electors, and thus in our midst is created and sustained a combination of reciprocal elements of the most dangerous character, and which, if not timely checked, will soon sit at nought all power to arrest the progress of time."

That presentment shows distinctly the existence of the evil which I have described. Some hon. Gentlemen by their out-door speeches seem to suppose that we have not got enough social liberty at home, and that we must go to the United States to look for it under democratic institutions; but I am confident it will be universally acknowledged by every man who has travelled through the United States that there is a despotism of public opinion there more binding, more prevalent, and more tremendous when aroused than ever was the despotism of one man. Let any one, for instance, go "down South," and venture in conversation to disapprove of "the domestic institution," even in the mildest terms; or let any clergyman in the South set up and condemn practices connected with that domestic institution, which the most enlightened Southern Americans scruple themselves in private conversation to condemn, and you know what will be the consequences. Would anybody believe the tyranny of opinion was exercised to an extent in America that books, papers, and other publications were allowed to pass into a State if they contained anything contrary to the popular trines held by the great mass of the people? Will you believe that at this moment a newspaper or publication can pass into Virginia "down South" without being stopped by the local postmasters; and not only the postmasters may and do constitute themselves censors of what is published, but are justified in the exercise of that extraordinary faculty? Will the Postmaster General himself? I hold in my hand a correspondence which will state the state of affairs in that respect. The following letter is addressed by the postmaster of Lynchburg, Virginia, to Mr. Horace Greeley, Editor of The New York Tribune, under date of the 2nd of December, and is as follows:—

"Mr. Horace Greeley.—Sir,—I herewith inform you that I shall not, in future, deliver to you the copies of The Tribune which you order, because I believe them to be of that character which are forbidden circulation by the laws of the land and a proper regard to the safety of society. You will, therefore, discontinue them. Respectfully,

"R. H. GLASS, P.

To that missive Mr. Horace Greeley replied, after his usual characteristic amusing manner, in these terms:—

"Mr. Postmaster of Lynchburg, Va. I take leave to assure you that I shall do nothing of the sort. The subscribers to The Tribune at Lynchburg have paid for their papers; they have taken their money, and shall fairly and lawfully receive it, according to contract. If they direct their papers to some other post office, I shall obey the request; otherwise, we shall deliver them as originally ordered. If you or your clerks choose to steal or destroy them, that is your affair—at all events, not ours; and if there is any law in Virginia to punish the larceny, let the law be enforced for her and our plundered subscribers. If the Federal Administration, whereof you are the tool, after monopolizing the business of carrying, sees fit to become the accomplished patron of mail robbery, I suppose the outrage may be borne until more honest and less servile men can be put into high places at Washington, when the people can recover their natural right to each other's letters and printed matter, and the odds of the Government. Go ahead in your base way; I shall stand steadfast for humanity and the protection of all natural rights.

"Yours, stiffly,

"HORACE GREELEY

"New York, December 9, 1859."

Now, I ask, what would have been

[Sixth Nig

land if, some years ago, when asked to appear in The Times, with great severity, of Irish landlords, priests, and Irishmen, and Irish in general, the postmaster of some in Ireland had written to the proprietor of that journal, and desired him to continue sending his paper there, in as it disseminated doctrines of treason on his own authority pronounced to be "an incendiary character, forbidden by the laws of the land and a proper for the safety of society?" Yet that it would be a perfectly fair exemplification of the state of things recognized in America. Now, M. de Tocqueville I must quote again, says:—

"The principles of equality I very clearly see two tendencies—the one leading the mind of man to untried thoughts, the other inhibiting him from thinking at all. Therefore I cannot repeat it too often—there is an interdict for profound reflection for those who regard freedom as a holy thing, and who hate not despotism but despotism. For myself, when the hand of power lies heavily on my brow, I have but little to know who oppresses me, and I am the more disposed to fall beneath the yoke which it is held out to me by the arms of a million."

In my general résumé I shall read only one more. It is not, however, from M. de Tocqueville, nor from any other foreigner; but it is one which corroborates the statement I have made, that the changes that have taken place in the democratic system of government in America have not been for the honour or welfare of the country. The authority I shall quote is Judge Pierrepont, a living witness, and a prominent man in New York, who, at a meeting of the Bar of that city, held on the 1st of December last, to commemorate the death of one of the most distinguished American lawyers, said—referring to the progress of democracy in the United States:—

"Twenty-five years ago, De Tocqueville passed through this country, and he wrote a book upon democracy. He passed from one end of this land to the other, and he records that he found no matter how many faults he saw in this government he found nobody to complain of them—nobody wished them changed—that all were content with their government, even with its defects. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if he or any other philosopher shall come through this land to-day, will he leave it as it is? I ask you, if you do not find in this day the rich dissatisfied that they are oppressed by the ignorant and poor?—the poor dissatisfied that they are not rich?—those who are in office dissatisfied that they are not in office, seeking and seeking for it?—those who are in office dissatisfied that they cannot plunder more than they do. I ask if you do not find the North dissatisfied with their federal relations to the South, the South dissatisfied with all her relations to the North?—if you do not find in this land universal general discontent and rising passions, and even some States to arms?—that free citizens cannot pass without being arrested, their business inquired into, and their progress stayed? I ask you, Mr. Chairman, say that this means nothing. I ask those of you whom we have elevated above the plane of intellect and above the common level, and who are gifted with a keen vision which can look into the future, if in the distant horizon of this land you see dawning a clear day, or if you see it filled with portents of thick clouds and dangers which are to come?"

Mr. Gregory

Judge Pierrepont is a bold man, but not a true man. Twenty-five years ago M. de Tocqueville saw the democracy of America in a brave and goodly garb; but if he had been permitted to revisit that country, what would he have said now; or how much would he have unsaid? Judge Pierrepont would say that Washington and Hamilton would have said, even if they had seen democracy, M. de Tocqueville witnessed it. Twenty-five years are a short period in the life of a nation, but a long interval in the life of a man. And remember that Macaulay speaks of the rapidity of these democratic changes. These things have occurred in America in spite of every circumstance that you can imagine calculated to promote the growth of the conservative element in that Commonwealth—where every man of character and industry has the power of acquiring land and of having a stake in the country. And if, in spite of this conservative element, and of an extent of education unknown in England; if, in spite of the individuality, self-reliance, and independence of the American character, these things have occurred—if they have occurred in a "green tree," what will be done in a "dry tree?" What will be the case in an old artificial state of society, among millions of men cooped up together in your cities, of industry, unable from the small size of the island to obtain land; who are dependent on wages, subject to the fluctuations and depressions of trade, whose bodies are "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" by your laws of irremovability and settlement, as their minds are by the division of labour? I can only dread the prospect. A year ago I should have made the speech I have made to-night, because a year ago I had not arrived at these convictions from the experience I have since had; but I should have been unworthy a seat in this House if, having arrived at these convictions, I should have remained silent from any fear of consequences.

ult of these convictions comes to at by democratising your institution you do not get "a better article" men, you do not secure economy enrichment, you do not improve purity, you do not maintain unthe fountain of justice, you may licence but certainly not liberty. the House, and more especially the turers of England, that political are now showing themselves on ace of society, which, if this Bill o a law as it now stands, will spring over them with a deadly shade. I em, from the language of the right tleman the Member for the Uni- of Oxford, that there are great s of taxation still to be decided, t to leave the future fiscal condi- the country unsettled, in order that presented masses, as he calls them, tax paying classes as I call them, ide on the future mode of raising nue of the State: I therefore think at to take care that those who are e arbiters of taxation should be as sible persons of intelligence and or. I can only say that, so far s concerned, I am in no way ad- reform. I should be glad to see ing men represented in this House, I believe that it would be infinitely r them and for us that they should eir own advocates, and that their estions should be argued by them- this House instead of out of doors. ee the difficulty which the hon. ed Gentleman who last spoke has red to provide for, of securing an e of intelligence and property for eased numbers you propose to en- e, though I trust that may be done manner when we go into Commit- e regards myself, I object to the ause its inevitable tendency is to ate fresh changes, and that forth- d to create dissatisfaction instead tisfy. I would infinitely prefer to eased disfranchisement of boroughs igher scale of franchise than dispro- rendered still more disproportion- ical, and intolerable. I do not wish constituted as they will be under l, huge unwieldy constituencies, to ed over, as in America, to the man- t of caucuses, combinations, and ions, which are themselves swayed ected by a few political intriguers. I ish to see, as in America, men of e driven into private life. I do not wish to see talent, eloquence, and adminis- trative ability set aside to make way for mediocrities. I do not wish to see forced from the helm of public affairs men to whose superiority you can look up without envy and without cavil, whose lofty position places them above the suspicion of aught that is mean and sordid. As England's statesmen have been great so has Eng- and's history been famous; and rely on it the time is not far off, but is even now at hand, when the destinies of English and European liberty will have to be decided not by average capacities, but by Eng- land's greatest men.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that if his object had been to make a speech which would go forth to the country with any effect, he must confess that that object must be disappointed when he rose to address them after the great speech to which they had just listened. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway had strikingly portrayed the state of society as it existed on the other side of the Atlantic under a system such as that to which they would themselves approach if this Bill became law. He had shown the seat of justice polluted, freedom of thought and opinion fettered, and all things bought and sold in the market except virtue. Although the speech of his hon. Friend left nothing to be desired, still it might be useful if the House would permit an Irish Member representing a small constituency which could not possibly be affected by any change in England, to give them his views and opinions of what the result of this measure would be as regarded England and English constituencies. Though, however, he was, as an Irishman unaffected directly by this Bill, yet next to the land of his birth he boasted most of that to which his country was joined, and he was sure that Ireland could not flourish if England decayed; for how could the branches be vigorous if the trunk were falling away? In his opinion if this Bill passed the constituencies in England would be wholly altered, and he believed in the most destructive manner. Two hon. Members on the other side of the House, one an Irishman and the other a Scotchman, had had the courage to speak of what would be the effect of letting in the working classes to the constituencies in such large numbers. He had not failed to observe the civility with which Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House had spoken of the classes that were to be enfranchised under the Bill; and that flattery

[Sixth Night.

that these £6 voters were pos-
education or self-command suffienable them to exercise the fran-properly? He thought not. As to the noble Lord opposite had as-
at education had advanced since ng of the Reform Bill—connecting matters together as cause and though it appeared to him (Mr.
l) that the connection between the
on a parallel with the old asser-
'enterden steeples being the cause
Goodwin Sands. In the Educa-report of 1851 it was stated that all education rapidly advanced,
ougham being the zealous cham-
the cause of popular education ;
of the population attending the ools in 1818, 1 in 24 the Sunday Fifteen years elapsed, and the ee in day schools had doubled, that
y schools had increased four-fold.
ulation between 1818 and 1833
ased nearly 24 per cent ; but durame period the attendance in day
ad increased 89, that in Sunday 225 per cent. It was idle, then,
at education was caused by the Bill, for in truth it had not inince then in the same degree as
The Report of the Registrar-
on the subject of Marriages conome curious information on this it showed the large number of women in this country who were of the first elements of education ;
as significant to find that in the manufacturing districts ignorance
t dense. In Bedfordshire 51 woof 100 did not sign the marriage in Staffordshire, 45 in 100 ; in
, 50 ; in Lancashire still deeper prevailed, for the women who te were only 44 in 100. The men were even more ignorant. There a no ground for saying that the
a of the franchise was justified by ard of education among the work-
es. There was also painful evi-at the parties to whom it was now
e entrust the vast power of partici-
n the legislation of the country
erly incapable of governing them-Murders and manslaughter pre-the towns; and in the town which e Lord proposed to enfranchise
ers were committed in the year
Of the whole crime of the country
ont was attributable to the work-es ; and of that 76 per cent 22

per cent was furnished by the artisans and skilled labourers. And it was to these the franchise was proposed to be extended—the very class, too, which proved so ungovernable in their passions that the Legislature had to pass a law to restrain their brutality. In 1858 there was an increase in the number of cases of manslaughter. Offences against the person had been gradually increasing. So also cases of malicious wounding. In Liverpool there had been committed 5,012 offences; in Manchester, 6,091; in Birmingham, 2,669 in Leeds, 1,053. Now, were these crimes committed by those who possessed the franchise? Were they not rather committed by those to whom the political power was about to be transferred from those who now held it? Then, as to the state of the country with regard to religion. Mr. Horace Mann, in his valuable Report, dwelt on the influence of religion in promoting the morality, and social order and quietness of the country.

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present. House counted, and Forty Members being found present—

Mr. LONGFIELD proceeded. If the House had been counted out he would have regretted it. He frankly admitted that such a result would have been a sorry compliment to himself, but it would have been a tribute to the good sense of the House. In his remarks on religion he did not in the slightest degree wish to excite religious animosity, nor was he disposed to make national or sectional reflections. He admitted the value of English education and religion. He was not going to quote from an American work; he was not appealing to hostile authority. He took an English authority on which all would place reliance. A Committee had been appointed in another House, and before Mr. Mann was examined. He said there was a population in 73 towns possessing the franchise amounting to 6,000,000. He (Mr. Longfield) would not give the numbers belonging to the different sects. He would consider Dissenters, Roman Catholics, and English Protestants as alike worthy to be entrusted with the franchise. Well, 4 per cent of the 6,000,000 of these 73 towns belonged to no religious persuasion. The Church and the Dissenters took each of the highest and the lowest classes; but the intermediate class, forming 75 per cent of the whole, had no religious opinion whatever: yet it was this class upon whom it was now proposed to confer the fran-

Sieck Nigls.

w and his small constituency, were of the proposed reform, and if the Commons thought otherwise, it be what Bérke had said it ought be the express image of the feelings of n." The House of Commons was n to be a control upon the peo- a control for the people. What oof could there be that the House ontain at present an "express im- e feelings of the people" than the hon. Members so often denied the of any feeling out of doors in f the Bill? He appealed to all who were acquainted with large ncies in seaport or inland towns, there was not a demand for it. that there existed more of that nt in favour of Reform, which hon. seemed to regard as the sole earnestness in the cause arose, in on, from the conviction of the peo- e justness of their cause and their e sincerity of those by whom it espoused. The right hon. Baro- Member for Hertfordshire (Sir Lytton) had said that the wise , the profound lawyer, the able military officer returned to that as each a virtual representative of ing classes. But if they repre- ne working classes, they repre- e landed interests too; and look- ne benches opposite, did they see wise legislators, profound lawyers, commanders? Was there no in- that class of representatives sent constituencies to that House? Was ity of London represented by the rd? and did they suppose that if householders were added to the ey, that he was likely to lose his as not Southwark represented by e most brilliant naval officers of Was not Wolverhampton another constituency, represented by the At- eneral, and was he in danger of racised if the constituency of Wol- on was enlarged? But such argu- re only redug up from the buried the past. What was the position use upon the question? Accord- a. Gentlemen opposite they ought ialate at all. They said Reform called for; it was dangerous; id be menace to the constitution; 6 householders were admitted. s the logical conclusion from all hat they should have no Reform t were hon. Gentlemen forgetful that four times from Her Majesty's pledges of reform had been given, that, not by a Liberal Government mere but hon. Members who had denounced the Bill, who had declared it dangerous to constitution—how could they recon- their conduct now with their conduct two years ago, when they called on Queen to hold out to her loyal people unfettered promise of a change in the representation? That was a matter which t would one day have to explain to their constituents. It was agreed that there sho be Reform; upon what principles, th was the statesman to proceed who sho pen a Reform Bill? There were but t alternatives—either to plan a new i chinery, or to take that which was alre constructed, and by re-adjustment to ad it to altered times, and to the change public opinion. That the noble Lord l done; he sought to adapt the constitut of 1832 to 1860. But hon. Gentlen opposite said that this Bill struck at root of all that was sacred in their estig tion; but he would call attention to authorities for a far wider extension than t proposed by the noble Lord. Such authorities as Hallam, Lord Campbell, a Lord Brougham were in favour of ever wider suffrage than the £6 qualificati. They stated that the right of voting v inherent in the resident householders pi ing scot-and-lot. It was said that the turns of the noble Lord were erroneo but before those returns were obtain others had been obtained by Mr. Smith 1849, and afterwards by Mr. Tite. Te ing the 34 towns to which the returns Mr. Smith referred, a fair average of t effect of a £6 franchise might be arriv at. There had been six estimates; by t first the numbers were 195,495; by t second, 202,516; by the third, 203,71 by the fourth, 192,470; by the fif 208,233; and by the last, 168,000—g ing a mean average of 184,240. It a peared to him that those figures did markably corroborate the results as giv by the noble Lord. But when a Refo Bill was brought in by the Government Lord Derby where were the returns? they had no returns how could they rec- ile with their conduct that they sat do to legislate on a Reform Bill, and yet h no returns on which to base their conc- sions? Either then they had been ne- lectful of their duty in procuring return or else they had such returns as led the to a similar conclusion with the noble Lor gretted very much that the noble Bill was not only exposed to the fire of hon. Members opposite, but masked batteries on that (the Miniside; but in spite of that he believed the Bill would give satisfaction to the country, and would be hailed by the great classes as a great and reasonable measure.

[Sixth Night.

Hon. Members opposite said "Let something like finality;" but it was impossible to produce finality, or to anticipate the requirements of future times. In regard to the question of redistribution, he was not so satisfied with that as the preceding part of the Bill. He believed, however, that when the Bill went into Committee, there would be no difficulty in carrying out the principle of redistribution in a manner more consistent with the wants of the country. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) ten years ago said that any measure of reform unaccompanied by a proper measure of redistribution would have no practical effect. He believed it would be found that a majority of that House was returned by 1-13th, the rest by 12-13ths of the property in the country. He believed upon calculation, which could not be called in question, that a majority of the Members of that House represented a minority of the capital in the country; and, therefore, upon the basis of hon. Gentlemen opposite, he believed that a better redistribution of property was necessary. He for one thanked the noble Lord for the Bill. He believed it would tend to consolidate the Constitution, that the Throne would not be overthrown by it, that the Church would not be destroyed, that the House of Lords would not be abolished, but that the result would be to strengthen the basis of the Church, of the Constitution, and of the House of Lords in the eyes of a confiding people. With regard to attempts made by hon. Members to count out, it might be well to count out once, perhaps twice; but when they counted out a third time, they only showed that they were not Reformers—that they were not as they were—and although they made the Queen pledge herself to resist still that they held to their own ancient prejudices, and that they were equal to the progress and enlightenment of the times. He trusted the noble Lord would find a compact body around him to support the measure should any emergency arise. The Bill might require somewhat shaping in Committee, but in main he believed it was satisfactory

Mr. Digby Seymour

to the country and to a large majority of that House.

MR. KENDALL said, it was not to be charged on Gentlemen at the Conservative side if hon. Members on the Liberal benches rose in succession to speak against the Bill. He had been anxious on a former occasion to protest against an assertion by the hon. Member for Newark as to "the almost singular unanimity" which Members of the Conservative party had displayed in supporting the Reform Bill of last year. He likewise denied that they were now excluded from objecting to a £10 county franchise. Many Members, like himself, had listened in silent sorrow to the discussion of the Bill, but they withheld their remonstrances till they could hope to make them with more effect when the Bill went into Committee: the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), however, by the ingenious course which he had taken in introducing his Resolution, deprived them of any such opportunity of expressing their sentiments, and the result was that a great deal of misapprehension prevailed with respect to the opinions entertained by many Members of the Conservative party in respect to its provisions. So far as his constituency went, without one exception he had never heard any man express a desire for this Bill; and this was the case too, with all other counties of which he had any knowledge. The noble Lord's Member for London was almost the only advocate for the Bill on the other side, his chief argument was that the House should accept this Bill in order to stave off something more disagreeable and dangerous still which might be offered by-and-by if it were rejected. He repeated his simile of the "majestic river and the overwhelming torrent," the river, of course being this Bill, and the torrent possibly the Bill which might be offered in a little while by the hon. Member for Birmingham. At this time the House must be pretty near as tired of any reference to that hon. Member as of the Bill itself; but it was impossible to discuss the Bill without some reference to him. In fact he might almost be called "the Bill, the whole Bill, nothing but the Bill," except for the connection he kept up with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Office. Some time ago the hon. Gentleman's influence was assuming rather an awkward aspect; but he himself had destroyed his power for evil. As long as he continued himself to haranguing the people at

on their grievances, to flattering their power, and exciting them to the acquisition of what he called power. He possessed influence and was not of anxiety; but when he began to play a noble part, to be one man out of a million and another man in it, his occupation was gone. It would not do for any man to bespatter the aristocracy with all the abuse out of the House, to talk of monarchy as a thing merely to be abolished, and in the House to be almost the admirer of the most absolute monarch of these or ancient times. To his influence a man must be content. The hon. Gentleman might still be able to draw large audiences wherever he announced to speak; but it was not his popularity, not anxious sympathy, or his deep feeling, which took them. There was a certain amount of reaction between this Bill and the Church which passed through the House many years back. Some time ago there was a general disposition to make concessions on the church-rate question, in order to get the Bill passed; but when it was found, from what was given in "another place," that the abolition of church rates was merely to be used as a lever to remove Church property on every description, the supporters of the Bill aroused them from their slumber, and the first effort was seen in the House on Friday last. So in regard to the Bill. Most people were ready to give their assents until the hon. Member for Northampton announced authoritatively that if the Bill were passed it would be followed by demands for further reform. Then they began to be anxious to find some way of escape. How that mode of escape presented itself was not very clear at the time.

In the present imperfect state of our knowledge as to the exact effects of this Bill, it is most unsafe to legislate; and, if the Majesty's Ministers must be pretty well satisfied by this time of the inaccuracy of the grounds on which they had proceeded, they would consent to withdraw the Bill.

It was certainly a measure of great danger, but he was bound to say that as regarded its advance on the previous Bill of last year it was a moderate measure. The recollection of the previous Bill was as painful to him as the passage of this Liberal Bill; but his opinion was that, as that was strangled at its second reading, so this would perish at its first.

JOHN RAMSDEN said, he was induced to trespass for a few moments on the attention of the House, because so many hon. Gentlemen in the course of the debate appeared to question the sincerity of Members sitting on the benches behind the Ministers, and had asked how they could justify themselves for allowing their desire to support the Government to outweigh their objections which, it was said, they must feel to the measure under discussion. In answer to that appeal, he would say that if he had any opposition been offered to the second reading, he should have voted in favour of the Bill, because he desired a settlement of the question, and because he thought postponement was to be deprecated. Still he did not feel bound to support the Bill in its present shape, nor did he think himself precluded from taking, at its future stages, the course best calculated to secure the object which he, in common with the great majority of the House, desired to accomplish. Nevertheless, he must confess to some disappointment as to the prospect before them. From the time during which the question had been before the country, and the promise of successive Governments with regard to it, there was good reason to hope that the measure might have been framed on which all parties might have come to something like a general agreement. But the tone of the present debate had gone far to dissipate any such illusion. The speeches made by both sides of the House prevented a unanimous assent accorded to the second reading from being regarded in any other light than as a mere general affirmation of the abstract principle of Reform. He was afraid that the Government must have experienced some disappointment when listening to the speeches of many of their supporters, who might even have thought that some of those who intended to speak most strongly in favour of the Bill had done least to commend it to the approval of the House and of the country. In the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite the House he had been warned of the danger of the transfer of power, and of admitting to a preponderating share in the franchise classes which they thought unfitted to be entrusted with such authority. These arguments, though logical and consistent from a Conservative point of view, were not quite conclusive on the minds of those whose principles were of a more popular character. But when he turned to the speeches of those who spoke most strongly in favour of the Bill, he found that their approval of it rested on very

{ Sixth Night

instan
ad ob ich the inst t ainet t
and th
ry m
l as t
t to it
nce.
oth si gardin
r than ad be he of quate econoc quies susce regar rospe
al wit
; Hou
e sub Pr
l be es ha t unv
of al
Parli
possi
, they factor uld n
so an ges
to, or ntly c desir
ated
depre
e to d tha satisf pret
l red re ev ntry l culty
m in
To sa
only chea

al and mischievous manner by passing measure which, while it unsettled much, would settle nothing. And, therefore, while was ready to sit there as long as the Government might call upon them to do so for the proper performance of the duty to which they were pledged, he trusted that the House would not entertain the idea of chasing relief from present embarrassments by passing any temporary Bill, which being delusive in its character, must be creditable to Parliament, irritating to the public, and to the last degree dangerous to the national interest.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, there is so much sense and so much justice in the observations of the hon. Baronet that I would willingly abstain from making any comments on the present Bill, relying upon the reasons which he has urged for the course which he thinks advisable; but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire most properly reminded us, it is desirable to have a discussion on the second reading, even though we are assured that the second reading should pass, in order that when we get into Committee we may be ever do get into Committee—we may be prepared to consider all the provisions and details of this Bill with our way more or less cleared by the result of that discussion. My right hon. Friend said, at the commencement of this debate, which is back, I am sorry to say, a period of nearly two months, that there were three objects contemplated by the Government in the present measure, and to those objects, with the permission of the House, I will endeavour strictly to confine myself. The first is the large reduction of the borough franchise; the second I will not call a reduction, for I believe it may be more properly defined to be an extensive alteration in the county constituencies; and the third is a partial redistribution of seats. Now, first as to the borough franchise. The noble Lord the Member for London, may be described as the parent of this Bill. He told us the principles on which he is going to proceed. He said that the principles on which the measure is based are principles known to the Constitution, that it may be regarded as a supplement or continuation of the Reform Act of 1832. Now, I take the principles of the Constitution for my guide, and I will join with the noble Lord as to whether the Bill is or are not the principles contained in the Bill. Look, for instance, at the borough franchise. I say that the noble

Lord has there departed from the policy which he advocated not ten years within these walls. In a debate on the late Mr. Hume's Motion he told us the policy which ought to be pursued in extending the borough franchise with the introduction of variety into that franchise. But where is the variety here? The noble Lord said that by the Reform Act of 1832, the old franchises being about one uniform franchise, a £10 standard was introduced; that Lord Grey's Government, by limiting the franchise to that uniform standard, did not make it sufficiently various; and that, therefore, the present measure is not sufficiently comprehensive. Well, coming from the debate, I think we have agreed that variety of the franchise is the only way by which you can qualify the extension of the franchise in a downward direction. And what has Government done on this question? The noble Lord's Bill of 1852, his subsequent Bill of 1854, the Bill of 1859, even of those measures professed and intended to introduce variety of franchises. Some of them made deposits in the savings banks a means of rewarding, and of very properly rewarding, those who by their frugality and industry showed that they deserved to enjoy electoral privileges. Other Bills gave personal property more or less on a footing with real property, by giving the franchise to those who have invested their property in the Funds as well as in land. Others, again, most properly—and I hope no measure will pass without such a provision—insisted on taxation coupled with the franchise, and gave it to those who contributed either to the assessed taxes or to the property tax. Then, again, we had University graduates possessing a species of additional franchise. And last year there was a provision which, with proper safeguards, would introduce large numbers with the electoral pale—I mean the lodger franchise. But the noble Lord is now doing the very policy which he has recommended. My right hon. Friend (Disraeli) remarked that you are giving the franchise to large numbers who are taking no guarantee for the fitness of the elector to exercise that franchise. The noble Lord says that the principles which he has adopted in his Bill are known to the Constitution. I will presently show that he is acting on principles diametrically opposed to the Constitution. Meanwhile, however, let me say one and he has not necessarily a permanence in the county. He does not contribute to the county rates, he is not connected with the county interests, he has no sympathy with them or with the county constituency. The two are essentially different. You have in the rural district much less stirring and more devoted principally to the soil. In the towns, you have a population much more active, engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and in the various duties incident to professions and professions. The two are distinct, and if you mix an urban class, so as to mix with the rural class, you alter the whole character of the constituency. It may be said, what harm will be done? My answer would depend on upon the nature of the change; secondly, upon the effect which the new element will have on the constituency; and, thirdly, upon the effect which the new element will have on the constituency members whom that constituency have already shown you will be entirely different. The only reason of the Constitution the franchise was merely confined to a man who had a freehold was, that a freehold was the only known property which made a change in 1832.

The franchise to the copyholder for a long time was two persons who, in the end, acquired a right of property which they did not possess before. This was still maintained in 1832 as the basis of the franchise. A £50 occupier must now be of considerable property in the county. But the copyholders, and what will be the effect of putting a £10 householder with no value belonging to him by cases over and above upon a level with the freeholder who has a life-long interest in a £10 copyholder who rests in the land, with a lease for a long term of years, and is bound by the condition of the lease that value over and above the charges. Can any- one of the new constitution be that of the present? But what will be the extent of the change? The noble Lord himself admits that he cannot give us the figures upon which he bases his measure. In that respect, perhaps, I can give him a little help. Your present county constituency contains 500,000 voters. Of these 100,000 are the occupiers of lands or tenements; 400,000 are the owners of property, freeholders, copyholders, or leaseholders. One-fifth, therefore, is an occupation franchise; four-fifths a property franchise. What is the change now proposed? There are 415,000 persons in the possession of tenements which are rated between £10 and £50. You must deduct from these 415,000 such as are already on the register, and you must make an addition for the difference between rental and rateable value. Putting the number after your deduction at 200,000, and adding about 100,000 for the difference between rateable value and rental, your new constituency with an occupation franchise derived from houses will be something like 300,000. The existing constituency is 500,000; if this Bill passes it will be 800,000; but the proportions will be entirely changed. In your present constituency four-fifths are property, and one-fifth occupation; in your new constituency one-half will be property and one-half occupation. It is impossible to say, after this, that the whole nature and character of the county constituency will not be altered by the present measure.

A few words now as to the effect which it will have upon the constituency at large, or rather upon the composition of this House. I am confident that no exaggeration can be proved in the conclusions which I have stated; and to show that there is not, I can, in addition to the facts I have given, produce the testimony of one of the severest and profoundest political thinkers of the day, no friend to a restricted suffrage, but an advocate for universal suffrage if it can only be connected with education and intelligence. The writer I allude to is Mr. Mill. I beg the House will attend to a passage in Mr. Mill's pamphlet on Parliamentary Reform, published about a year and a half ago. Mr. Mill says:—

“Except in the few places where there is still a yeomanry, as in Cumberland, Westmoreland, and in some degree North Yorkshire and Kent, there exists in the agricultural population no class but the farmers intermediate between the landlords and the labourers. A £10 franchise will admit no agricultural labourer, and the farmers and landlords would collectively be far outnumbered by the £10 householders of all the small towns in England. To enable the agricultural population to hold its fair share of the representation under any uniform and extensive suffrage short of universal, it seems absolutely necessary that the town electors should, as a rule, be held as of the county constituencies, and the sole alternative is to form them, or the great bulk of them, into communities by themselves."

[Sixth Night.]

You have them now in such communities; and upon what plea, for what reason, upon what grounds of policy and expediency, with what chance of improving the character of this House, are you by a stroke of the pen going to alter the whole relative value of your constituencies in counties and boroughs? What will be the effect produced upon the composition of this House? We have heard much of a variety of franchises. I agree in the importance of maintaining that variety. A variety of franchise is the only means by which you can obtain a fair representation of all the different interests in this country. But I hold that variety of constituencies is as important as variety of franchises. If you have it not, you will have the Members of this House representing one kind of qualification and one class of the population only. That would be the inevitable result. I think the character of this House is best maintained by having men of all classes the representatives of all interests in it; and I, for one, always regret when any man who is distinguished for his ability, for his industry, or for his attendance in his place, when any man of mark or eminence in any calling is excluded from us, in whatever part of the House he may happen to sit. The character of the House is raised by having different classes of Members in it, and I do not object to see—on the contrary, I am glad to see—that the merchants, the manufacturers, the engineers, the lawyers, the men of business, and the men of leisure, the representatives of the capital, industry, and peculiar mental activity of the different towns of this country are enabled to make their voice heard in this the Great Council of the nation. But believing that this forms an essential part of the character of this House, yet with the greatest respect for the Members who represent towns and boroughs, I must take leave to doubt whether the tone of this House would be raised, whether its deliberations would be better conducted or its decisions be more sound, if we were to exclude all Members, or a great portion of them, who come from the counties. I believe, on the contrary, that by reason of their qualities, by their steady application to business, by the excellence of their judgment, by their sound good common sense, even though they may not take as large a part in our debates as some other Members, they are what the late Mr. Robert Peel in a beautiful speech called "the ballast of the vessel of State," and when you are under pressure and dangers thicken around you, they are the men who steady you and secure for your navigation a safe issue. For these reasons I am as clearly, and decidedly of opinion that the purpose of preserving the character of this House, we ought to maintain the distinction between the county and borough franchise which unfortunately led to a temporary difference between myself and some of my friends near me last year. My opinion, strong then, is as strong now, and I for one can never surrender the principle, wishing, as I do, to see the House represent, as it ought to represent, all classes and all interests in the kingdom. If I am right, let me beg you to persevere for two years, and let this Bill pass. What will be the result of it? You call it a simple measure, and you say that is its recommendation. Simple it is, but that is its fault. It merely makes a reduction of franchise in counties and boroughs. That simple reduction is a lowering of the quality of the representation, it increases the quantity of the franchise. You enlarge its number, but at the same time you deteriorate its character. I have shown that in boroughs you are to dis sever representation from property, and that in counties you will separate representation from property. I ask the House whether property and taxation have not always been the basis upon which the franchise has rested, and whether you are to introduce a new state of things, you will not find—to use the beautiful language addressed to you the other night—that intelligence placed at the mercy of poverty and passion?

Mr. Walpole

I will now advert to my third point, the redistribution of seats. The other day the hon. and learned Member for Devon pointed out various objections to a part of the measure, which showed its utter untenableness. He says that we propose a disfranchising measure on the ground of population, and that we are to sweep away a second measure that have less the where you do this the electors are numerous than in the boroughs untouched. This shows how in your measure in this respect is. Take away the second seat from districts whether you want the seats in those places or not. The consequence you have introduced into your measure—objectionable scheme of giving a Member to several large constituencies—and the consequence will be, that of giving a representative to the place which I suppose is what is intended—you will give the additional Member to the majority alone, whenever there is excitement at a general election. I throw out a suggestion, with respect to this point, I would say that you give a Member to those places that are represented now—that you should give one to those counties that are too large and not adequately represented, and to the Universities in England and Scotland, where the graduates are sufficiently numerous, the Universities in Ireland not now represented, should have the right of returning Members of their own, or to something like I would suggest a re-distribution of seats.

I have now gone through my objections to the different portions of the Bill, and I have expressed myself earnestly with respect to some of its provisions; I have done so in no captious spirit, or from any unnecessary desire to find fault:—my object in taking part in this discussion is to bring the matter before the Committee. I have endeavored to show that you are going on a downward course towards undemocracy; that you are reducing the franchise to so low a level as to include the poor and incapacity, to the practical exclusion of the wealth and intelligence of the country; that you are assimilating the county and borough franchise, not in actual fact, but in its character and quality; that you are taking the untenable course of either wholly disfranchising or partially disfranchising the county, upon if not impracticable grounds. I have shown you, what also has been said by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Macaulay) that in doing this to an extent and in a manner that will leave you no chance of settling this question on a permanent and satisfactory basis; because if you pass the measure in its present form this consequence will follow:—The same justification which you say you have for lowering the county franchise to £6 must carry you down to a lower figure, to £5, or £4, or even £3. The same policy which leads you to abolish the actual distinction between the county and borough franchise will lead to place them on identically the same level as soon as the principle on which that distinction rests is taken away. The same argument, drawn from number, that induces you partially to disfranchise the borough that has a population under 7,000 will aid irresistibly the hon. Member for Birmingham in taking a higher figure for disfranchisement—say 10,000, 20,000 or even 50,000 inhabitants. The same advantages which you expect to derive from adding a third Member to certain towns and counties, or divisions of counties will also aid the hon. Gentleman in his views, and he alone will get the benefit of this measure, for it will enable him to contend that you ought to give to some places four, five, or even six Members. This will entirely alter the character of your representative system. But if this be the measure, what is to be done? We have all of us agreed not to oppose the second reading of this Bill; and we on this side of the House have done so for a reason somewhat different perhaps from that which guides other Members in their concurrence. The reason why we support the second reading of the Bill is that a pledge has been given—given repeatedly and solemnly, not merely by different parties in the House, but given by the Crown—given by this House—and given by the whole Parliament—that we would reopen and reconsider the question of Parliamentary Reform. So solemnly and repeatedly, I say, has the pledge been given, and nothing could be more unwise, in my opinion—nothing could be more unjustifiable than to dally with the question, to hang it up or keep it dangling above our heads, until it becomes a mischievous theme for political agitators, or to palter, as it were, in a double sense with the great expectations that we have raised regarding it. That is the reason why I support the second reading of the Bill—or rather, I ought to say that is the reason why I should have supported it before the Easter recess. But I own since then that circumstances have occurred which seem to me of so startling a character, that I hardly know what to think or what we ought to do. [Laughter.] Do the hon. Gentlemen below the gangway who laugh at that observation see the point of it? What are the circumstances to which I have referred? We have this question satisfactorily will not principles which base the representation upon the lowest, the poorest, most uneducated class—but those which will give to intelligence their proper weight in the nation; which will keep all your institutions in harmony with each other, and will connect representation with property, taxation, with virtue, and with justice. If you act upon those principles when I say you may proceed with confidence; you will then feel that you might settle the question wisely and settle it well. But I do not, yours may be the triumph of a measure which no one approves which cannot last: ours must be the triumph of knowing that by this discussion, by the enforcement of the principles which we have endeavoured to advocate, we have sought but one end, we have had one object, and that is to improve the nation, to amend, and, while we improve, to uphold and maintain that constitution which, say what you will, has been more conducive to real freedom than any which was ever devised by the wit of man for the happiness, the well-being, the good government of a people.

[Sixth Night.]

HANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Whatever may be the difficulties, which beset the course of the House upon the present occasion, I confess I do not attach that serious weight to either of those two circumstances to which my noble Friend (Mr. Walpole) has alluded in terms so grave, and which he has described as so seriously perplexing his mind, as to leave him entirely undetermined what he should think or what he should do. ["Oh, oh!"] I am reminded of the words of my right hon. Friend. One of those circumstances was that, I observed, my noble Friend the Member for the City of London had originally declared his intention to propose a Resolution without prior consultation with his colleagues. That circumstance has not been disposed of by the declaration of my noble Friend, who has stated that it has no existence whatever. But perhaps I may say, Sir, that even if it had not been disposed of it would have borne only slightly upon the present position of this great constitutional question; because what we have to consider is, not the communications of my noble Friend or the proceedings of the Government over which he presided, but it is the public pledges by which that Government committed itself to become bound, it is the vote of the House which preceded that first public pledge, it is the course of subsequent proceedings, to which my right hon. Friend has himself adverted as being so full of meaning and significance. Then, with respect to the second of those circumstances, my right hon. Friend finds great difficulty in the fact that another branch of the Legislature has thought fit, with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government, to institute an examination into the probable numerical effect of the proposed franchises upon the borough constituencies, or upon the constituencies at large. Her Majesty's Government in consenting to that measure upon the express understanding that it should on no account be used to postpone the progress of this Bill, have done what I believe is not without precedent, although I grant that it may be open to argument. That is to say, that they have admitted the anxiety of other persons for inquiry, and a sufficient reason for permitting a particular kind of investigation even where their own minds were satisfied and made up to the course that they should take.

I have said, there may be arguments in one way or that as to that particular step; but all those who are conversant with Parliamentary proceedings know that it is by no means an uncommon measure of deference for the Government to show to a prevailing sentiment in either House of Parliament, and that when the Government assents to the appointment of a Committee upon a particular question it by no means implies the slightest hesitation or the slightest admission on their part of the want of materials necessary to the formation of a conclusive judgment. Therefore, I may confess that I am perplexed by the perplexities of my right hon. Friend. I am the more perplexed at them because I know the immense importance of what he has before urged. He said that apart from these disturbing causes he thought that it was a matter of clear and imperative duty to go forward with this Bill to the Committee, not on the ground that he approved the Bill, or all its provisions—because on that subject he explained himself so that none could mistake him—but upon the ground of the general position which the question had assumed, upon the ground of the pledges that had been given by persons, all parties, all leaders, from the Throne, from the mouth of the Sovereign, echoed back in the Addresses of this House.

[Sixth Night]

Hertfordshire, who stated that the enfranchisement of seats ought to have been carried to a much greater length than the Government have thought expedient. [SULWYER LYTTON intimated dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman said well, then, I transfer the observation to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway (Mr. Massey) and will reply that only another way of saying that the Government ought to have introduced into the House of Commons a Bill which they had no chance of carrying. I admit, in passing, that many of the observations made with respect to the franchises, such as graduates and banks, are perhaps very good; these franchises being novel are very difficult to deal with, and, being embodied in legislative form, would only produce small and insignificant results. I admit you may give a greater elaboration and greater perfection to your work by going to find every description of intellectual and social power that can be introduced with the franchise. But I ask my hon. Friend to make me this admission—that when a question like that of the representation of the people, from a series of unfortunate circumstances, has appeared in this country to be played with and hauled backwards and forwards between Governments and parties for years, instead of being made a subject of serious consideration, the Government is bound to offer not only the most complete and finished details, but also whether the simplicity of those details, they cannot hope for a better reception for the measure, and a greater likelihood of being passed? Now, Sir, it seems supposed by many that there is a charge of treason to the Constitution in introducing a Reform Bill; or, if it be not so, and if that is too harsh a word, my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Massey) appeared to take it for granted to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the representation was to be considered into a condemnation of the existing Parliamentary constitution. I think that the sense in which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) spoke when he said at the close of his speech that my noble Friend (Lord John Russell), having been the parent of the Parliamentary constitution of 1831, and after having applied the knife to its throat, was now engaged in dragging it to its grave. For my own part, I confess that it was in a different spirit and with entirely different views that the Government approached the consideration of this question. It is not because the present system has failed—it is not because its defects are intolerable or grievous—but because the Government believe that the present system, good and excellent as it is, and admirably as it has served the country during the generation it has existed, is susceptible of improvement, and because it has been made the subject of positive pledges and promises to the British nation, that this improvement will be attempted—pledges and promises which they think it the duty of the Government to carry out. It was the practice of the Parliamentary constitution of England to carry forward enfranchisement from time to time. Unfortunately—very unfortunately—that practice ceased in 1688. What was the consequence? The consequence was that, whereas you never had any difficulty before, the cessation of this practice caused the most serious difficulties, and led to the introduction of a sweeping and in some respects a violent measure which had become a necessity of the time, but which in no other country would have been carried without a popular revolution. That was the effect of too long delay, obstinate resistance, of exciting causes which, occurring at a particular moment, made the measure more necessary, and at the same time more dangerous. It is a just matter of imputation upon the Government if, finding these legacies bequeathed to them, they deem it of the highest importance to avoid again placing the Government in a similar position; and if they endeavour to make such a proposition as may give satisfaction to the people, and may dismiss us from these six night's debates upon what is to be the constitution of the House of Parliament, in order that they may address ourselves to the overwhelming mass of public business which has every year to be brought forward in such increasing degree, and of which they find a perpetual fountain head in the vast and almost over-extended Empire of Great Britain. Let us put aside a number of questions which I admit are important in fair, and just in themselves, but which are really questions for Committee. It is a question for the Committee on the law whether amendments shall be made in the law in various respects. I will give one instance or two. The right hon. Gentleman suggested whether the law might be amended with advantage in the case

[Sixth Night.]

compound householders, and whether the principle of the direct and personal payment of local as well as Imperial taxes is or is not a fit condition to couple with the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman is, however, mistaken if he supposes the Bill introduces any new principle in that respect; because, although it is true that the general Act for composition does not touch the existing franchise, yet there are some local Acts which extend to houses of upwards of £10 value, and a multitude of these compound householders are in existence to whom every observation made by the right hon. Gentleman is as applicable as to the compound householders in the present Bill. [Mr. WALPOLE: Not where they pay the lower rate.] But their position in regard to the franchise and their liability are precisely the same. With respect to those novel franchises which have been called "fancy franchises," the Government cannot be supposed to entertain any objection to them upon principle, inasmuch as my noble Friend and a large proportion of the present members of the Cabinet were themselves the men who, six years ago, first proposed those franchises to Parliament. Then, whether the franchise shall be dependent upon simple rental or rating is a question which cannot be closed by the second reading. We shall make much more practical progress upon these questions in Committee than by prolonging discussions in which opinion are expressed this way and that way, but wherein nothing is affirmed or denied on the part of the House of Commons. These questions I put aside, and deal with the one question of principle, which causes the real opposition to this Bill. The real objection taken to the Bill is the £6 franchise—that is the gist of the complaint against the Bill. Every other offence is pardonable, but this offence is unpardonable. My hon. Friend the Member for Galway says that four out of five Gentlemen are full of alarm and horror at this measure, and the ground of that alarm and horror is that a £6 franchise, as we are told, will swamp the constituency by the addition of an overwhelming mass of votes of the lower class—immense in quantity, bad in quality, and able to outweigh and overdo the other classes of the constituency. Is that true, or is it not? And, in the first place, is it altogether just to hold the language that has been held even by my right hon. Friend, although in a less definite form than by others, with respect to the inferior qualities of the working classes? Sir, I do not admit the working man, regarded as an individual, is less worthy of the suffrage than any other class. I do not admit the charge of corruption which my right hon. Friend has made, and which has elicited amid cheers from many of those who are around him, read from the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords. I do not believe that the working men of this country are possessed of a disposition to corrupt their neighbours and exempt themselves: nor do I acknowledge for a moment that schemes of socialism, of communism, of republicanism, or any other ideas which are in variance with the law and constitution of this realm are prevalent and popular among the working classes. I grant you that you might corrupt the working class of this country if you gave it a monopoly of power; but it is not now corrupt, and the question is—would this Bill give it that monopoly of power? I wish to reduce this matter fairly to an issue, because my noble Friend entirely object to the doctrine that you are deteriorating the constituency simply by bringing within it a portion of the working men. I say, if you give the working classes the complete command over the constituency, you may corrupt them; but you cannot make them deserve those invectives which have been so freely and, I think, unjustly lavished upon them. But I repeat, I deny that you deteriorate your constituency merely because you say that a £6 franchise, in place of £10, shall be the limit—that whereas heretofore scarcely any of the working men have enjoyed the franchise under the Reform Act, now a considerable number shall be admitted to enjoy it. And my right hon. Friend, reiterating what was well said by the hon. Member for the West of England (Sir John Ramsden), in which I heartily agree, told us that we shall not perform our duty to the country by merely passing something that we call a Reform Act, but that we must pass something that will give satisfaction, and promise permanence. I promise permanence in that qualified sense in which alone any sensible man, on either side of the House, would venture to apply the epithet to such a subject. But my right hon. Friend allow me to observe that I think it is material, if you really think that it is desirable to get rid of agitation on this question, to bear in mind that the best way to get rid of it is not by rushing forward your measure to the smallest possible limit, but, on the contrary, that you

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

any means of keeping alive and ing that agitation, or even of creating it did not exist. The best course, of policy and prudence, is—avoid-cess and extreme change—at the
when you think it your duty to con-be admission of a portion of the ng class to take care that the por-u do admit is not too small, but such increase the confidence of the work-n in general in the laws by which a governed. Therefore the mere reof the boon you are about to confer ne way to insure permanence—is not
y to promote the application of true
vative principles to the Constitution country. Is it, then, a reasonable or reasonable admission that is proposed Bill? You will tell me that in g of amount, I am speaking of y only, not of quality. I take leave ur to that imputation. I say, if we tified in stating that we deal only e more instructed, intelligent, and dent portion of the working classes land, that we are speaking of, and with, quality as well as with quan-
We assert that the quality of that our working men is good enough to them to a share in the privileges of mentary representation. You want ction from them. [An hon. Mem-re make a remark.] I beg the Lord's pardon. I said nothing of al suffrage. I said no selection is among that portion of the labouring
And I confess, if you are to lay he doctrine of selection, and to be eclectic in the formation of your mentary system, I really do not know your principle would stop in its ent upwards. I am by no means d to admit that the shopkeeper be-£10 and £20 is always a very wise r always a very contented, very int, and very independent man. Nay, and I should not like to say what
e painful to any one, but I think the very much higher annual values £20, by the principle of individual n, you might find indifferent ele-which it would not be desirable to e in your electoral system. Will use bear with me, as this seems to vital point at issue, while I endea-
state the views at which the Go-nt have arrived with respect to the
of change that we are about to I restrict myself entirely to the a of the borough franchise, because

I think, if we can dispose of that, th
no other matter as to which there ne
any great difficulty. ["Oh, oh!"] afraid, Sir, my love of peace has mad too sanguine; but at any rate I hope
if we could settle the borough fran there would be some likelihood of ou ting rid of our other difficulties.
what is the number of persons who w
admitted to the borough franchise i this Bill, if it passes as it stands? W by no means without very good instrum
for arriving at the truth in this case.
much care was taken by the Govern
during the preparation of the measure
before the Session of Parliament, to vide itself with information; and of o
the further scrutiny which the questio undergone in this debate has enabled enlarge our means of obtaining that i mation. And I do not hesitate to say it amounts to what one may fairly ca
not demonstration, yet reasonable cert
that the admission to take place unde
£6 franchise in the town constituenc
this kingdom cannot possibly be more 200,000, and is much more likely t short of 150,000 persons. Let us lo
the elements of the calculation by whic come to this conclusion. You find, i first place, that you have in the boro
and cities of this country 566,000 pe
who are male occupiers of tenements, separately rated for the relief of the
and at a value of £10 and upwards.
then turn to your register, where you that the number of £10 voters is a outside 410,000, but is in reality a what less than that, because undoub that includes some portion of the men and scot-and-lot voters. You l therefore, a gross £10 constituency,
call it, of 566,000 persons, but act
consisting of 410,000. I am stating e thing against myself in these figures.
the number of male occupiers, accordi
the gross estimate, at a rental betwee
and £10 is 272,000. We have thu
tained the three terms of a proporti rule of three sum. And if you take same proportion of the gross constitut
so to call it, below £10 as you have p
to exist above £10, the total increme
the constituency under the present
would be prima facie 197,000 per
That is the first proposition I have to n
I do not say that that is not subject
great deal of discussion and debate,
some correction and modification. ["O
I am sorry my hon. Friend thinks it n

principal voter must go and perform his labour, unless paid for abstaining from labour; therefore, the proper answer to the question is, that as they do not when they are in any claim, except in cases where we may dismiss them from the register, will they claim when below the £10? The allegation was made by the hon. Member for Marylebone that there are a number of holders of separate tenements who are separately rated, but who may claim to be in the rate-book and appear as voters. The answer to that is, that as the tenements are not separately rated, they do not appear. Unless in the limited cases which are called joint tenancies, it is not the use of a separate rating and a separate tenement that any claim should exist. But the grand subject of the Bill and alarm is the allegation that the gross estimated rental is very much less than the real amount paid, and that many persons who do not appear in the register, £6 voters and upwards, for the gross estimated rental, would become voters by the Bill. I am not making this allegation—because, as I said, it is the feeling of the House, that in discussing the probable effect of the Bill on the persons to be admitted to the franchise we are really dealing with the bone and marrow of the Bill. The question, I ask, is this statement true? Is the estimated rental is less than the real value of importance if it is true? In the second place, is it true? Is it important if true, and I say it is important, and I undertake to show, that it is true. First, I say it is not important if it is true, because almost as many persons are taken out of the £6 constituency from appearing to pay less than £10 as are added to the £10, for the very same reason. The number of persons paying rent between £6 and £10 is not exactly the same as the number of persons whose class increases somewhat if you go down. I am glad to see the figures, and that I am not making an assumption—to be sure, I am making an assumption for argument's sake—but I leave you to judge of it for yourselves—I am assuming that the gross estimated rental is 20 per cent below the real amount. I assume that all persons who appear in the register for the gross estimated rental will remain voters. And the consequence is will bring in a gross number of persons to swell the new constituency, but how many have you to take the other end? Because, if a gross rental of £5 really qualifies a person as a £6 voter, then it follows that a gross estimated rental of about £4 establishes a man as a £10 voter. The number of persons between £4 and £10 is no less than 78,000; and, even upon an assumption so wholly favourable to the other side, there is a deficiency in the gross rental, as compared with the actual value of 20 per cent, over the whole difference in the constituency could be a matter of only 30,000 persons, a difference not inconsiderable, especially by no means such as to justify the alarming representations which have been sounded through the country as all out of our propriety. It is said by a right hon. Gentleman, there is an increasing tendency to value, as you go down, from the top to a lower class of houses. But to say that, as far as towns are concerned, there is not a shred of evidence in support of that proposition. I do not enter into questions of valuation in the country, or enter into questions of rating. Why should there be a tendency to estimate a cottage in a town further from its real value, than a house of £100 a year, than which it must be easier to value? The valuation of a cottage or shop of £50 or £100 a year is done by fifty considerations, which are the subject of argument and debate, while the valuation of cottage property in towns is perfectly known, and therefore the fair result is, that it will be rated closer to its real value, and not further from it, than the property of a higher class. As there is any positive evidence supported by the tables, it is entirely in support of the proposition; because the difference between the rateable value and the gross estimated rental, is not only not greater, but is less, in the case of £5 and £6 than in the case of houses above £6. There is a difference in the case of £9 and £10 of no less than 10 per cent; whereas, in the case of £5 and £6, the difference is only between 3 and 4 per cent. I have been able to obtain conclusive evidence, which will soon be in possession of the House, to show there is no truth in the allegation I am now dealing with.

Very recently my right hon.

Friend, the President of the Poor Law Board, has addressed to all the 1,600 parishes, which constitute the Parliamentary cities and boroughs of the country, inquiries to the following effect:—Does the gross estimated rental in the paper laid before Parliament correspond with the real rental, or does it not? If it does not, does it exceed or fall short? And, if it exceeds or falls short, what is the percentage of excess or deficiency? These questions have been sent to the overseers of the parishes who are conversant with the actual rating and the local circumstances, and will therefore supply the best information to be had. I beg the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the result, as far as it has been ascertained. The number of parishes from which returns have as yet been received, is 1,300. Some of the returns are not quite clear; but 900 of them have been examined and regularly tabulated. These 900 returns embrace 377,000 male occupiers out of the 566,000 that form the total; and represent, therefore, two-thirds of the whole cities and boroughs returning Members to Parliament. Out of those 900 parishes 708 have returned as answer, that the gross estimated rental is equal to the real rental or clear annual value; and these 708 represent about 89½ per cent of the whole male occupiers represented by the 900 parishes. The answers from the remaining 192 parishes, show that the rating is closer in the larger than the smaller parishes; for they reply that the gross estimated rental falls short of the real annual value. The percentage of male occupiers is 10½, or a little more than a tenth; and the percentage by which the gross estimated rental falls short of the real amount, is, I think, 18 per cent. If you make allowance for that 18 per cent of deficiency upon the whole of these 900 parishes, the prima facie result is, that you have to add to the constituency, in respect of the whole of this supposed deficiency of the gross estimated rental, 8,600 persons. But 8,600 is the number added from householders below £6 actual rental; you must, therefore, deduct the number subtracted from above. ["Oh, oh!"] This is a matter of arithmetic and not of argument. By that simple rule, and making the proper proportionate deductions from above—namely, of those who appear on the £10 list already, which is 6,200—the whole addition to be made, if we may take these 900 parishes as a specimen of the whole—and I believe they are, for the returns have been taken alphabetically—the whole

[Sixth Night.]

He said, you are going to give a share to the labouring classes." "The lion's share? Take the case of this statement—I venture to say the best, most comprehensive and evidence that can be laid before you, or is attainable on this subject, require to detain the House long enough to show how infinitely preferable the results are to partial cases got up for the purpose of suggesting rather than supporting an argument, which represent extended cases rather than what does not. Are the working classes the lion's share? What is the constituency of the country? It has already got a borough constituency of 10,000; you are going to add to it at the most extravagant estimate 660,000. You have a county constituency of 530,000. If you add about 150,000, making 680,000. Adding the Universities, the constituency of England is 680,000. That number will be very diminished, on account, of course, of the loss of votes. I cannot estimate the total number by not less than 680,000, and the general result would be to popularize your representation of a country with a population of 20,000,000, and with 5,000,000 adult males would have a constituency of 680,000 or 1,200,000. Surely, a system which enfranchises one-fourth part of the adult males, and selects that one-fourth, upon the whole, with great care and discretion, is not a very unreasonable system. And how will that system affect the labouring classes? In the county of Devonshire, for example, came in only here and there a few casual possession of the 40s. but these cases are extremely rare, that we may put them aside. In the working classes the lion's share of the borough constituency? You have a total borough and town constituency of what I think the most liberal estimate in virtue of the present Bill, of 650,000. It is estimated that of 450,000 which now forms the entire borough constituency, one-ninth belongs to the labouring classes, whether as freemen or scot-and-lot holders here and there £10 occupiers. They are about 50,000, and perhaps they would be about three-fourths of the total.

CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

the 200,000 which, on an extravagant supposition, may be added to the constituency. The labouring classes might be 200,000 in a borough constituency of 650,000—that is, they would be less than one-third of the whole borough constituency, and that only in about one-half of the boroughs or about one-third part of the seats returning Members for England and Wales would amount to such numbers as to act with any sensible or appreciable force. Now, Sir, is that "the lion's share," and does that justify the appeals which have been made, and the lecture we have received to-night on American institutions? I will say a word or two in comment on the speech of my hon. Friend. I would remark that if we lived in a state of things in which there was a latent unavowed Americanism among the people of this country, if a wise observer had remarked that there was a contagion spreading from rank to rank, and that John Bull was growing more and more desirous to ape the manners and adopt the institutions of his Brother Jonathan, I think my hon. Friend would have done good service in detailing for an hour and a half the vices and follies and weaknesses which no doubt may be detected in the social condition of America. But do we live in that state of things? Have the people of England been infected by that disease? Are we likely to hear America held up to us as a pattern? [Opposition cheers.] I think I understand that cheer. It is not difficult to construe. The meaning of it may be that perhaps the solitary voice of some Gentleman who goes far in his opinions and maintains them with great courage may express strong sympathy with American institutions. But I do not speak of solitary individuals; I speak of the prevailing tone and temper of the British nation, and I say that to describe to us the state of things which exists in America as an argument bearing on the discussion of this Bill is a matter fetched from far, and wholly irrelevant. [Cheers.] I must tell those hon. Gentlemen who cheer, with great respect, that in my opinion by their cheers they do injustice to this country. Differing from Gentlemen, if there be those who would hold out America as a pattern, I frankly own that it will be a miserable day for England when she thinks fit to adopt America as her example, and that it is England who has much to teach to America and little to learn from her. Those are not only my opinions, but they are the opinions of at least ninety-nine men out of every

Y

[Sixth Night.]

g them a more liberal and sensible n. I cannot help recollecting—and it now certainly for no other purcept recognizing the wisdom of it not help recollecting the early deof the right hon. Member for¹ Hampshire on the subject of Parlia-Reform, since the question was n 1851. I think when that sub-mentioned in this House, before² taken its present advanced position, t hon. Gentleman, declining to himself to the assertion that the come for a further reform of the³ station, said he felt convinced that e time did come they would have⁴ with the question of the admission orking classes. That was a wise⁵ esmanlike declaration, and acting pirit with truthfulness, and at the⁶ e with moderation, Her Majesty's ent have been guided in all their⁷ rs. Under these circumstances, —although it may be my bias—I⁸ that we might have contrived to door for the settlement of these⁹ in Committee with less than six previous debate. To those who¹⁰ at the essential character of this o swamp the constituencies I am¹¹ addressing any invitation to go mittee at all. I am perfectly at¹² understand how any Gentleman ready to endorse that declaration¹³ ncile it to himself to refrain from g his opinion in a legitimate man-¹⁴ doubt, there are very good reasons, e they are entirely inscrutable. I¹⁵ listen without a smile to the hon.
 an the Member for Radnorshire¹⁶ (Valsh), well known not only in this ut as an able writer on the politics¹⁷ ountry, who, in the same speech, e was the man who moved the re-¹⁸ f the Reform Bill in 1831, and he n that act as the brightest act of¹⁹ and then said he gloried that on he should not have to vote at all.²⁰ e that I do not think that is a f conduct which will be quite un-²¹ out of doors. I think the idea of n is that this House is not a "Dis-²² Forum," but a deliberative as-and that the appropriate mode of²³ g opinions is by votes. Of course y be exceptions, but this is a sin-²⁴ ception, unsupported by experit has been said that the same²⁵ as been pursued on both sides of
 se. Permit me to say that is not exactly the case. The noble Lord has been taunted with having only one supporter. I think if he were to count on his fingers he could make a considerable addition. At the same time I frankly allow that the Bil

 has been freely criticised on this side o
 the House. But I have heard it criticised on this side in a manner different from the manner in which it has been criticised in general on the opposite side; because the criticisms here have been frank indications of what are deemed the faults of the Bil
 —declarations like that of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Sir John Rams-den) to-night, accompanied with a strong opinion that the Bill ought to go forward to Committee, and be discussed and considered with the hope of a practical solution. But that is not the doctrine which comes recommended from the other side o
 the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire recommended that the noble Lord should withdraw the Bill. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire, whose good faith in giving us the advice no one can doubt, also recommended us to withdraw the Bill. The course which those right hon. Gentlemen ask us to take, however, is one which it is impossible for the Government to adopt. I may at all events venture to say for myself, that in my opinion any Ministry which should have introduced a measure
 such as this with so little caution, and in a shape so unfitted to undergo discussion as to render it expedient that it should be withdrawn without the decision of the House being taken upon it, would, in so acting, have covered itself with irretrievable disgrace. I may add that no such idea, or intention, or dream, as the adoption of such a course presupposes has ever entered our heads. If, however, the right
 hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks are anxious that the Bill should be put out of the way, the remedy rests with themselves, for the House of Commons is not, I feel assured, so much the servant of the Government as not to take the matter into its own hands, and to reject the Bill if it deems it expedient to do so. I do not, however, think the House of Commons is prepared to pursue that course—a course which I should not presume to censure—and I ask you then with confidence whether it is creditable to act upon a policy the object of which is to make legislation impossible by delay? Such a policy is one which must operate badly for

ted, took advantage of that circumstance for the purpose of evading that which they did not like manfully to reject. Therefore, that whatever course was taken such a policy as this will not be taken. By all means, then, let us go to the Committee on the Bill, and endeavour to make such progress in passing it as is commensurate to the value of the time at our disposal, which I fear we have not much of. I make this appeal to you that the House will bear in mind all the difficulties and risks which we have to encounter in dealing with this great and vital question there is none greater than that which would arise from our hesitating to dally with it; thereby rendering ourselves liable to have an interpretation put upon our conduct which may be dangerous to the permanent institution of the country, destroy our own capacity of effecting good, and impair that confidence and attachment which during long generations the House of Commons has earned by its labours and services earned at the hands of the English people.

COLLINS said, he must protest against the language used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer charging those on the Opposition side of the House with obstructing the progress of business. The hon. Gentleman surely could not have taken his place when his Friend the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Mills) remarked that a much larger number of Gentlemen came from the Ministerial side than from the Opposition, to speak upon this question. He did not help adding, in reply to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman, that in passing a proposal which sought to extend the suffrage without any counterbalancing the working classes he thought it was more manly to come to the question to correct the extension of the suffrage than to object to the extension of the suffrage. He would not vouch for the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's statistics. He would not vouch for the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's statistics. He would not vouch for the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's statistics. It was in the Report that had been published, that there were 185 English boroughs, and out of those there were 100 which were more voters than electors. From that list he deducted 33 boroughs in which the increase was caused by the scot-and-lot voters. He would quote 52 boroughs where the proportion of electors was greater than the proportion of 10 houses. He should quote Oldham had 2,050 voters and only 1,900 houses; Ashton, 1,900 electors and 838 houses; Boston, 838 electors and 697 houses; Lancaster, deducting the freemen, had 887 electors and 887 houses. It would be seen from these figures, that in a considerable number of boroughs there was a larger proportion of electors than of 10 houses. He thought, therefore, that when the matter came to be tested by the evidence which was to be obtained by the House of Lords there would be a much larger extension of the franchise than was supposed. He was quite prepared to go a long way in extending the suffrage, and he believed that the gross injustice of this Bill was more in the way in which it treated county representation than the manner in which it widened the borough franchise. He would mention an instance of the manner in which the county representation was dealt with. The West Riding of Yorkshire returned 16 Members to this House—two for the county and 14 for the boroughs. Throwing aside the small borough of Ripon and Knaresborough, which returned two Conservatives, and two Liberals; Leeds, which was equally divided; and Wakefield, the seat for which was vacant; and there were nine Liberal Members returned by Halifax, Bradford, Huddersfield, Sheffield, and Pontefract, whole of whose constituencies, even if a member of those constituent bodies were on the same side of politics, the reverse of what was notoriously the fact, amounted to 14,000, whilst the Conservative minority in the West Riding, consisting of 13 electors, had no representative at all. He held, therefore, that the Bill did not alter the representation, but rather aggravated considerably the inequality already existing, which it should have been the duty of Ministers to endeavour to correct. There was another way in which it was proposed to deal with the county representation most unfairly. It was this; this for the first time, makes occupation an ingredient in the county suffrage. You franchise 400,000 occupiers, but let them vote already in right of owner and therefore, under your scheme, would be doubly qualified. An occupier in a borough having also a 40s. franchise would have four votes—two for the county and two for the borough; whereas those who were similarly qualified beyond the limits of a borough, would only have the right of voting for two Members for the county. But the Bill was objectionable not ed -

[Sixth Night

erie
he Cor
y ne
£
ed,
dou
d e
to n
th
'as free to t Li sfr
is t que
r fi
me rid wa
e.
red pati sea

l re ood
ega er s o
d on t to go
Be
err
itsu
pr
ida

Jun

ES
th irpe
he

go
l
Re

ed t mt plish ig c

a q
is o

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 4, 1860.

Sat First in Parliament.—The Earl of Clareland.

Oath.—The Lord Carrington.

Bills.—1st Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act Amendment.

Brokers Act Amendment.

DUK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

CONFERENCE.

ence had, at the Desire of the
upon the Subject Matter of an
to be presented to Her Majesty, Provisions of the Act 15th and
t. cap. 57; and Report made, Commons had agreed to the foladdress, to be presented to Her to which they desire the Con-
of their Lordships:

at Gracious Sovereign,
our Majesty's most dutiful and loyal ne

of the United Kingdom of Great Bri-eland, in Parliament assembled, beg-ably to represent to Your Majesty, ect Committee of the House of Cominted to try a Petition complaining
e Election and Return for the Town
k-upon-Tweed, have reported to the
there is Reason to believe that Bribery prevailed at the last Election for the rwick-upon-Tweed.

fore humbly pray Your Majesty, that ty will be graciously pleased to cause
be made, pursuant to the Provisions of Parliament passed in the Sixteenth
e Reign of Your Majesty, intituled
o provide for more effectual Inquiry istence of corrupt Practices at Elec-members to serve in Parliament," by the nt of James Vaughan, Esquire, Thomas stow, Esquire, and Franklin Lushing-
re, as Commissioners, for the Purpose Inquiry into the Existence of such

IZATION OF THE INFANTRY.

EARL OF LUCAN: My Lords, the
of the country have become a such general interest, and to o much anxiety and concern, that rdly apologize to your Lordships
assing on you for a short time,
ring before you a question relat-
important part of those defences, try of the army. Until recently been the security felt from the y and preponderance of the navy.
ay be said that scarcely any army
been considered necessary for the defence of this country. Indeed, different Governments have year after year found themselves obliged to defend and justify themselves when bringing forward Army Estimates, and been made to calculate the amount of force chiefly upon what was necessary for colonial garrisons, and the relief of those garrisons. The question of organization was scarcely ever considered, and it may be said that so many regiments were maintained only as a nucleus on which an army could be formed on the breaking out of a war. The circumstances of the country are now totally altered, and I think it will be admitted that, however formidable may become our navy, and I was glad to hear the other evening from the noble Duke the first Lord of the Admiralty that it had greatly increased, and however successful we may be in manning it efficiently, still that no safety can be felt for this country in future, unless it is also defended by a large and efficient army. The army can no longer be called a colonial army for colonial purposes, but an army whose first duty will be the defence of its own shores. If this be all true, the time has, my Lords, I think arrived when it would be well to consider what organization of the army will give the greatest security to the country in time of peace, and will best meet the exigencies of war at the least charge to the public. On the present occasion I shall confine my observations to the composition of the infantry. Since the peace of 1815 the organization of the infantry has undergone many changes. When I first joined the army it was composed of separate and independent battalions, and at that time regiments on colonial service had no depôts at home. An officer, or perhaps two only, being left to superintend recruiting, and to the forwarding of the recruits to their regiments. I can recollect no objections being offered to this system. No doubt I was very young at the time and inexperienced, but I have asked officers who were senior to me and more competent to form an opinion, and they concur in saying that no inconveniences were felt. In 1824 it was found that reductions had been carried so much too far that it was impossible to carry out the military services of the empire, and a very considerable increase of the army was determined upon. The Duke of Wellington, though not Commander-in-Chief at the time, naturally had much influence on all military questions, and he felt so keenly all the inconveniences and difficulties he had experienced during the

Another very objectionable arrangement has been made by which the battalions abroad have been increased from eight to ten companies; for if twelve companies are to be retained with the present low establishment, it would be as much for the advantage of the regiments as it would be for the good of the country that four companies should be always at home ready as a nucleus upon which to form second battalions. This has undoubtedly much aggravated the objections of a system already sufficiently objectionable, and it is only fair to state that it has been done since Lord Hardinge relinquished the command of the army.

Now, my Lords, it is to the whole system that I, with the concurrence of the profession, find fault. In the first instance it obliges all officers and soldiers to go to the dépôts and remain there a considerable time before they are allowed to join their regiments, and severing as it does all connection, and, indeed, communication, between the head-quarters of the regiment and its dépôt, it strikes at the very root of the regimental system—a system universally approved of; for I can say with truth that no one part of the organization of the British army is more generally approved of, and does more to maintain the character and efficiency of the British army, than the regimental system.

I have said, my Lords, that no communication is allowed between the regiment and the dépôt, nor the smallest interference allowed on the part of the commanding officer with his own dépôt; this is carried to such an extent that I have heard that in the case of the 10th regiment, with its dépôt quartered in the same garrison at Devonport, the commanding officer is made to communicate with it through the Horse Guards in London. I object very strongly to young officers being made to commence their career at these ill-organized dépôts, in lieu of being placed at once under their own commanding officers and their own captains, when not unfrequently it happens that their appointment to particular regiments was made at the instance of their friends, who were, from the character of certain commanding officers, or their intimacy with them, anxious to intrust to them their sons.

My Lords, instead of the young officer, at the most critical period of his life, and when exposed to its greatest dangers, being committed to the almost parental care of his own superiors, he is committed to the care of a dépôt staff that can feel no interest in one who is only making a very temporary sojourn with them, and he finds himself associated with a quantity of other boys equally inexperienced, and equally exposed to every mischievous temptation. Under the circumstances it is not to be wondered at that they frequently incur debts and get into difficulties most damaging to their professional career.

My Lords, I shall probably be told that these dépôts are well and efficiently commanded; I am not saying anything to the contrary, but I do say that it is as unreasonable to suppose, as it would be untrue to say, that the same interest can be felt in young officers by those who are only to know them during a few months, as by the commanding officer, and the other officers with whom they are about to pass much of their lives, and in whose good or ill-fortune they are to share. And, again, with respect to these officers commanding dépôts, if I am not much misinformed, the greater part, if not the whole of them, are men with wives and families, and who consequently seldom appear at the mess where their presence and superintendence would be most desirable.

My Lords, are these my opinions alone? I hold in my hand a pamphlet written, as I have only this day learnt, by an officer of very great distinction, and who, if I could but name him, would be considered by your Lordships as most entitled to your respect. I will only say, that upon any military subject whatever, he may be fairly called the highest military authority in this country: observing upon these dépôts, what does he say? "They are liable to an oppressive accumulation of the youngest of young officers beyond the influential control of their own commanding officers which must be unfavourable to strict discipline." My next objection to these consolidated dépôts is their costly and wasteful character. The correspondence carried on, as I have already explained it to be, between the regiments and their dépôts, always through the Horse Guards, must necessarily occasion great unnecessary trouble and expense. The removal of recruits from the recruiting party, perhaps in London to a dépôt, possibly at Cork or Belfast, subsequently to be sent to their head quarters at Aldershot, or some other distant quarters, cannot do otherwise than occasion considerable expense. I observe in the Estimates a sum of £200,000 for the removal of troops within the United King-

it wi se hi

ady
nmon
tain
t by ny m
to of dy fa
e sal
ondit
Kingd
take is ac
at n since rese
n, of regi
lepôt
nd i shall hen
ns sh
the unt
, con
e ad
at ho
ir ac
port for men, ioned 21
e of wly-1 3,000
exclus
uard

ie sa
00, i it for lvide
Brita
he co
with arm ight
ery o sert ied u
he se
o co

ated
asy o f Inf

it was lately kindly proposed to me to attend his inspection; but I declined, not wishing in this House to discuss the merits of particular corps, but to confine my remarks to the system generally. It has been said that they would do to garrison a naval arsenal; I do not doubt that this would be their mission, but it is precisely in that description of force, a force to line ramparts and intrenchments, that the country is least likely to be deficient; for the militia and volunteers would serve these purposes very nearly, if not quite as well, and the regular army, by a proper organization, should be all fit to act in the field.

As I have shown, there were on the 1st February, 54,000 infantry within the United Kingdom. I contend, and shall endeavour later to show, that the whole should be made available and effective for recruits in moderate numbers as they would be, in their own regiments under their own officers, would become soldiers in one-fourth of the time that they would in consolidated depôts under strange officers and amassed with boys as inexperienced as themselves.

My Lords, I can again appeal to that high authority I have already quoted in support of this opinion. He says:—

“But the battalions destined to bear the brunt and to be first and foremost in the fight, and to give example and confidence when arrayed and united to militia, yeomanry, and organized rifle volunteers; the troops by which the whole defensive machinery is to be brought into use and worked are so deplorably below the mark in respect to numbers, that it is inconceivable in this age of reform that the distribution and formative regimental organization of the infantry of the line should not yet have been constituted on solid principles applicable to every description of service and embracing the ultimate purposes of depôts unembarrassed by provisional battalions and the waste of force resulting from their restricted duties.”

Again, my authority observes, referring to these provisional battalions or consolidated depôts:—

“These, however, from their construction and abrupt fluctuations in numbers and restrictive local duties can scarcely be called moveable for field service; they are in every respect inferior to service companies of regiments, and have not the advantages derived from esprit de corps.”

My Lords, such are the opinions of the highest military authority living in this country, and I will undertake to say are the opinions of every soldier of knowledge and experience, and I think I do not go too far when I affirm that they condemn the present system of consolidated depôts as one most objectionable and seriously impairing the infantry force of the country. I should not leave this part of the question without remarking that of the force which the War Department so constantly boasts of having for the defence of the country are included 17,000 men composing depôts maintained at the expense of India, when it is so often asserted that no part of the revenues of that country are applied for English purposes, it is difficult to understand why the support of these 17,000 men is not resisted by those who are responsible for the finances of India.

My Lords, having condemned the present system of consolidated depôts, and done so, as I have shown, with the concurrence of high authority, I will now submit the system which in my opinion would best meet the military exigencies of the country at home and abroad, in peace or in war. I am the more confident in proposing such a system from the fact that it is only an extension of that introduced by the Duke of Wellington in 1824, and which I have not a doubt he would himself have continued and extended if the opportunities which have occurred since his death had offered previously. I propose that the 101 regiments of infantry of the Line should each have a second battalion, and that no regiment should at present have more than two battalions. The first battalion to consist of 8 companies of 100 men each, at home or in the Colonies, and of 125 men each when in India, or in the field, as was the case in the Crimea. I propose that the second battalions should consist of at least 6 companies or 600 men, and that each battalion should be officered by a lieutenant-colonel and a major, but that a second major should be added to all battalions in the field or in India. I am prepared to maintain that an establishment of five field officers would keep the field battalions far more efficient than does the present system.

This would give a force of 149,400 non-commissioned officers and men, supposing a force of 40,000 infantry in India, whilst in the Army Estimates the infantry of the Line amount to 157,000 men, or near 8,000 men more, it cannot therefore be said that second battalions would create an unnecessary number of men; but one of the great advantages to accrue from this organization would be its capability of contraction and expansion; by giving 8 infantry.

recruits were should be, the
all as in no wa
ber the batta
it will not be what I propos
with only ex
I will admit
e Indian sec
the first in t
nt than the illy to be m ome service i t, and there
efficient an is substituted
ya amassed attalions.

now

obje

aine

t or hai

t q

w

ed

mat

.he

be nd

as

attributed to y amounting till saddled
ith the enor
d after forty-
re long since
said that a la
the army of a necessar
ase system;
let, that thro
whole half-p
should have

t.

change is ca
nfantry is to er organizati
defences of t
for. I have the present
astes force a e; if such is r
rtly affirm th

e ic

a

e

;

n

all could only desire its efficiency. So, my Lords, do I feel assured that your Lordships will in no way regard the organization and efficiency of the army as fit for party politics. All who desire the security, position, and honour of their country, cannot but feel the deepest interest in the strength and efficiency of the army. In the observations it has been my duty to offer, I have felt much confidence in the fact that, the consolidated depot system which I seek to have abolished, is objected to and disapproved of by that high authority from whom I have made several quotations, and the whole profession; and in recommending, as I do most earnestly, the substitution of second battalions, I speak with no less confidence from the knowledge that it was the system recommended and desired by the Duke of Wellington, and which I am satisfied he would have carried out to its fullest extent had he lived to the present time, when present circumstances would have enabled him to do so.

It perhaps may be said by some that your Lordships' House is not the most proper place for such a discussion; but having given much attention to the organization of armies, and believing that my opinions, formed from experience after a long life spent in the service, are sound, and that they are supported by great military authorities and by the army in general, I have felt that I should be wanting in the discharge of my duty as a Peer of Parliament, and should have felt ashamed of myself if I had hesitated in exercising my privilege to bring this very important matter forward for your Lordships' consideration, and through this House for that of the public.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the notice that the noble Earl had placed upon the table was so vague and indefinite in its terms that he had been at a loss to discover to what part of the large subject of the organization of the British infantry he proposed to direct attention. Having now heard the observations of the noble Earl, he must confess that it appeared to him that the subject was so strictly professional and technical in its character that it could not be discussed with much advantage in their Lordships' House. He was not in the least inclined to limit the right of any Member of that House to introduce the subject for discussion, but he could not help thinking that the noble Earl, being himself a General Officer in the service, if he had thought it right to submit his views to the consideration of either the Duke on the cross benches (the Cambridge) or to the Secretary for War, would have found from the departments administering administrative affairs, a perfect readiness to subject into consideration; if he had thought that his views had been treated, or improperly dealt with, the public interests required an appeal to the decision of the authorities to the House, no one could have to the course taken by the noble Earl under the circumstances in which position was brought before them, would conduce to the interests of the service if individually he declined to do so. It was a purely professional and technical question; and he could only assure the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government were ever ready to consider questions connected with the organization of the army before them by General Officers. The subject was a subject to which their Lordships had been, and would continue to be, brought; but it did seem to him that discussion on the question at the present time was not likely to lead to results of much value to the public service. The question involved considerations relating to the principles of the army and of a character that he thought could be better entered on with advantage by the House.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE entirely agreed with what had fallen from his noble Friend who had just spoken, and he ventured to think without disrespect to his noble and gallant Friend (the Earl of Lucan), it would be more regular if his noble Friend, at the first instance, submitted his views to the consideration of this important subject to the military and civil authorities in the War Department for due consideration, instead of first bringing it under the consideration of that House. He was quite ready to admit with him, that as a Member of that House, he or any other Lord was justified in bringing forward that House any subject on which he thought it right that their views should be made public for the advantage of the country; but he did think that a great question like this, on which so much depended the whole organization of the army in which so much of finance was necessarily involved, should receive a very careful consideration from that which could only be given to it in a deliberative

l syste
air Lon gone a milita sially
e find }—wh comp
id it was c
of, Le
r bro comp
wo pe mpan
l dep
The
f 25
ôt co 110 m ôt co l the able e, th refuse id wa
left after l did e at o consi
wer
nen,
of
was com
into d the ôt co mpos
file,
read ce ; s s six Con
ereas ie de ervice
t one ie au broad inuar
50,4 atter
h the ywh
the no
ey we nt me
is low

established in this country. He wished to speak of it with the greatest possible respect, for he thought the spirit of patriotism shown by the people when it was believed there was some danger to be apprehended from a neighbouring Power was deserving of all praise. What he feared was that the volunteer system would be allowed to interfere with and supersede our regular forces. He found the Militia was not to be embodied, and he also found that the Yeomanry were not to be called out for training this summer; and they were doing this while at the same time they were about to adopt a more direct taxation for an indirect system. What he feared was that year by year any Government that might be in power would be under an almost irresistible temptation to relieve the public purse by a reduction of the army, and fall back upon this volunteer system. He approved of this volunteer force, and thought it a most excellent movement, but he hoped it would be maintained only as an auxiliary force, and in addition to the regular army.

THE EARL OF LUCAN shortly replied.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, May 4, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Marriages (Extra-Parochial); Spirits.
2^o Innkeepers Liability,
3^o Bank of Ireland.

CANAL COMPANIES.—QUESTION.

MR. BEAMISH said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is intended to renew the Act of 1858, restraining Canal Companies, being also Railway Companies, from leasing Canals.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill for the renewal of this Act.

On Motion, "That this House at its rising do adjourn till Monday."

OUR RELATIONS WITH JAPAN.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Fo-

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

reign Affairs what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect our commercial interests in Japan. In putting his question he should take the liberty of making a few observations. He knew that questions of the kind failed very frequently to excite any interest in the House; but the circumstances of the case were very important, and that must be his apology for calling attention to the state of our relations with Japan. Hon. Gentlemen who had not perused the papers relating to Japan might not be aware that there was at present a great risk of a massacre of the whole of the European inhabitants. But as such appeared to be the case, it was right that the House should know what means the Government had adopted or intended to adopt in order to protect the interests of those persons who, in consequence of the policy of the Government, had been induced to make Japan their place of residence. In 1854 Admiral Stirling, a distinguished officer in the British service, and then commanding in those seas, entered into a convention with the Government of Japan with regard to certain harbours in that country, and obtained by virtue of that convention the privilege of access to the country by our merchants. Very little result was produced by that convention; but it was a striking circumstance, as the first instance in which the Emperor of Japan had abandoned the restrictive policy of the empire since the great massacre of Christians which took place there two centuries ago, that massacre having been followed by laws so stringent that no Japanese, on pain of death, could leave the country, or, having left it, could return to it. Admiral Stirling having entered into that convention, Lord Elgin, in 1858, during the progress of the negotiations which were carried on in China, went to Japan for the purpose of effecting another commercial treaty with that country, and at the same time to present to the Emperor, or the Tycoon of Japan, a yacht, the gift of Her Majesty. Hon. Members who had taken the trouble to read the despatches on the table, must have been struck with the interesting account given of that visit by Lord Elgin; as well as the able and admirable narratives of Mr. Oliphant and Captain Sherard Osborn on the same subject. With all the admiration that he felt for Lord Elgin, and his patriotism in again returning to the East, he regretted to be forced to say, that his Lordship appeared to have fallen into the same error in Ja-house, Tells by name, asked for 250,000,000 dollars' worth of Japanese silver; the house of William Jones asked for silver to the amount of 1,000,000 dollars. And so in many other cases. This went on so quietly, that the demands became still more absurd; and he held in his hand a list of the houses of "Doodle-do," "Nonsense," "Is it Not?" "Snooks," and others, which had sent in claims for silver to large amounts, making a total of upwards of 355,000,000,000 of dollars. The conduct of these Europeans had been appropriately described by Mr. Alcock as a positive disgrace to anybody bearing the name of Englishman. Every one he was sure would concur in the sentiments expressed by the noble Lord in his despatch to Mr. Alcock, in which he expressed his confidence that the East India and China Association would view with disapprobation and alarm the way in which the trade with Japan was put in jeopardy by reckless and unscrupulous individuals, and that they would use all their influence to discountenance such conduct. This was language worthy of the Foreign Secretary of this country. But, in the meantime, the trade with that country was, to all appearance in a state of great danger. In his very last despatch Mr. Alcock stated that sinister rumours of a general massacre of the foreigners were put in circulation, whilst the warnings sent to the diplomatic agents against being burnt out looked ominously like a foregone conclusion. Added to this, the frequent recurrence of earthquakes made the post of diplomatic agent in that country by no means an enviable one. He would ask, therefore, what means were about to be taken for the protection of the inhabitants. There was only one other observation he wished to make in connection with this question. We were now engaged in hostilities with China, in which he knew not how much of money would be expended, and the termination of which no man could tell, for the sake of obtaining the right of having a resident Minister in Peking. But the Russian Government already had an Ambassador residing in Peking, and he had obtained for his country all the objects for which we were about to expend so much blood and treasure. While, too, we were asking to have a resident at Jeddo and endeavouring to render our relations with the Japanese more intimate, the Japanese breaking through the traditions and customs of their country, had sent an embassy to the United States and had given to the United States all the advantages of intercourse which we were seeking to secure. The whole of the papers showed that while this was the case we did not know how to go about the establishment of friendly relations with these people. Mr. Oliphant, in a remarkable passage of his excellent work had said,—

Z

"So essential to the maintenance of amicable relations with Japan is it, that we should employ in our intercourse with them a mixture of firmness and forbearance. No less vital was it that our merchants should set an example of rigid adherence to treaty obligations."

With these expressions he (Mr. Cochrane) fully agreed; and he trusted that, as he saw the noble Lord had expressed himself in strong language respecting the conduct of Europeans in that country, so in future those who were in office would treat the people as they should be treated, and carry out honourably the conditions of the treaty. He wished to ask whether Lord Elgin had any authority from Her Majesty's Government to proceed, after the Chinese expedition was at an end, to Japan; and also what means Her Majesty's Government had taken to protect the interests of our commercial policy in that country?

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION. CONFERENCE.

The time being come for the Conference with The Lords upon the subject matter of an Address to be presented to Her Majesty, under the provisions of the Act of the Sixteenth of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-seven:

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to manage the Conference.

And a Committee was appointed of Mr. PEEL, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. BOUVERIE, Mr. HENRY HERBERT, Mr. LOCKE KING, Mr. WILLIAM EWART, Mr. RIDLEY, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Sir JOHN SHELLEY, and Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN.

Then the Names of the Managers were called over; and they went to the Conference.

And being returned;

Mr. PEEL reported, That the Managers had been at the Conference, which was managed on the part of The Lords by the LORD STEWARD, and that they had delivered to their Lordships the Address agreed upon by this House, to which they desired the concurrence of their Lordships; and that they had left the said Address with their Lordships.

that the noble Lord had written a despatch in which he instructed Lord Augustus Loftus, at Vienna, to recommend the Government of Austria to dissuade the Court of Rome from taking any hostile course: and that, in reply, Mr. Russell wrote to the effect that a pacific course was approved of, and that the Roman Government was prepared to offer no opposition to the King of Sardinia. The fact was that the Pope was ready with his army to defend his territory, and attack the troops of the King of Sardinia if they entered it. So also was the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena. The English Government, however, dissuaded them from defending their territories. Furthermore, the diplomatic agents of this country prevailed upon the Grand Duchess of Parma not to take the course which would have been ordinary and natural under the circumstances. He (Mr. Hennessy) would take the liberty of reading a few lines from one of the published despatches. When Lord Augustus Loftus made that extraordinary recommendation to the Court of Vienna the Austrian Minister replied that, "the Pope was an independent sovereign, and no one could contest his undisputed right to defend from aggression a province which was part of his own dominions." Now he (Mr. Hennessy), ventured to think that the noble Lord had not acted in conformity with a strict policy of non-intervention in dictating either directly or indirectly to the Court of Rome upon such a subject. The Duke of Modena was anxious to take hostile steps when the Sardinian army entered Italy, and he too was dissuaded by the English Government from taking the most ordinary precautions. And yet the noble Lord a few nights since had spoken of these rulers as having run away, and abandoned their dominions and subjects. He was also anxious to call attention to despatches of the noble Lord, in which he had gone beyond the usual limits of diplomacy, and used language fortunately not often seen in the despatches of European statesmen. The Earl of Malmesbury in his despatches had always referred with great delicacy to the temporal rule of the Pope. That noble Earl appeared to be of opinion that it was highly improper that England, being a Protestant country, should dictate to the Pope, or intermeddle in the affairs of the Holy See; and he never made the least allusion to the ecclesiastical rule of the Sovereign Pontiff. The noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell), however, in one of his despatches declared that the temporal rule of the Pope ought to Rome and a certain circle walls of the city. That might be the noble Lord's opinion; but it was rather he should have announced his diplomatic agents, and that in a public despatch. But further. The noble Lord disapproved of the ecclesiastical rule of the Pope as tyrannical, and corrupt—but he put it in terms quite as strong as those celebrated Durham letter, referring to his Roman Catholic subjects. He was very sorry the noble Lord had so far digressed from his predecessor. Of course as a member of the Church might naturally suppose the Church of Rome was ignorant but the House would not suggest as a description of some millions of Her Majesty's subjects. He would now beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Mr. Glyn, of the London Customs, who has assisted in the revision of the Treaty of that name, who, a few years ago, was engaged, under the direction of the Chairman and Board of Customs, to set up the prosecutions for against the various Dock Companies of the Port of London; whether he was employed in revising the duties which has just been abolished, which was based upon the principle of Duties by specific rates, whether there is any objection to the ports or Statements made in the case, by Mr. Ogilvie to the House, or any member of the House connected with the Government position to the abolition of the Wine Duties, being the House?

ITALY—THE PAPAL QUESTIONS

MR. BOWYER said, the noble Lord adverted to the fact that from his hon. Friend (Mr. Russell) also wished to ask him whether the noble Lord would remember some time ago asked him whether he had on the table a despatch referring to the completeness of the Treaty on Roman affairs, and that on the 29th of February, 1858, Cardinal Antonelli to the

Mr. Hennessy

this was done without exciting any ill feeling; and in his latest letters Mr. Alcock, while representing the state of affairs as still very unsatisfactory, and the apprehension that other murders might be committed as still prevalent, expressed himself more hopefully than in his former letters as to the prospect of the difficulties being overcome and of a considerable trade being established. At the same time it appears that the trade which is carried on consists almost entirely of Japanese produce supplied in return for silver, and that there is no considerable demand, indeed hardly any demand at all for British manufactured goods. In regard to the measures which have been taken for the protection of British subjects, I may say that there are ships which visit Yeddo from time to time, but as they are unable to approach within four or five miles of that town, they cannot be on the spot to interfere on any occasion when their presence might be required. As soon, however, as the Admiral can spare ships, that protection will be afforded to our countrymen in Japan to which they are entitled. I feel very strongly that we must be very careful that none of the clerks or agents of British merchants out there should commit any offence against the customs of the Japanese, for unless they abstain entirely from behaviour of that kind, we cannot justly complain of outrages against us, and it will be impossible to maintain satisfactory relations between the two countries.

The next question was put to me by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, and refers to the delay which has been occasioned by the Brazilian Government in the disposal of the claims of British subjects laid before the Mixed Commission under the convention of the 2nd of June, 1858. The reason of the delay was, that an immense number of counter claims had been made, chiefly founded on slave trade transactions, some most notorious slave traders between Brazil and Africa complaining of the hindrance caused by the British cruisers to their nefarious traffic. Great difficulty was found in disposing of these claims. The British Government thought that those cases did not come within the terms of the convention; but the Brazilian Commissioners decided that unless they were investigated no inquiry should take place into the English claims; and thus the Mixed Commission was suspended on account of the differences which arose. An application has since been made by the Brazilian Minister to have the subject, it appears the Commission the opinion on the question might be admitted to their consideration at present.

I now address J. Acton Reports British Condition 1855 to States. Rome is but only Italy, as transmits sense of with the however, 1858 the throw it wishes of Rome is not en our diplo have been circulated States, the Comported to Bologna hands of criminal ducted by of course system with the

The Hennessey for Dund I have Government that for I entertain him to be book has of this that with the Papal tration of be more proof of duct of t

Lord John Russell

ents of Government, such as more the administration of justice—"hear"], which—I do not say the Pope in particular—but the eccle-governments generally is, in my ill-calculated to discharge to the of the people. The hon. Member's County said that, as a member Church of England, I might, of object to Papal government. Now that though I have a very great or the Archbishop of Canterbury, believe, if Her Majesty were to the Government of the county of the Archbishop, that county would become the worst administered kingdom. It is not, therefore, Protestant prejudice that I have might particularly well of the go- of the Pope; but, at the same confess there are opinions held by Catholics in which, of course, I as tant cannot share. For instance, a gentleman, who is very much, has written a pamphlet, in which that to take the Romagna from is not an aggression, is not a but is a sacrilege. [Mr. BOWYER: ar.] No doubt my Italian Friend ose as the opinions of Roman Ca- but they cannot expect that Pro- will deem it sacrilege to deprive agna of the Government of the With regard to the Despatches y Mr. Russell, there is this to be rdinal Antonelli has spoken to sell with the greatest openness e mode of government in the dominions, and has said, "As not a regular diplomatic agent, speak to you with less reserve could if your character were official." That is a reason, I hy we should not produce to Par- everything which Mr. Russell re- The last thing to which the hon. or Dundalk referred was our con- in regard to Naples, and he ex- n opinion that we have very un- ly interfered. But the conduct of ernment has been such to its sub- th in Naples and Sicily, that it any time bring on complications ed interference by one party or to which we cannot be indifferent. this likewise to be said—the Mi- f the King of the two Sicilies a time to time communicated with shows a reliance, and, in spite of Friend, I will say a just reliance, on the friendship of Her Majesty's Govern- ment. Upon one occasion there was report that General Garibaldi was going t Genoa, that ships were being armed there and that they would sail to Sicily. Th Government of the King of the Two Sic- lies immediately applied to Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to stop that ex- pedition, and I lost no time in applying t the Sardinian Government, asking them if they had any authority over Genera Garibaldi, not to allow him, while holdin a Commission from the King of Sardinia to proceed. But if we are asked for sue acts of friendship, I think it is fair for u to say, on the other hand, "If you wis no aggression and no insurrection, it is a least desirable that you should conduct you government with such justice, and in accor- dance with such acknowledged principles that discontent will not arise among you own subjects." It is only fair that wit friendly intervention, not by arms, on ou part, we should say to them what is ou opinion of their Government. That is th course which I have pursued. I hav never attempted to threaten the Govern- ment of the King of the Two Sicilies wit any interference; but I have not conceale from them the opinion, not merely of He Majesty's Government, but of every part in the country, with regard to some act committed by the police of Naples.

There was another question, with respec to Mr. Cobden. I have stated already t this House, that Mr. Cobden being in Pari last year as a private individual had a grea many private communications with the Mi- nisters of the Emperor of the French. I was supposed that those communication might lead to a treaty, and then he was in- vested regularly, just as Mr. Eden, wh was only a private individual, but in oppo- sition to the Government of the day, wa invested in 1786, with the titles and func- tions of Plenipotentiary, as regarded th Commercial Treaty. Mr. Cobden is not again in Paris, but he has gone from thi country as one of a Commission to carr- out the 13th article of the Treaty of Com- merce. There are three Commissioners— Mr. Cobden, a gentleman from the Boar- of Trade, and a gentleman from the Boar- of Customs, who are associated with him and who are persons most fitted to act. do not believe that any one person or an- three persons can be acquainted with al the details of a question of converting a valorem into specific duties; but I believ that Mr. Cobden is especially fitted to trea ister of Commerce. r, in which he does ary; but, if any con- Mr. Cobden will be Cowley in that con- very properly said nment ought not to

There is no salary ial mission, but it is nses of Mr. Cobden hall be defrayed out lina, I have been have been sent out nd naval expedition operations. There in that report. On l of Elgin was very vere to be any naval ns, they should be reached China, so might not be placed em. I believe that o to be undertaken, n before the Earl of now, I believe, given y power to the ques- dded to me.

GULATIONS.

ION.

ANS said, he wished ation from the right Secretary for War ler which had been the Lord Chamber- cet that the rank of io may attend Her longer to be recog- nself see no reason uld have been made. that opportunity of hat the Government n the raising of vo- o believed that they in opposite course, country a valuable al defensive force. General Order had gated requiring Off- o discontinue the use e caps and to substi- oc stripes, in lieu of es on their undress a somewhat strange opposed to the prac- mong English gen- liest youth of pro- for their eyes.

IRISH FISHERIES.—QUESTION

MR. CONOLLY said, he would ask the Secretary of State for War ther he has given authority to the commanding Royal Engineers to claims to Fisheries in Ireland in re- Lands held for Military purposes wh such right existed; and whether authorized that Officer or any Dep to let such Fisheries by public comp without previously establishing suc by Law? As the representative of a time county, in which the great the population were interested in the cries, it was his duty to bring this before the attention of the House o mons. The right hon. Gentlema ventured to give orders to the offic manding the Engineers in Ireland these Fisheries, but he had better tain his right to do so. For his ov he could not see what on earth th Department had to do with Fisheries and was quite satisfied that they business with the particular Fisheries the right hon. Gentleman was now away from their lawful possessors. right hon. Gentleman was absolutely in the guise of a poacher [A Laugh was not a laughing matter at all. rights of fishermen had been gross- lated for upwards of 200 miles. who had hitherto enjoyed the free r fishing were now to be deprived of less they would pay a rent for it.

MR. S. HERBERT said, that w gard to the first question of the Officer respecting forage caps and tr it was of so minute a description t ought to have applied for an answer office of the Adjutant-General, wh was sure he would have obtained information he wanted. He believ the officers applied to be allowed forage caps without peaks, as the considered to be more convenient march, and would go into their ho With regard to the trousers, he b the explanation wa cavalry but one could do with two That, I hope, solve regard to the other inquiry on the subj such regulation as been promulgated; might be made by reception of the soci by receiving at her matter of discussion in that House. As to the question respecting the Poor Law, he had to observe that the War Office possessed considerable landed property in different parts, some of them on the seashore; and, as the country was so heavily expensed for the support of the military establishment, it was his opinion that it had the advantage to be sold. He had only continued the same system which had been given at former times. He had no doubt about his right to do so, as it was founded on an Act of Parliament, but if the hon. Gentleman doubted the right, it was for a court of law and not for that House, to decide.

CLASSIFICATION AND EDUCATION OF CHILDREN IN UNION WORKHOUSES.

QUESTION.

MR. EWART said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, whether it may not be advisable to adopt in Union Workhouses a system of Classification of the Inmates, so that the more reformatory may be separated from the worse, and the children from the other inmates; whether a greater separation of the children from the other inmates could be effected, and a system of training more generally adopted; whether it might not be beneficial to have the introduction of small but efficient Libraries in Workhouses, together with the practice of reading aloud to those who cannot read themselves; also, whether any Returns could be made, showing the results of such separation of the children from the other inmates, and what is the present number of District Schools for the education of children apart from the Workhouses?

MR. P. VILLIERS said, that a few days ago a Return had been made of the number of District Schools for the education of children apart from the Workhouses; and his hon. friend would find there the specific arrangements made by the Board with a view to the classification, together with the further arrangements at the guardians throughout the country should, as far as circumstances permitted, subdivide the inmates into three classes according to their moral character and vicious habits. That order had been carried out to a great extent, and the Board had every reason to believe that the desired object would be carried out still further, for they had given instructions that every new workhouse should be constructed as to allow of the requisit classification. In all the large towns there was now a strict classification with regard to the children. The Board had readily consented to establish libraries, and it was not an uncommon practice for one of the inmates to read for the benefit of the others. The suggestions of the Poor Law Inspectors had, as a general rule, been observed by the Boards of Guardians to whom they were made. There were now six district schools, formed under the District School Act, and 19 separate or parochial schools, in which there were altogether 7,063 children. They were all taught some trade or other, by which they could subsequently maintain themselves, and the demand for the service of the children educated in these schools was very considerable. There were also 251 paid industrial teachers, and altogether the children educated out of the pariah rates were at present 33,579 in number. The system now in progress throughout the country was, of course, more advanced in the Metropolitan district, which comprised 50 unions and upwards of 300 parishes, and it might be interesting to his hon. friend (Mr. Ewart) to be informed of some statistics contained in a note just made by the Metropolitan Inspector upon the condition of his district. The Inspector stated:—

"In the Metropolitan district, wherever there is a modern workhouse (and there are many), the guardians adopt every practicable means of classifying the moral and immoral women; the latter being set to task-work by themselves. With regard to libraries in workhouses, I have taken every means in my power to establish them by conferring with the guardians, and by recommending them in my reports in the Visitor's Books, and I am glad to be able to say that libraries have been established in many workhouses and are being from time to time now established. There are three district schools, capable of containing 3,239 children, in the Metropolitan district, and the average weekly number educated in them last year was 2,263. There are 11 separate or detached schools, capable of containing 4,311 children, in the district, and the average weekly number educated in them last year was 3,097; that there were 5,300 pauper children being educated last year in the above schools belonging to this district. The children are both mentally educated and trained with great strictness to habits of usefulness, industry, and virtue, the result of which is that, on the one hand, there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining good situations for them, and, on the other, very few of them lose their situations through faults of their own."

With regard to the Returns alluded to, the materials which his hon. Friend desired would be furnished if he would move for them.

THE INDIGO RIOTS IN BENGAL. QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, as lately stated in the public prints, a Bill had been brought into the Legislative Council of India, making the non-fulfilment of a contract to grow Indigo on the part of a Ryot a criminal offence; whether he had any objection to lay a Copy of such Bill upon the Table of the House, and further to inform the House if such Bill had been introduced as the result of any authorized inquiry; and, if not, on what other grounds the Legislative Council proposed to make the breach of a merely civil contract a criminal offence; and, if he would not require that a Commission should be at once appointed to proceed into the interior of Bengal to inquire and ascertain the circumstances which had led to the complaints of the Bengal Cultivators? During the last three years there had been three mutinies in India—that of the Bengal army, which it was clearly shown by the papers before the House might have been averted by ordinary precautions; the mutiny which took place on the transfer of the Company's troops to the Crown, which had resulted in an enormous expense to the country, and betrayed a degree of mismanagement in simple matter little creditable to the Indian Government; and, lastly, the rising of the ryots in the Indigo districts of Lower Bengal. The House had been told that when the East India Company was abolished they would receive information more direct and more quickly, and he had, therefore, been surprised to find that no official reports were to be obtained respecting a Bill of such importance. The serious nature of the disturbances in the Indigo districts would be best appreciated by the measures adopted to repress them. He was told that large bodies of the new police were pouring into the district, and that the Legislative Council with the utmost precipitancy were called upon to pass a Bill which would treat the simple breach of a civil contract as a criminal offence. Perhaps the House was not aware of the oppressive system by which the ryots were compelled to cultivate indigo. They received advances of money with a view to this cultivation, and, though it would pay them much better to grow what they were compelled to grow indigo, had long been a grievance to the ryots who had remonstrated, but in vain. Now, on attempting to resist the coercion, they were met by the Act which had described. It was as if an English landlord were invested with the power of punishing a tenant for default of rent as a criminal offender. If such a thing had been attempted by the Emperor Napoleon at Algiers, or by the Czar, the whole world would cry him down for his oppression. In 1857 he had brought the case of the ryots before the House, and had urged the necessity of remedying that occasion he was told by the Government who was then Chairman of the Committee and held a seat in this House, that really was no such oppression. The Government promised to adopt remedial measures, and to make inquiries. He (Mr. Kinnaird) complained, however, that no inquiry had been made. He was sure so oppressive and so unusual a system ought to be proceeded by inquiry. At all events, he wished in bringing forward this question, to obtain from the Secretary of State for India an assurance that the contract of the ryots should now be properly investigated by the Government. The result was, that the administration of justice in those parts was so incomplete and so complicated, that in the present emergency the system had broken down; but the statute about to be applied would be arbitrary and oppressive in its operation. In the Queen's Proclamation the following passage occurred:—

"When, by the blessing of Providence, tranquillity shall be restored, it is our earnest desire to stimulate the peaceful industry of India, to promote works of public utility and improvement, and to administer its Government for the benefit of our subjects resident therein. In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security, and in their gratitude our best reward." He was puzzled to understand how a system so oppressive carried out the spirit of the promise to the people. The Queen's Proclamation had given him little assurance to pass rendering that a system was before purely tyrannical. He hoped for India would be without delay, as possible period the would be relieved from most severe law.

Mr. C. P. Villiers

criminal offence; and whether, in consequence of that proceeding, a feeling of deep exasperation has been excited among the peasantry, which has rendered it necessary for the indigo planters to secure, for their protection, the services of discharged soldiers and sailors lounging about Calcutta?

ORGANIZATION OF THE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, if the Council of India possessed the powers of the former Court of Directors there would be no necessity for his putting the question of which he had given notice. Each member of the Court of Directors had the power of introducing any subject for discussion, just as hon. Members of that House brought subjects before the House. But the Council of India had no such power. They could discuss nothing but what had been introduced by the Secretary of State, who, if he consulted them at all, might take their advice or not, as he pleased. The consequence was that they were dummies, or not, according to the policy of the Secretary for India. There was, however, one exception, and that was in respect to the disposal of public money, and in all financial questions the Secretary of State must obtain the consent of a majority of the Council to his acts. The reorganization of the army of India was a real financial question, and one in which a million of money might be wasted or saved according to the measures that were adopted. He, therefore, wished to ask the Secretary of State for India when he purposes taking the judgment of the Council of India upon the Report of the Military Committee upon the reorganization of the Indian Army; and whether he will lay the result upon the Table of the House, with the other papers promised, and at what time?

MR. SMOLLETT said, he thought it was time that some definite information should be given to the House upon the important subject of the organization of the Indian army. There was a general opinion out of doors that there should be a large local force, irrespective of the Queen's troops, in India, and also that the delay that had taken place was as discreditable to the Indian Department as it was injurious to the public service. Before the mutiny there were 74 regiments of native infantry in the Bengal army. The rank and file of many of those regiments had now all disappeared; and yet the greatest part of the expense formerly connected with them was still being incurred in the pay of the officers. The expense of the Indian army amounted to something like £20,000 a year; a Commission had sat in this country on the subject of the reorganization of that army, but, so far, without any result, and he thought such a state of things was a discredit to the Indian Government, and most detrimental to the public service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not enter into the question of the reorganization of the Bengal Army. It was a question of Indian only, but of Imperial importance. There were few officers, belonging to the disbanded regiments, who were not employed in one way or another. They were not paid for doing nothing. Many of them were employed in connection with the new levies, though of course when those levies ceased to be needed the services of the officers would no longer be required. Others were employed in various ways. Up to the present time no expense had been incurred in that respect, but such as was unavoidable. He was sorry the rank and file of so many of the seventy-four regiments to which reference had been made had disappeared in the way they had, but he did not suppose that any Member of that House would say that officers belonging to those regiments should be deprived of their pay. With reference to the question put by his hon. and learned Friend (Colonel Sykes), he hoped to lay the papers on the table next week.

He came now to the question put by his hon. Friend (Mr. Kinnaird) to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Vansittart), with reference to the relations between the indigo planters and the ryots. He quite agreed that the state of those relations for some years past had been anything but satisfactory. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Kinnaird) seemed to think that steps had been taken with the view of placing those relations on a more satisfactory footing. But he appeared to have forgotten that an Act was passed in 1859, which he (Sir C. Wood) hoped would produce very considerable improvement in the relations between the planters and the ryots. That Act, however, had hardly come into operation. The state of the relations between them was still the same as before, the indigo planters obtained by purchase lease and emendary rights, and thus the landlords of the ryots. The ryots let to the ryot on favourable terms the land over which he exercised those him advances of money for carrying his operations, but he imposed on the obligation to grow a certain quantity of indigo. The consequence was, that the ryots were generally in debt to the landlords, who by the exercise of the powers of the ryotwar, landlord, and creditor, kept the ryots in a state of complete dependence, (Sir C. Wood) was very much of the opinion that in many cases those powers were exercised over them to an extent which the law would not sanction. The ryots had objected for some years to grow indigo because they considered it was not profitable to them to grow other crops, and that state of affairs had led to a refusal to perform their contracts, and the ryots combined together to resist the plan. It was true that sailors and soldiers had been brought up from Calcutta to the planters, it could not have been the consequence of the passing of any law, if the Government at home had rendered account, publicly or privately, of the passing of a law. The necessity for the law had arisen practically from the state of affairs he had described. That being the case, he had been made to the audience in Calcutta; he was not in possession of any official communication as to what had been done; the only information was contained in a private letter, dated the 23rd of March, stating the intention to introduce a Bill into the Legislature next day, for the purpose of dealing with the question. It did not, however, appear from that letter that it was intended to subject the infraction of a contract to criminal proceedings, but that a summary power was to be given for dealing with such infraction as a civil offence. Some time ago an Act was passed authorizing magistrates to proceed summarily in those cases, but that Act was passed in 1835, at the instance of the Directors. All he could say on the subject was that the non-performance of contracts must entail serious loss, and that it had led in some cases to the absolute ruin of the indigo planters. He only trusted that hon. Gentlemen would be good enough to suspend their judgment on the subject until they were in possession of the facts. The law, at any rate, whatever it was, was only to be temporary; and meantime a Commission was to be appointed to inquire into the state of the relations between the planters and the ryots, and to view, if possible, to place them on a satisfactory footing.

Mr. Vansittart

LIGHTHOUSES ON THE IRISH COAST. QUESTION.

MR. H. A. HERBERT, in rising to discuss the question of which he had given notice upon this subject, said that the efficiency of the lighting of the coast of Ireland was a question of the greatest importance, one that affected the whole commerce of Europe. That duty devolved on a Board in Dublin called the Ballast Board, to keep the light, buoys, and beacons in an efficient state they ought to have a vessel devoted to the purpose of inspection, properly fitted and manned for such a purpose, and placed under their control. The Trinity Board of London have six vessels and eight sailing vessels at its disposal for that purpose alone; the Northern Commissioners of Scotland have lights under their control, and were supplied with one large steamer and one of them being for supervising purposes; but although the Ballast Board in Dublin had 70 lights placed in spots in most instances quite inaccessible by water, they were supplied with but one small steamer, so small that two men occupied the whole deck, and so ill-suited to the work it had to perform that he believed, if her log were referred to, it would be found that she was obliged frequently to put in and discontinue her inspection in consequence of being quite unfit for the heavy seas on the west coast of Ireland. The consequence was that the Board had been compelled to borrow a steamer from another Board, the steamer was at one period placed at their disposal having been taken from them and sent home. He found from a Parliamentary Return that the Trinity House establishment, with 94 lights to look after, cost £46,343; the Northern Commissioners, with 39 lights to inspect, got £8,895; while the Ballast Board, with 70 lights, got £11,114. He therefore wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board had received an application from the Ballast Board of Dublin to provide them with a suitable steamer for carrying out the service of frequent inspections of the lights, and for the supply of oil and stores; what Reply has been given to such application; whether the application has been referred to the Royal Commission now having under consideration the subject of Lights, Buoys, and Beacons; and whether any steps have been taken by the Board for providing the Ballast Board

a of the Crown, and particularly the
r. of Finance of the day, were pro-responsible. As he understood, it t Mr. Ogilvie's duty nor was he per-by his superiors to take any share preparation of materials connected ose prosecutions.

second Question, of course, referred a of the British tariff which of duties of manufactured
portion of which were now ific rates. Many of these ntroduced into the British ny years ago, in 1845 or
r. Ogilvie, then an officer of Customs, on account of ivity, intelligence, and exusiness, and also the confi-
is superiors reposed in him, mployed in the conversion of more duties into specific efforts were as satisfactory
of the case would permit,
so deemed by the commer-y at large. Thirdly, the in asked whether there was to lay upon the table any re-ments made on former occa-

y Mr. Ogilvie to the Board of Cusor to any person connected with the ment, in opposition to the abolition uction of the wine duties. He (the ellor of the Exchequer) had to state ere was no paper in existence which ed to the description of a report by Mr. Ogilvie to the Board of Cus-r Government. Upon first making on this point the memory of the connected with the Board of Cus-
did not serve them in the matter;
ter reflection they recollected a me-lum from Mr. Ogilvie relating to the isease, and to which, possibly, the on might refer. With reference,
r, to memoranda of that descrip-assing between one member of a dent and another, it would be quite ry to usage, would be attended with inconvenience, and might prevent ntial communications in future, if a e were adopted of producing them information of the House. Of course
w a broad distinction between such anda and those reports which were nally prepared by direction of supe-ricers, which constituted formal docu-
and were, in many cases, fit to be ed for the information of Parliament.
h regard to the question put to him
noble Lord, the Member for Wiltshire
L. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

(Lord H. Thynne), he had only to sa
a report to the effect the noble Lo described (and he had no doubt the such a report) was highly injurious a convenient with reference to trade.
was no foundation for any report
kind. In point of fact, Her Maj Government could have no adequate rience of the probable working of th system of wine duties. That expe could not even begin until the House
have passed some legislative measu altering the present system with reg
the sale of wine, and the intention th
been apparently imputed to Her Maj
Government did not exist.

With regard to the question of the Lord (Lord W. Graham), as to the Na Gallery, it had not been brought und notice that the state of the atmosphe
so very unsatisfactory as would appea
the nature of the comparison to whi noble Lord had found it necessary to
He had made inquiry of the authoritie
the answer he had obtained was th
National Gallery was at present pr
with no means of ventilation exce opening the windows. If the present ing were to be considered as of a p nent character it would be desirabl
some other method of ventilation sho adopted. Experiments in ventilation ever, as the House well knew, were costly, and in order to introduce th
would be necessary to make consid alterations, which ought not to be undertaken. If, however, alterations take place which would permit of im
ventilating arrangements being ma
better ventilation ought to be se
Plans were under the consideration
Government, of the adoption of wh could, however, give no pledge, which render it practicable greatly to impro ventilation of the National Gallery.

PURIFICATION OF THE SERPEN QUESTION.

Ma. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he put the question of which he had giv
tice, relative to the purification of th pentine. He might remind the Hou last year a number of schemes for t rification of the Serpentine were no brought before the House, but we cussed by the public prints. One pl brought forward by the late lamented
Commissioner of Works, and was st
recommended by him on the groun

for a sum of £17,000 the purification of the Serpentine could be effected. That scheme, however, met with very considerable opposition upon the Ministerial side of the House, and from none more than from his hon. Friends the Members for Westminster and Coventry. At the same time, that plan had the recommendation of his hon. Friend (Sir S. M. Peto) and his ever-to-be-lamented friend the late Robert Stephenson. Notwithstanding that recommendation, a discussion and a division took place, when the scheme of Mr. Fitz-Roy was adopted by a large majority. After the death of Mr. Fitz-Roy, however, when the works were in operation, when the plans were being carried out and all the contracts were made, the question was again agitated, and the right hon. Gentleman who so worthily occupied the post of First Commissioner of Works was induced to take a different view, and consent to the reopening of the matter. Another Committee was appointed to reconsider the best mode of purifying the Serpentine, and their Report now lay on the table. That Report recommended the abandonment of the scheme which the House had already sanctioned last year, although it was fair to state that in some cases the Resolutions of the Committee were only affirmed by a small majority. In some instances, indeed, the Resolutions were only carried by the casting voice of the First Commissioner, and the House must, therefore, not be led to suppose that there was anything like unanimity in the vote to which the Committee had come. He was prepared to contend, indeed, that their recommendation ought to carry no weight at all, and he would state the grounds upon which he had formed that opinion. The Committee recommended the House to abandon works which had been carried out up to this time at an outlay of £14,000 out of a total expenditure of £17,000. The hon. Baronet (Sir J. Shelley) said he did not believe that £14,000 had been expended, and he had moved for a Return of the sums paid to the contractor, in which he found that only £5,000 had been actually paid. From that he assumed that £5,000 was all the loss the country would sustain from the abandonment of Mr. Hawksley's scheme. But that very Return showed that there remained a sum of £11,850 out of the Vote of £17,000 applicable to the settlement of accounts not yet rendered, and for which the tween the £5,000 and the £17,000 were also other unpaid items appear in the Return, and an cost of the steam-engine, w executed, but was not yet Return was therefore of no v as a criterion of the loss tha tailed on the country from ment of the scheme. What Chief Commissioner of Wo adopt? One Minister last y a scheme involving an outla which that House deliberate and no sooner had £14,00 upon it than another head o partment came forward, at of the indefatigable Member ster, and wholly upset the Whatever might be the o House on the subject, if the was to be squandered in tha ple out of doors would conc in whose hands such busin were incompetent to discha He would conclude by ask Commissioner of Works, wh taken, or is about to take, i Report of the Committee o tion of the Serpentine?

Mr. BENTINCK said, h think that the time had c House should open its eyes cases of this nature. This of the mode of Metropoli were to be paid for out of th and the result was that t £14,000 fooled away for question was not so much w in this affair as whether the continue to sanction such upon the public purse. I diture which should have be of a Metropolitan rate, and designate the transaction a der of the pockets of the He hoped that the House refuse any applications for be applied to purely local I jects.

Mr. COWPER said, th purifying the Serpentine consideration for a good m year a plan for effecting it, in its nature, was brought by its ingenuity captivated It had been generally sup it was necessary to do with was to clear out the filth a to pass the water through a series of filters. When he came to consider that officially he shared the prevailing opinion among professional men and the public at large, that, however ingenious it might be, the plan of last year would not be satisfactory. Still, the scheme having been stated to the House when the bill was granted, he thought it respectful to the House that before any alteration was made in it they should have an opportunity of reconsidering the objections to the plan, and the best mode of doing so was to refer it to a Select Committee. A Select Committee was appointed and fairly constituted, and, although their Report was not unanimous, yet they recommended, as the right mode of dealing with the foulness at the bottom of the lake should be got rid of, a clear and hard bed substituted for the mud. They further reported that it was not wise to abandon the process of filtration, but to seek the best available supply of water to fill the lake. He had acted on both of those recommendations. He, in the first place, had consulted Mr. Simpson with respect to the removal of the source of foulness and the securing a constant supply of pure water. He had consulted Mr. Simpson not only for his eminence in his profession as a hydraulic engineer, but because his long experience and special acquaintance with the Serpentine and the parts contiguous gave him a more intimate knowledge of the subject than any one else possessed. He next considered how the works already executed or intended for might be turned to the best account, and how the sum voted last year might be most usefully and economically employed. The plan of filtration had a great defect—that, instead of reaching the origin of the mischief, it tended to remove only one of the symptoms. It could not be successful, because the water when filtered would be liable to become as bad as before, it being well known that the vegetation which Mr. Hawksley sought to remove returned after filtration with renewed activity. In its anxiety for economy the House had been led to adopt a plan which would in the end prove the most costly. He had, therefore, announced to Mr. Hawksley that the system of filtration must be abandoned, and had asked Mr. Hawksley's opinion as to the possibility of obtaining a sufficient supply of pure water from a deep well in the vicinity of the bottom of the lake. Mr. Hawksley reported that they might procure a daily supply of half a million gallons of a very pure description from a well sunk in the tertiary and chalk formation. If the money intended for providing a filtering medium was devoted to the sinking of a well instead, they would attain the object desired of having a pure lake, without the necessity of removing the work already completed. The engine that was to be used in carrying out the filtration would hereafter be employed in pumping the water out of the well. It would draw the water from the bottom of the Serpentine through the conduit to the top to the extent of perhaps 2,000,000 gallons a day, thus establishing the most desirable thing of all—a perpetual current from one end of the lake to the other. Motion was more likely to secure the purity of water than any chemical process; and a perpetual current would prevent the vegetation which had been so much complained of. The engine would at the same time provide a large cascade, and throw water up a considerable height. Hon. Members opposite who objected so much to an ornament should remember that this would tend to aerate the water and thereby make it purer. There would be likewise a fine ornamental arrangement at the head of the lake. When, therefore, the removal of mud was effected they would, he believed, have a lake of water in a condition which would give rise to no further complaint. He might also mention that they would have a jet of water in the centre of the basin in front of Kensington Gardens. He was glad to be able to relieve hon. Members from the apprehension that the money which had been already expended on the Serpentine would be entirely wasted. The modifications which he intended to introduce into the plan the outlay which had been taken place would be turned to a satisfactory account. In reply to the observation that Metropolitan works of this kind ought not to be paid for out of local rates, he could only say that hitherto these Parks have always been considered Royal Parks, and their maintenance, consequently, a proper application of the national money. These Parks were not exclusively enjoyed by the inhabitants of London. They were Metropolitan, in the sense that they belonged to the Metropolis of the United Kingdom. He believed every Englishman to be proud of his Metropolis; and, although he was sorry to say he did not think it was quite worthy of the nation in many respects at Gentleman adopted the plan of was this. The plan first suggested to deal with the Serpentine in manner as the lake in St. James's drain off the water and expose m, which was then, by the appli- lime and by other processes, to be and made of an uniform depth. ense which that operation would as calculated at something like . Mr. FitzRoy, however, was led e that the scheme of filtration far accomplish the end in view, the water of the Serpentine in a state of purity, while it would £16,000. Placing confidence in on of Mr. Hawksley and men of matters of that sort, he therefore scheme which involved the smaller

JOHN MANNERS said, he would put the noble Lord right. He that the expense of the scheme had been proposed by the late Go- for purifying the Serpentine was £50,000 and £60,000, but it was £2,000 instead of £60,000. The which the present Government consider was, whether the Serpen- uld be put into a satisfactory con- the scheme, which on the part of Government he had submitted to nt, or whether they should adopt fangled and extraordinary one of which was found when it came to ined by the Select Committee to hat would not really hold water; moral he would draw from the very ctory state of affairs in relation erpentine was this—that a new ent on coming into office should n such a violent hurry to alter pply because they had been sanc- their predecessors. At all events, ht to be guided by something like sense, and have some better justi- for their conduct than had been on this occasion. The Govern- the noble Lord was a great sinner respect; and great public incon- and waste of public money must result of such a system. In the nstance some £10,000 or £12,000 n expended on works which the ee proposed to stop; that money asted, and, in all proba- ould end in the adoption ke that adopted by the which had been aban- ee to any party on some hasty intimation given at 4 o'clock at morning sitting. He had not the slight notion of the grounds on which the noble Lord chose to subvert the plans and rangements sanctioned by the late Govern- ment.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

FIRE INSURANCES.—LEAVE.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he rose move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the duty now chargeable on Fire Insurances. His reason for taking up the question, which he regarded as one of very considerable importance, was that Government required some pressure from without to stimulate their exertions for the removal of taxes of this description. He could not but express his regret at the deserted state of the House on a question of so much importance. Indeed he had been informed that it was the intention to endeavour to count out the House. When the Motion was made that Government should take Thursdays instead of Fridays, it was said that that change would be made the medium of some such proceeding. He hoped, however, such a proposition was far from the intention of the right hon. Gentleman who conducted the business of the House. A question which affected every house in Great Britain was not a question which ought to be treated with such levity. There was a good deal of agitation in the country with reference to the fire insurance duty. A society had been organized for its total repeal. That society embraced some of the most illustrious Members of that House, and a long list of the most respectable commercial firms in the kingdom. Not only was their object the total repeal of the duty; they said, unless Parliament consented to some whole sale alteration of the present system they would move that House and agitate the country for the reimposition of the duty which had been taken off farm stock and agricultural produce; but the object which he had in view was different. He did not advocate a total repeal of the duty, but by a moderate and temperate method so to reduce the duty as to popularize it if possible, and thus rather to increase than diminish the public revenue. He proposed so to alter the fire duty, that in all cases where the premiums charged on insurances against

t the amount of property actually according to the last account 100,000,000, and he contended that 1,100,000,000 uninsured was just property which ought to be insured. It could be insured if this stringent rule were relaxed. The man who had a mill, or gunpowder in his house, or was manufacturing gutta percha, insured his property, but the man who lived in an expensive private house, usually insured himself. "So and so lived here; the house stood long enough; the chance of its being burned." The owners of such houses, however, were well acquainted with the probabilities as actuaries were, and one of these canons was, "That whatever has happened may again happen." The man said; "If we insure our houses we shall pay 200 per cent for taking care of our own property." Indeed, the Government gave them a bonus for not insuring. The Government said to them in 1855, "If you take care of your property, we shall charge you 3s. per cent for doing so." In his own case he found, that it would cost him £7 10s. to insure his property. The Government wanted to charge £15 for the privilege of being insured. The result was that he had no money in his pocket for a long time; and on the whole he felt indebted to the Government for thus forcing him to be his own insurer. Many persons were not able to bear the loss if a fire should at any time occur, and therefore it was the duty of the Legislature to encourage Insurance and remove the obstacles which at present existed to the proper use of prudent protection. A resolution to which he wished to direct the attention of the House was the fact that the amount insured in this country had increased in the same proportion as the national property, for while in 1800, 100,000,000 of value had been insured, in 1855, notwithstanding that the country in the meantime made enormous advances in wealth, the amount insured had reached £800,000,000. Comparing the position of France with that of England on to the subject, he might state that whereas in the latter, after 180 years of experience in the system of Fire Insurance, only £900,000,000 of property was insured, in the former after 33 years the amount reached £1,800,000,000, a sum contrasted with which all the insurances of which we could boast insignificance. But it was not by only that we were surpassed in that. Russia, Germany, and Holland, doing better than England in the direction. The reason was obvious. It so fettered the progress of Insurance that we rendered it difficult for any man to make up his mind to undergo the expense of France with a wiser spirit said, "I will not impose any restrictions on the liberty of our citizens, but will encourage them in every way to effect so excellent an object." The Government of France imposed only a small policy stamp on fire insurances, while we, in addition to a policy stamp, imposed a duty of 3s. per cent. He might in order to show the different results which were produced as a consequence of the different systems adopted in both countries, state, on the authority of a pamphlet entitled The Progress of Fire Insurance, written by Mr. S. Browne, a member of the Statistical Society—that the total amount insured in the largest English office—the Sun, which had been established in 1701—exceeded, in 1859, £140,442,000, exclusive of foreign insurances, the insurances in the largest office in France, which had been established only in 1820, amounted to upwards of £3,000,000. That fact served, in his opinion, conclusively to prove that these insurances, relieved from the trammels by which they were in this country surrounded, would rapidly increase. He might add that the custom prevailed in France of insuring, under the head of risque locatif, the property of one's neighbours, the damage to which, either by the fire or water employed in extinguishing it, the person in whose house the fire originated was liable to make good. The small amount charged for the stamp, and the easiness of the duty, enabled persons to insure against contingencies of that kind, and the consequence was, that property was often insured three or four times over. Again, in France there was a system of insurance to meet the losses which railway companies incurred by reason of injury done to the goods of passengers within a certain distance of their railway lines. That, too, furnished a source of insurance. Even in this country, according to the common law, a person is responsible for the damage which he occasions to his neighbour's property in consequence of a fire upon his premises. He was at a loss to understand why the Government did not turn its attention to this question. It was a well-known fact that persons were in the habit of insuring only a part of their property. A sad instance of that had recently occurred in connection with a valuable building, known as the Sailors' Home and a pool, which was recently destroyed. The amount for which the property was insured was £10,000, whereas the value was £30,000, the managers not daring to trust themselves to insure for the full amount, in consequence of the heavy tax on their income which the Government duty imposed. The French were satisfied of the mistake England had made in the matter of insurance that, desirous to take advantage of it, a French insurance office was established in London, insuring risks at 1s. per cent, and would have been able to take them for less, had it come to the House of Commons putting its veto to the enterprise by an Act of Parliament. It showed the people of this country that they would neither encourage them to do so, nor allow any one else to do so. I assumed that hon. Members understood the system of fire insurance; but to illustrate the working of the tax he would call on all the Members of the House of Commons to be formed into a "mutual" insurance company, in which each contributed to a fund for securing insurance to the amount of £1,000. Suppose a fire to occur, then the sum of £1,000 would be paid to the sufferer, and the Government would take £2,000. But that would not measure the extent of gain by the Government unless the amount of the losses of the insurance companies was considered. They were comparatively few in number, and the Government duty had controlled their operations. Many of the new insurance companies, though they were making £60,000 to £70,000 a year, failed, in consequence of the limited area of their operations. The losses of French companies were hardly 35 per cent; in England they were hardly 60 or 70 per cent loss. In Spain, Germany, countries of which I was not in the habit of speaking with anything like contempt, all excelled England in the extent of their fire insurances. They insured risks as those of Barcelona or Seville, among the best an English office could take. Before the establishment of the present insurance system the loss of a house, a factory, or stock in trade, was met by an appeal to the community at large.

misericordiam That was the old custom, and from custom it became law; and then compensation was demanded as a right. From 1690 to 1696 the first risks were taken at £4 per cent for brick dwellings, and £6 per cent if built of timber. At the present day he did not think they were much more enlightened on the subject than when the old Common Council had the first six policies of insurance stamped before it, with all sorts of solemn forms. So utterly neglectful had the Legislature been of the whole principle of insurance that there was some danger, as property increased, of there not being means enough to insure it. But, if they relaxed the duty, it would enable the English offices to reinsure their risks in foreign offices. But none would take risks to reinsure if they were clogged with a duty. In cases where insurances had not been effected and fires took place, persons were for the most part deprived of whatever property they possessed, and the result unquestionably was to add to the poor rates, and to increase emigration among the industrious classes, thereby violating the first principles of political economy. What were the grounds on which the Government, he understood, were to resist the proposal which he had ventured to make? If they rested their decision on the statements contained in the Report of Mr. Coode, a reference to the journals of the Statistical Society would show that the most important portion of his financial reflections were long since shown to be fallacies. That Gentleman did not put forward a single argument, but proceeded on the assumption that everybody ought to pay the tax, that tradesmen in particular were bound to do so, and that nobody had a right to grumble. If, on the other hand, it were alleged that the Bill which he introduced would disturb the financial arrangements of the year, and interfere with some of the details of that measure which had been drawn up with so much care, and brought before the House in so elaborate and masterly a manner, then he would have a complete answer to the position taken up by Government—namely, that the Bill was not intended to to pass into law until April, 1861, which would be at the end of the present financial year. Six months, at least, must be occupied in passing the Bill through both Houses, and a slight additional delay would make no perceptible difference where the

a proposition which need all on financial grounds. The which he proposed to deal while there were £2,000,000 of taxable property to supply what Gentleman the Chancellor of had called “the chasm;” no doubt that if the imposition of this deficit would be replaced by a policy which would be most beneficial to the House were not already such experiments. This was the policy—the reduction of duties placed themselves—a policy which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had quainted, and the merits of which he had enjoyed opportunities to discuss. It was the same policy which he had at first with great caution adopted, and a reduction of the postal duties was a step such vast advantages and he ventured to say that the House agreed to the reduction of duties from 3s. to 1s. an effect which would be dissimilar would be produced. In answer given to his Motion could not promise to make in April, 1861, knowing in the meantime they had no intention of doing so, and hoping that something would be done which would prevent the being again brought forward. He well that the House and the Government understood one another. Then he detected in the money belonging to another Government, legislating from party motives, in accordance with general principle by means of this duty, a share of the burdens of the commercial and trading imposed a tax of 3s. per cent on property, at the same time a prescription of insurable property on farming stock—had also. So far back as 1836 he had availed themselves of their position as the governing class to relieve the farmers who looked upon the tax as a liability to the duty. [Gentlemen said “No;”] either one on property or income were not a tax on property, but a tax on prudence, forethought, and industry. In fact, it was a tax on virtue, and the first nation which had the courage to inscribe on its fiscal system the word prudence, thought though that property had already property-tax, he would have to pay a stamp on the policy, and 3s. per cent on the amount insured. If 200 workmen insured their tools by which they earned their living, and which might be lost by the conflagration of one house as well as their furniture to the amount of £8,000—£40 each—Parliament would charge them £10 per stamp, and the 3s. per cent. If they went to insure the same amount they would pay the shilling stamp; but the influence of his friends in the House of Commons was powerful enough to get him the 3s. per cent. A rich man insured his house and furniture for £8,000 and 100 working men paid £10 each. He would have to pay but 1s. and 3 per cent. A great deal had been said the present Session about the benefit of the working class in regard to financial matters. It is difficult to see how it had been done. The duties on tea and wine had been consumed by the working class untouched; but the duties on certificates, silks, and wine had been reduced, and the paper duty abolished, so that at present working men were so much better off. It is not to see any particular advantage in these reductions. As to the duty on coal with regard to coals in the Commercial Treaty, they looked on it with alarm, fearing that the increased duty from France might raise the price even higher than it had stood during the long winter. In fact, Parliament had done nothing for the working class, but if they would pass a Bill such as he was now asking leave to introduce, which would allow the working classes to insure their tools and their furniture being charged 400 per cent duties, they would then have done something of which they might be proud. Lest it should be thought that he was propounding a scheme of the mere creation of his own fancy, he stated that the reduction of the duty to one-third, or even one-half, had been advocated by The Builder, and long ago The Times had given a prominent article against the duty, which had attracted much attention. Mr. Culloch and other authorities also were in favour of the reduction of the duty, which was 900 per cent on the profits of insurance companies to one-third of its present amount. Members who voted against this Bill would have to explain that vote to their constituents; and if the Bill were rejected there must then be a re-distribution of tax in an equitable manner, and a universal tax at the rate of 1s. per cent on insurable property. That would produce £2,000,000 a year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his eloquent speech on the introduction of the Budget, stated that a deficiency in the revenue did not constitute a reason why there should be no relaxation from oppressive taxation. He would conclude by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to duty now chargeable on fire insurance.

MR. EDWIN JAMES seconded Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member who moved for leave to bring in a Bill to reduce the duty upon fire insurances explained more than once in the course of his speech of empty benches, and threatened all absentees—some of whom, now appear in their places, will be rested in knowing what was said at the time of their default—with the most serious consequences when they come to their constituents at the next election. In fact, the hon. Gentleman sometimes appealing to landed sympathies, sometimes trading affections, sometimes seeking favour by attacks upon the Budget, sometimes glancing at the peril in which the farmer's exemption will be placed if the tax be not reduced, played most skillfully on all the prejudices and interests by which the human mind can be swayed. My hon. friend however is of a much simpler character, and when the hon. Gentleman talks of indifference of the House upon what he calls exaggerated terms, he calls this all-important subject, I must venture to remind that it is the habit of the House to reject questions, and the necessity of attending to them, not simply by their absolute magnitude and importance, but like all other questions and mainly by the circumstances under which they are submitted to its notice. That, in fact, so far as I am concerned, the whole case which I have to submit I do not intend to enter into the question whether a reduction or alteration of duty upon fire insurances might or might not be a very proper subject for the House to entertain at a period when the state of the national finances presented you with a disposable surplus, or when you were prepared to say, "I think the evil of this is so great that I am prepared to reject it and to provide in lieu of it a substit

n deduct, an rine postage
 is to be cre
 than one-h
 reduction.
 eason again
 Certainly no sustained ha
 by the adv
 hon. Memb
 e in another
 f Commons
 e very thing
 o ; it adopt a revenue t became in sies from y immediate is the illust
 sustain the r as to the e once sac
 use of Com
 r otherwise
 eous, of the posing the es, irrespec
 l to meet t ervice. Th at £430,000
 , it ? And entlemen o r—why ma
 on have bee r duty ? [C
 .] I will n
 en dealing ll simply sa
 sion, and t en away the son why we
 e. If we ha y rate we ha
 provision of
 e. But th
 after what h
 he paper d
 re, and nua
 place, exce
 . I will proc
 s of the hon
 t in an imm
 That prov unfortunate
 it; and, if
 , if the Ho
 to it, and
 , we found
 at air, that w
 t the Rich

the means for meeting the demands of public service, could we challenge the hon. Gentleman with the failure of his prophecy? He would say, and truly say, that the prophecy and the opinion I expressed were unsound, it was your fault to believe them." The promise of the hon. Member would be no justification to the House for adopting the step he proposes. The hon. Gentleman, although his speech was eloquent, did not enter upon, but, on the contrary, most slightly touched, that the subject in which it was most important for him to be laborious and search for facts, and most careful in his assertions. He told us that there is 2,000 millions of insurable property in this country at present uninsured. A statement of such magnitude, more entirely in the nature of an individual assertion, never was submitted to the House. He has no data, no authority for that statement. Undoubtedly, it is a matter of great difficulty to bring evidence to combat an assertion so bold and difficult to lay hold of, but I have some data for a decision on this question. Although the hon. Member does not attach any authority to his statement, yet that gentleman is as able, as diligent, searching an investigator as I have allied his mind to dry questions of fact. What does he tell us? He tells us that there are not 3,000 millions, but 1,000 millions of the real amount of insurable property in the country. The schedules of the income tax, especially Schedule A, the valuation, and due allowance being made for lands which are uninsurable, as well as house property, do to some extent give us approximate evidence; and there is 1,000 millions or 1,200 millions or 1,400 millions, of property in the country which can be insured; but the fact that 3,000 millions is the amount, is the notion of dreamers and speculators, rather than a serious assertion which should be submitted to a deliberation of the House. The hon. Member places a value of £430,000, the immediate effect of what he invites the House to do, and, again, is an opinion of the hon. Member; and I only wish to say I do not intend to become responsible for it. The official means of knowing; the facts are not framed in such a manner, that the mode in which the tax is levied would enable me to tell the House what portion of the total insurances are at premiums below 5s. The hon. Member says that one-half only of the risks are at premiums below 5s. I cannot say that it is at much more. But the question is as to this great promised increase of revenue. The first effect, assuming his proposition only to affect one-half of the revenue from fire insurances—that is, about £650,000 or £700,000—by reducing the present rate of duty to 1s., appears to be to reduce the revenue about £430,000. He says we shall have a revenue from the moiety of £220,000 or £230,000; and the question is, how is this £230,000 to replace the £430,000, which is given up, and then, when that is done, and then only it will begin to fulfil the brilliant and cheering promise of the hon. Gentleman of an increase on the public revenue. According to that we shall have an increase of 30 per cent in insured property of the class affected by the Motion. To fulfil the promise, we must have a threefold increase the first year. Surely, to give us the slightest shadow of hope or expectation of such a result, the hon. Gentleman ought to show, by returns or figures, how he calculates the astonishing increase which he prophesies. He has avoided that point which is so essential upon the difference between us; for I am not arguing upon the merits of the duty, but of the necessity of having a revenue adequate to meet public charges. I say the proper time for the House to consider the removal of this duty is not the time when you have disposed of all that was at your disposal; but the proper time is when you are balancing estimates and revenue, and when you find that you have a surplus. There is, however, some evidence to which we can refer. The hon. Member says he does not take away revenue, but that he will give us more. To give us the present revenue the insured property at risks below 5s. must be multiplied threefold, or the total quantity must be doubled within the year. Is it a fact, in the first place, that the quantity of property insured does not increase under the present duty? and, next, is it a fact that a rapid and enormous increase takes place when the duty is removed? We have the means from Mr. Coode's report of answering that question from public returns. I would call the attention of the House to the simple intelligible passage of the report. The hon. Gentleman has referred, in terms unnecessarily invidious, to the exemption which is enjoyed by farming property. But that exemption has this advantage, at least that it enables us to bring to a test the promise of the hon. Gentleman, and to it ourselves in some degree of what there is of the rapid and astonishing increase which he holds out to us, there cannot be such an increase, there does not exist the property re. Mr. Coode at page 41 of his says,— the first year in which you have separate valuation of the value of farming stock insured first year of the exemption—it was 37½

In 1856 it had risen to 62½ millions, or an increase of 67 1-5th per cent in 22 years."

is a rise of nearly 3 per cent per annum, instead of 300 per cent per annum, and that is the breakdown of the statistics of the hon. Gentleman. These official figures as respects the proportion of the quantity of property insured in those districts where there was no duty at all, and where there was a duty at all.

When you have besides the means of comparison from official figures, the increase in the value of property in those descriptions of property that were subject to the duty.

In 1834 there remained of property subject to the duty £483,000,000, and in 1856 that property subject to the duty had increased from £483,000,000 to £1,000,000,000—that is to say, it had increased in 22 years by 65 per cent. The difference in the rate of increase between property that paid nothing at all and property that paid 3s. per cent, which the hon. Gentleman calls on the House to consider, is, that the exempt property increased in 22 years 67 1-5th per cent, and the property that paid 3s. per cent increased 65 5-6ths per cent, and the difference between them is 1-3rd per cent, and that not in one year, but spread over a period of 22 years.

When you break down the case of the hon. Gentleman and ends in a total and ruinous case. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the case of France, and stated that, as in England we have only insured property to the amount of £9,000,000, whereas they have property insured to the amount of £18,000,000, and he went on to infer from that, that if we only adopted the rule of abolishing duties we should have a vast increase and a larger quantity of property insured than there is at present.

But the different mode pursued by insurance offices abroad to that pursued by insurance offices in England would most the effect of compelling persons to insure their property up to the full value. In England, on the contrary, now that all property insured against fire is at least two-thirds, or, at all events, is considerably short of the full value of the property. The hon. Gentleman has also said that from the statistics of the houses in France, the interests of the man were more bound up in regard to questions of fire with those of his labour than is the case in this country; and the expression used by the hon. Gentleman was, "in France the same property is insured three or four times over."

That he so, then, he cannot argue from the operation of the French law, because in England there is no such law, and if a fire arise in the house of A, and spread to the house of B, the losses of B will be charged upon A. I think I have dealt with the statement of the hon. Gentleman, so far as any argument is involved in it. There is one other point which is material I should notice. The hon. Gentleman, in his generosity to the country, which he knows is one of the burthen, proposes to postpone this change and to fix its operation to commence on the first day of the financial year 1860.

I do not hesitate to say, if there were no other objection to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, having regard to the circumstances in which he makes it, that it would be a conclusive reason why the House should not adopt it; for there is no other course, or one more calculated to damage the character of Parliament than to suffer itself to be tempted and led into the habit of attempting to gain popularity in one year at the expense of the financial operations of another. Occasionally, it is true, such a course is adopted from the necessity of the case; you have a great transition to make; you have complicated arrangements that require time for their adjustment; and in those cases it has been the practice of the House from necessity to postpone and to postpone the effect of changes that it is bound to make, but under no other circumstances can you collect the House to have had recourse to such a step. This is one of those cases which, if it is to be dealt with at all, must be dealt with at the moment the proposal is made; and if the hon. Gentleman is in saying that the proposed reduction will increase the insured property 300 per cent in a year, though the official figures show that the increase will only be about one-third as much; if he is right in the premises he draws of the almost millennial stream which he expects to flow into every part of the country throughout England from the adoption of this project; granting him the whole of this enormous demand, still there is a vast increase and a larger quantity of property insured than there is at present. But the different mode pursued by insurance offices abroad to that pursued by insurance offices in England would most the effect of compelling persons to insure their property up to the full value. In England, on the contrary, now that all property insured against fire is at least two-thirds, or, at all events, is considerably short of the full value of the property. The hon. Gentleman has also said that from the statistics of the houses in France, the interests of the man were more bound up in regard to questions of fire with those of his labour than is the case in this country; and the expression used by the hon. Gentleman was, "in France the same property is insured three or four times over."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

rection to be made to his speech—that it is a speech made at ten at night on the 4th May, 1860; only reserve that speech and re- it bodily some day in February or 1861, and then the House of Com- ill, I won't say be in a position le to this proposition, but, at any will be in the possession of the ne- information to enable it to judge or not it should accede to that ion. The hon. Gentleman has ed hon. Members with the ven- of their constituents, a course of think they have some reason to a if they think fit. I think it is air to put hon. Members in the of either being obliged to vote in support of a proposition which ous because it is ill-timed, or else g to record their votes against the of a tax the remission of which, ou have the means of making it, a perfectly fair question for the o consider. For these reasons I e House will not accede to the MALINS said, the right hon. Gen- had made the best speech against Budget he had ever heard, and he elated the hon. Member for Dudley (Meridan) that he had elicited so ve- a speech against the proposition made, for that was the best assur- could have that he would succeed ing his object next year. The on. Gentleman had addressed the in the same tone of earnestness ht against the repeal of this duty y some short time ago he (Mr. heard him address to it against al of the paper duty. The right ntleman then pointed out to them inconveniences which would re-

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-
When was that?

MALINS: He was not quite sure. last year or the year before.

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-
It was neither.

MALINS: If the right hon. Gen- who was as impatient of inter- as any man he knew—

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-
If the hon. Gentleman will allow ay I consider it only a matter of and fairness, when any hon. Gen- is heard making a mis-statement gard to matter of fact, to assume that it is the result of pure error, at once to set him right.

Mr. MALINS said, none would be ready to make such an assumption th himself; and he was about to say- the right hon. Gentleman was so impa—that time passed so rapidly, and had not armed himself from the pag Hansard, he really was not able to whether it was last year or the yea fore; but this at least hon. Member knew—that this very Session the hon. Gentleman had recanted every he had previously said in respect to paper duties. That being the case (Mr. Malins) cared not whether it was year or another that the right hon. tleman had used the argument, but he used it in opposition to the repeal of duties which he had this year propose repeal, although he had not repealed yet. He (Mr. Malins) entertained a distinct and decided opinion on the tion before the House, and he could as the right hon. Gentleman that his vote not influenced by any fear of his c- tuents, who left him on that, as upon subjects, to exercise his unbiassed j ment. In acceding to the Motion he be to assure the right hon. Gentleman he had no intention to embarrass hi Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he (Malins) did not deny the expediency o proposition which the right hon. Gentl had laid down, not to pass measures w would interfere with the revenue of country in future years. He had no pection or wish that any progress w be made with the Bill which the Member for Dudley desired to introdu indeed, if he obtained leave to bring it Bill he should advise him to proce further with it that Session—but he tended to make the present Motion a portunity of recording his opinion tha duty on fire insurances ought to be red at the earliest convenient moment. duty was one which pressed heavily the public; it was most inexpedient i nature and most unjustifiable in its aim and the result was that almost every prietor was under-insured. Neverthe he was afraid that the hon. Membe Dudley would not effect his object un got a seat in the Cabinet, for a duty not now repealed or reduced because i pressed the public and embarrassed t. but because it was disliked by a Min of the Crown. The paper duty had e embarrassed trade, nor was it felt by

of poor
 ir imple-
 'tisan was can or the scourge-
 e amount a availing
 nurance.
 ented the hey ought
 The Eng-
 d a com-
 in which to exist ;
 ation that arbitrary
 exercising
 'The sys-
 immoral.
 uired that property,
 l just prin-
 was arbiived from age in re-
 the State or any of
 of firea.
 securities
 -they had ibility, all
 ; the busi-
 ll that so-
 the State, d not the ge to the
 For every
 ity, I ask icious or uence the
 was only
 t amount or of the onvenient
 nt season
 it would n be like a e House n
 they had
 book, by ight hon.
 to for the structions
 rero possieelings of e the cry
 —

olicy, there
 amount of er mischief

produced solely by the operation of the facilities which the system of insurance affords to fraud, the whole of which fraud and mischief would be impossible but for the opportunities afforded to the insurance offices."

After that extract he put it to the House to consider what sort of authority Mr. Coode was? His evidence, if worth anything, went to prove that the whole system of insurance was objectionable, and the fruitful source of fraud and mischief. The House could hardly be prepared to support such a paradox. He trusted that the principles proposed by the hon. Member for Dudley would receive the support of the House.

MR. BAXTER said, he rose to ask whether his hon. Friend would accede to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), if leave was given to bring in the Bill, not proceed further with it this Session. [Cries of "No, no."] He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Dudley, but he saw great difficulty in proceeding now to legislate for 1861-62. His vote would be very much guided by the answer of his hon. Friend. He should, before sitting down, congratulate the House on the accession of the hon. Member for Wallingford to the cause of abolition, because that hon. and learned Member was one of those who voted against the introduction of the Bill last year in the month of March.

MR. MALINS explained that he did not vote against the measure referred to, but only suggested that it should be withdrawn because it was too late in the Session for the hon. Member to hope that he could pass a Bill containing 150 clauses.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he would recommend the hon. Member not to press his Motion, but at the same time he hoped the Government would give the House a pledge that they would take the subject into their serious consideration. There was a large class of persons in the Metropolis and in the country who might be a fire loss their all, but who were deterred from insuring when the sum which they had to pay was almost in the shape of a penalty. When they looked also to the effect which the loss of his tools might have on the artisan, they must be convinced what a serious matter this was to a very large class. The question could not possibly continue in its present position, especially when a large share of the property of the country—to the amount of £80,000,000—was exempt altogether from the tax. They must either revise number of ected in all subject was Committee

inquire into Metropolitan investigation
of a blue-
y instituted
the Metro-
established,
ng with reughfares of ever, now
of drainage,
ion of high-sewers. If would be no ne west-end
two years;
erials from wage would e principal
Mr. Bazal-sewer along occurred in but, owing ed, it was t along the
tant, therenbankment taken in-na hitherto on opposed nmittee for ed, it would
so magnifient, so far nbanco the harfingers.
a now pro-
their lines;
ment of the
ose compa-
ise it could tion of Lon-
years 1811
2,362,000;
reach close nd out from e year was 1,500,000
,574,809;
stern Coun-
n their ter-
h-Eastern, 122; and
o that the ssed in and
by the varies.]

rious termini was upwards of 30,000,000
and, although many of them travelled only short distances, it was manifest
in going to and from the railway stati
they must enormously swell the traffic
the crowded thoroughfares of London.
believed the Select Committee would port in favour of the execution of this g
work, and then would come the questio
the means to be provided for that obj
That was the great difficulty, but one wh
he thought might be overcome. The tropolitan Board of Works proposed expend on the making of the low-l sewer a sum of £221,000, and that wo
of course, form part of the embankm scheme. The Board of Conservancy of Thames were also most anxious that undertaking should be accomplished,
were willing to consider whether a portio
the revenue to be obtained from reclaim land might not be applied to that purp
In his opinion this was not a local an Imperial question. ["No, no."] H Members might say "No," but he put i the House whether the saving of time
the vast numbers of people who were the habit of passing to and fro in Lon
which would be effected by this scheme not a sufficient reason why the Impe Exchequer ought to contribute to its e cution. Large grants were made for improvement of various ports in the ki
dom, and he did not see why there shd
not also be a grant for improving the n gation of the Thames. In order to es
the sewage of the Metropolis down to Ba ing Creek a large quantity of water wo have to be withdrawn from the Than
and the embankment would therefore required to put the river in a proper c dition for the purposes of navigation. T embankment would be extremely valu
in a sanitary point of view, both by s plying a fine public walk, and facilitat
the cleansing of the river.

Motion made, and Question proposed

"That a Select Committee be appointed to sider the best means of providing for the incr
ing traffic of the Metropolis by the Embank of the Thames."

MR. COWPER said, he thought House would have no objection to Motion of the hon. Gentleman. It did require any argument to show the cessity of free communication betw Charing-cross and London-bridge. No who had driven in a carriage along crowded thoroughfare of the Strand

to the necessity of making the in-
 on without loss of time, and begged st that much advantage might re-
 the appointment of a Royal Com-
 to consider the subject of Metro-railways, in order to prevent their up the City in every possible va-angle and in the most ridiculous
 He altogether despaired of any Committee doing justice to this

AYRTON said, he thought they
 e troubled with monthly discussions
 ets of this nature unless they would
 to create some municipality that al with them on an intelligible and
 e. The only proper body to the introduction of railways
 opolis and the embankment ras a municipality. It was mproper mode of proceeding elect Committee to deal with
 , and then to consider how x the inhabitants in order to
 it was deemed a very inteobject. The right hon. Genrst Commissioner of Works nt to this Committee just to subject. They had no earthly h it, and the manner in which ustomed to deal with such as showed a capacity which was y remarkable. The Board had no
 f responsibility; and they threw atters over to a Select Committee,
 o one was responsible. The House decline to entertain such proposi-
 together, except in a comprehensive a body elected by the inhabitants property, which should protect the
 well as the other in all these im-questions. He also objected to the ition of the coal tax.

DEEDES said, he thought someight to be done, but could not agree perial money should be spent on project. The right hon. Gentled not say positively that no public would be devoted to that object,
 thought he ought to say so at once.
 they pointed out at whose expense
 k was to be undertaken, the inquiry lead to no positive result. There be a Royal Commission appointed
 ider the various important questions
 d in this subject.

OUNT PALMERSTON said, he
 not agree in the opinion of the hon.
 er for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayr-
 the inefficiency of Select Committees. On the contrary, he thought a Comittee a very good instrument to exam-fundamental propositions, and to extr-

 from witnesses those facts upon wh conclusions might be safely founded.]
 hon. Friend reverted always to his o proposal, that there should be a munici-body to represent the whole Metropo-
 It was a very fit subject to propose to House as a separate question, but he co-
 not concede that it had any direct appli-tion to the Motion which they were r discussing. There was a body whi with regard to these works, did correspo-
 very much with the notions of his h Friend. The Board of Works were pressly empowered to raise by local tation the funds necessary for improve-connected with the Metropolis. In vir-of these powers they were making tunn-
 and charging the expense upon the r-
 which they were in the habit of levyi-
 They had the means, therefore, of contributing very effectually to the expenses
 this operation. His hon. Friend had fo-fault with the department of the Govement which, before the appointment of Board of Works, was charged with arrangement of the sewers. The res-the department of the Government not able to construct the sewers was cause they had not the power to raise money. It was not that the Governwere unable to devise a plan for drain-
 the Metropolis and preventing the sew-going into the Thames, because the pat last adopted by the Board of Wwas the same plan which the Govern-thought efficient and proper for the pose. He should certainly object to addition to the Motion proposed by
 hon. Member opposite, because all mat-connected with the subject were natu-
 included in a reference to a Committee.
 was, however, quite prepared to make the assertion of his right hon. Friend, the Committee was not to expect that recommendation of theirs would have effect of bringing towards the expendi-
 the operation any vote of public mo-because he was sure the House would agree to expend any portion of pu-revenue on these local improvements
 the Metropolis. The hon. Gentleman o-to go into the Committee with the understanding that, whatever the cost part of it would be defrayed out of revenue of the country at large. B-might be that the Committee might t-some fund could be formed and some n

these cases. The House was all in possession of evidence upon evidence, and estimate after estimate, and the Committee could but produce results exactly similar. The real obstacle was the enormous cost of buying the local interests of those who owned the banks of the river. Still, it was an amusement to the hon. Member for Coventry to sit on the Committee, as far as his (Lord Lovelock's) vote was concerned; but it must be understood that he had no grant of money from the Treasury to the scheme of

Mr. ETO said, the Metropolitan Committee was committed to the expenditure of £1,000 on the drainage of the metropolis. The ratepayers were already paying rates levied. They were not likely to contemplate feelings the present temptations at dealing with the magnitude were but play-acting, unless a master mind and means equal to the task. The works to be undertaken were unbecomingly. He did not wish to see an Imperial régime into which he could not help rethe puny, hap-hazard spirit with which our Government shrank from dealing with great questions when he saw the monuments which had been effected in London. He had seen something of the scale and details of the vast buildings which had been erected there of late years from a private source, and had been struck with the order, detail, and arrangement that prevailed. In England, on the contrary, we suffered an agglomeration of houses to stand in the way of this improvement, and were deterred from any impediments originating in arrangements dating from the time of Edward.

All that was required was, that the Government would deal with the question in a spirit worthy of itself; and all that was needed was, that the noble Lord Chamberlain for Tiverton should carry it in the same firm manner in which he carried the Smoke Bill, which reflected upon him. It was in that way that it had been made an object of attraction to the whole world. It was useless for the Committee to commence the inquiry with their hands tied up. It was decided that they should neither be at liberty to recommend direct nor indirect tax, and any person who knew anything of the Metropolis must be aware that it would submit to additional imposts. Until the House and the Government were prepared to deal with the question in a better way, they ought not to touch it at all; it would be more judicious to allow the Consolidation Bill, like many other measures, to drift.

LORD FERMOY said, it was of no use referring the question to a Committee unless the main difficulty were solved, and the money raised. The Committee must be untrammelled in their recommendations, or their Report would bind the hands of the members of the Committee, but they must inquire as to the cost, and say where the money was to come from. The members of the Metropolis would object to the cost, and why ought not the country to contribute to it? His right Friend said that the sewer referred to would pull down Somerset House, and even St. Paul's Cathedral. If there was any such danger, it was time, in his opinion, to stop the sewer altogether.

Question, "That those words be added," put, and negatived.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, that he supported the Motion of the hon. Member for Coventry, but even in the Metropolis there were differences of opinion upon the subject.

Mr. COWPER said, that the chief object of the Metropolitan Works was to improve the drainage of the metropolis in favour of the appointment of the Committee.

Original Question put, and agreed to.
House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday.

HOUSE OF LORDS

Monday, May 7, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1. Bank of England Bill.

STATUTE CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented the Report of the Select Committee on the Consolidation of the Statute Criminal Law, which the several Bills for the consolidation of the Statute Criminal Law were referred; stating that the Committee

USE OF COMMONS,

Monday, May 7, 1860.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Labourers' Cottages (Scotland).
 Fishment Houses and Wine Licences; (Ireland); Nuisances Removal and Prevention.
 Poor Law Amendment Bill (£13,230,000).

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

R. said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Secretary of State for War has recently been made aware that Volunteer Officers are not to have rank at Court, and if so, whether His Majesty's Government will reject, and allow to such Officers rank at Court?

HERBERT said, he had just been in answer to a similar question, his hon. and gallant Friend (Mr. Herbert) said that no such order had been issued. He had since seen a notice in the Standard at Liverpool, at which he expressed a great grievance that official volunteer corps were not allowed to wear their uniform. He could not see any unqualified contradiction to that. Every one present at the last meeting must have noticed a considerable number of volunteer officers present in their

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI wished to know if the Secretary of the House for to-morrow will be the Government in the order that appears on the Paper; or whether any change will be made? He referred especially to the adjourned debate on the Paper Duty Bill.

MR. GEORGE LEWIS said, in reply, that the Government had no power in regard to the Orders for Tuesday; but if his hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not bring on the Paper Duty Bill (Sir George Lewis) would proceed with the London Corporation Bill. If, on the other hand, the Paper Duty debate resumed, the latter Bill would be postponed.

MR. DISRAELI: That was the very question respecting which he wanted information, because the Corporation Bill preceded the Paper Duty Bill on the list of Orders.

ORDER OF THE BATH.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Secretary of State for War has not sent to him the names of certain Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army who have for their distinguished services been recommended by the Governor General of India and the Commander-in-Chief for the Companionship of the Bath; and if so, why this honour has not been conferred, and whether there be any objection to the names being recorded in The Gazette?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied, that the names of Officers, both in the Queen's service and in that of the East India Company, had been sent home with recommendations that those Officers should receive the Order of the Bath; but as the number were at this moment considerably in excess of that fixed by the statute their names had not been submitted to Her Majesty, and it would not be a correct course to publish them in The Gazette before they had received the Order, which he hoped would be before long.

IRISH ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.
 QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland when it is intended to introduce the Bill for the better Regulation of the Irish Ecclesiastical Commission. He also wished to know whether it is intended to bring in a measure to transfer the powers of the Commission of Wide Streets in Dublin to the Corporation of the City?

MR. CARDWELL said, in answer to the first question, a Bill would be introduced in the other House in the course of the present week. In reply to the second question he could only say that no notice had been given.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.
 QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Dundalk whether he intends to proceed with the Bill respecting Roman Catholic Charities, upon which the Secretary of State for the Home Department has informed the House that the hon. Member has been in communication with the Government?

MR. BOWYER said, he wished it to be distinctly understood that there had been no delay on his part. The House was the intention of the Government to see it in a short time, but there was before a Select Committee of the House of Parliament for the amendment and consolidation of the Laws relating to forgery; and he was informed that there was an intention to introduce a clause in that measure in reference to the forgery of trade marks. That being so, the Government would wait to see that Bill, and they brought forward their own.

POPS FOR CHINA.—QUESTION.

STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State, whether any additional number of troops have been sent to or placed under arms for China beyond the number stated in the House by the Secretary of State for India on the 24th day of February last; and the amount of the addition, if any; whether it has been made by the despatch of troops from India or from this country. Also, what arrangement has been made for the wives and families of the troops despatched from India to China; whether, in consequence of any additional troops, it will be necessary for the Government to apply to Parliament in the next Session for an additional Vote of money on account of the Chinese Expe-

SIDNEY HERBERT said, in answer to the question of the hon. Baronet, he would state first what was the amount of troops mentioned by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India on the 24th of February last as being about to be despatched to China from India. There were five regiments of European Infantry, probably two additional British regiments amounting in the whole to 7,484 men; the five regiments would include 5,000 men, and the two additional regiments 2,484 men. He said there would be five regiments of irregular Native Infantry, consisting of about 4,000 men; a regiment of Native Cavalry, of 400 men; and two companies of Madras Sepoys amounting together to 200 men; making in all 4,600. So that the British troops consisting of 7,484, and the Native troops of 4,600, would make a total of 12,084. But his right hon. Friend did not mention, owing to the form in which the question was put to him, what he (Mr. Herbert) would now state—namely, that there were likewise going from India four battalions of Royal Artillery, consisting of 814 men; one company of Royal Engineers, of 124 men; and two squadrons of Dragoon Guards, of 328 men; making a total of 1,266. These, added to the former sum, made an aggregate of 13,350 men. One regiment, however, of the Native forces, they had heard by the last mail had been stopped, and it was possible that other regiments had been stopped. Only the day before yesterday they heard that one regiment had been detained in consequence of receiving counter orders. He would add now the numbers of the troops which had been despatched from England; they consisted of one battalion of the Military Train, 289 men; two battalions of Royal Artillery (Armstrong guns), 444 men; the 2nd Regiment of Foot, from the Cape, 845 men; together, 1,578. That added to the totals stated before, made 14,928. From that must be deducted however, for over-estimate of the forces already stated, about 1,000 men, making the whole of the available force about 14,000 in round numbers, irrespective, of course, of the garrison at Hong Kong. With respect to the wives and children of those regiments which had been despatched to China from India, the moment the Government here heard that the India Government contemplated sending them to England, the Government at home telegraphed to India desiring the Government to keep there all the wives and children of the regiments despatched from India to China until further orders. With reference to the question of additional forces for China, it would be impossible to foresee what would be the course of future events; but if it should be such as to lead to a commencement of hostilities, and to a protraction of operations, then certainly due notice would be given to the House of any Motion that might become necessary to meet that state of things.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. DISRAELI said, with respect to the order of business for to-morrow, he would point out that, though a Notice Day, the House will probably at a comparatively early hour reach the Orders of the Day, all which were Government Bills; now he wanted to know whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government intends to proceed with the Bills in the order in which they stand on the Paper, or whe-

WALTER AND MR. HORSMAN.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

WALTER:—Sir, I rise to move a motion of adjournment of the House for the purpose of enabling myself to make a personal explanation. It is with extreme reluctance that I venture to trouble the House with a personal matter, but I conceive that it is the right to be informed of any circumstance affecting the position and independence of one of its Members; and, as a reason to complain of an attempt to be made by the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) to place me in a false position as a Member of this House, and to impair my freedom of speech, I come to ask its indulgence for a few minutes while I state the nature of my complaint; and I feel confident that, when I have heard my statement, it will be of opinion that no other course was open to me than that which I have pursued. Sir, on Friday evening last I ventured to address the House in the debate on the Reform Bill; and on the following Wednesday I received from the right hon. Member for Stroud the following letter, which contains the grounds for an attack on me in this House, though circumstances prevented him from fulfilling his intention, is public property, and I have the right to read it to the House. It struck me as the more extraordinary, because, up to the moment when I received it, I had no reason to suppose that my relations with the right hon. Gentleman were otherwise than of a friendly character. The letter is as follows:—

"1, Richmond Terrace, May 2.

"I think it right to request that you will be good enough to come to my place to-morrow, when the debate on the Reform Bill is resumed, as I intend to speak in support of the suggestion you made on Monday, that the passing of the Bill should not be followed by an early dissolution. And I feel the more anxious to do this, as the same suggestion was made with my name in a leading article of the Times of that day, in which I am personally attacked for no other purpose but as illustrative of the general meanness of the House of Commons. The Member selected by The Times to whom to offer an insult to the House of Commons more gross than any yet offered by Mr. Horsman, whom you rebuked, I feel called upon to make as publicly as it was made, a description of the character and sentiments of the House of Commons. Every Member of it will repel as indignantly as I do myself.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"EDWD. HORSMAN.

Walter, Esq., M.P.

Now, in this letter the House will see that a distinct charge is made of using language in my debate which, taken in connection with the language used in a leading article of a public journal, the right hon. Member supposes to convey an imputation on the character of the House of Commons. In this letter I addressed the right hon. Member as follows:—

"40, Upper Grosvenor Street.

"Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your extraordinary letter which I received last evening at a public meeting, which, as I shall of course be in attendance at to-night, I need make no further mention of.

"I have the honour to remain

"Your most obedient

"J.

In consequence of the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman, I attended the meeting at his place on Thursday evening from 4 o'clock till half-past 7. The right hon. Gentleman was in his room, and did not rise to address the House. He intimated to me at half-past 7 that he intended to find his rising to address the House at that time would lead to an adjournment of the debate and cause great inconvenience, he had abandoned his intention of speaking. Here, perhaps, I may ask why did I not allow myself to drop? Sir, I felt it impossible to drop. After having been present and heard the charges against me in reference to my conduct made by me in this House, and in reference to comments on the same elsewhere, I felt that I could not allow the right hon. Gentleman to hold a weapon that he might use at any time at his convenience. I, therefore, this morning wrote the following letter to the right hon. Gentleman:—

"40, Upper Grosvenor Street.

"Sir,—I cannot help thinking of Wednesday, which occasioned my rising in the House last evening to no purpose, as I have been written in a moment of anger under circumstances of misapprehension. Your better judgment may have led me to do so, if so, I shall be happy to receive from you to that effect; if not, I shall be under a duty to bring your letter and the contents of it under the notice of the House at the earliest opportunity.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your most obedient

"J.

"Right Hon. E. Horsman, M.P.

I waited at home till half-past 7 on Friday afternoon for a re-

tive on that point it was because I never before had the opportunity which the right hon. Gentleman has now afforded me, which I could not have made for myself, and without which I could not volunteer the statement I now make,—that my connection with The Times newspaper, although of a nature which makes me feel the deepest interest in its concerns, is not of an editorial character, and does not involve any responsibility on my part for any opinion or statement which it contains. If the right hon. Gentleman wants any more information, all I can say is that I have not got it to give him; nor can I be responsible for any conjectures which public gossip or the imagination of any private individual may lead him to form on the subject. I have thought it due alike to the House and to myself to offer this explanation, and, having done so, I will only say in conclusion that in the event of any similar attack being directed against me I shall take no notice of it whatever.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, if the hon. Member for Berkshire felt great reluctance in bringing this matter before the House, I can assure him and the House of my unfeigned regret that he has felt it his duty to take the course he has now adopted. I do so not on my own account. I freely confess that I would willingly and anxiously have avoided this discussion, for I feel that the statement which the hon. Member now compels me to make must give some pain to a Gentleman for whom personally I entertain feelings of respect and esteem; and no word shall fall from me to add to the unpleasant feeling which a controversy of this description must under any circumstances produce. As all that has passed between the hon. Member and myself has taken place by correspondence, I will leave that correspondence to tell its own tale. The hon. Gentleman has read only a portion of that correspondence, and he has left it to me to read the rest. The hon. Member read the first of those letters; but if he had read on, the House would see that in a subsequent letter I qualified some of the expressions I used in the first; and, so far as I could, I think I rendered it unnecessary to bring the matter before the House. I warned the hon. Gentleman, however, that if the question were brought before the House it must give pain which I would not willingly be the instrument of inflicting; and that, as far as I was concerned, I would rather the matter should be settled by personal explanation without these walls than by a public discussion here. These efforts of mine failed. I regret extremely that they failed, but I do not regret that I made them, because the responsibility of the course I am compelled to take in my own vindication rests upon the friends and advisers of the hon. Gentleman, and not upon me. While I am as ready as the hon. Member to assert the independence of the press, and as anxious to maintain it, I utterly repudiate as false and mischievous that doctrine of responsibility which the hon. Gentleman has set up; and before I sit down I shall have, I am afraid, to show that the hon. Gentleman is personally and directly responsible for every letter and every word of that article to which I have taken exception. The facts are these:—On taking my place on Monday I was told by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) that there was a rumour of a compromise on the Reform Bill; that there was to be a £16 franchise for counties, an £8 for boroughs, and an engagement that there was to be no dissolution of the House for two years. I ought to repeat that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon merely mentioned this as a rumour; but the postponement of the dissolution for two years was openly discussed as a sop to the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Berkshire afterwards rose and addressed the House, and in the course of his speech appeared to me to countenance and advocate that mode of settlement of the question. I do not say he intended to do so; but when he came to the dissolution and the postponement of the Bill, what the hon. Gentleman said was received with ironical cheers and laughter from different parts of the House, and the House evidently fixed that interpretation upon it which the rumour mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend assigned. That same morning there appeared in The Times an article from which I will read an extract. The writer is speaking of the Reform Bill:—

“There are certain Gentlemen in the House whose seats are secure, and whose elections cost them nothing, and whose nature it is to make hustings speeches, who would just as soon it passed as not. There are also a few Conservative leaders who have never ceased to regret their own folly in committing themselves to any reform, and who would perhaps buy a release from this most disagreeable pledge even at the expense of an interview with their constituents. But, with these exceptions, the passing of this Reform Bill means money out of pocket, a month of hard, disagreeable work, and possibly a fall from the Parliamen-

I have not the slightest disposition to compel the reading of the letter. As I was concerned, I deprecated the which the hon. Gentleman has now told me to pursue, and warned him that it would be painful to others. I hope, therefore, the House will bear with me. I read this letter, and be kind enough to say that it is not a voluntary act on my part, but one which has been forced upon me by the challenge which the hon. Gentleman has given me to-day. I should have said first that the letter of the hon. Gentleman was delivered at my house early in the morning, before I was up. As soon as I read it, with a number of other Members, I hurriedly wrote a reply in order that the hon. Gentleman might receive it at the meeting of the House. He had, however, left home before my letter arrived, and therefore he received it at the House of Commons. My letter was as follows:

—I did not write to you under feelings of rebuke, and still less of irritation, and I feel the smallest regret to express on that point. If my requesting your attendance in the House put you to inconvenience, I erred through want of courtesy, which requires notice to be given to Members whose speeches are to be pointed out. As soon as I found I could not do without risk of causing an adjournment, I thought it courteous to inform you that I meant to do that intention. It was quite open to you to have objected then or later in the evening, or to have resumed, from the early hour at which your speech was delivered, that it was written before the House closed last night, and I should have been glad to adopt the course which it now appears to have been more satisfactory to you, if you had returned to the House and apprised me of it. Our note now conveys what I intended to do, and my reasons for doing so. I was much surprised when you suggested in your speech, as an accompaniment to the passing of the Reform Bill, that the dissolution should be deferred; and it appeared to me that no one could misunderstand what it conveyed as to the influence by which the House was to be influenced. I only on Wednesday morning that, alluding to a conversation to your suggestion, I was informed that it had been made previously in The Times, and on referring to the file I for the first time noticed the article of Monday, the day on which you spoke. I intended, in noticing the various arguments and motives urged for the passing of the Bill, to have alluded particularly to your suggestion about a dissolution, as conveying, in my opinion, a very disparaging and injurious estimate of the Members of the House of Commons; and I should have added that, although your sentiments were clothed in the language of a Gentleman, and though you were your own capable of language inconsistent with your personal character and position, it was extremely to be regretted that a member of your own body should seem to imply such motives in your speech that must tend to give weight and authority to the same sentiment expressed elsewhere in coarser terms and a more offensive spirit. I should then have read the passage in The Times—not in any way connecting you with it, or making you responsible for it, any more than I should have made Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell responsible for an article to which I charged them with giving weight and authority by adopting its substance. I will not, however, be so uncharitable as to deny that in my own mind there would have been a connection between your speech and the article, and that it might and would probably have been suggested to the minds of others, and that, unnaturally, for I remember that in a speech to your constituents at Nottingham you avowed a connection with The Times, and stated, with good taste and delicacy, that you felt that connection embarrassed you in your desire to take a part in the debates in Parliament. I should have made no further allusion to you—beyond that one regret that the speech of one of our own body should appear, to however small an extent, to give weight to aspersions and imputations which the House made elsewhere, and I should have gone on to say that if this insult were to be offered to the House, I did not regret that I should have brought in as an example to prove the rule as to the depth of baseness to which Members of Parliament would descend to retain their seats, and I gave me the opportunity of submitting some general observations to the House on the relation of the public press to the institutions of the country, and especially to the House of Commons, that are now reforming; and as I believe you to be the proprietor of The Times, the leader in the councils, and more than any other man responsible for its acts, I think I may do the public good service if I can now induce you to weigh well the remarks now privately offered, but which, as spoken last night, I should have given to the world. You combine in your own person the two most powerful attributes that an Englishman can possess, as a talented member of the legislative body and the supreme head of the press that governs the world. In both characters you have immense responsibilities, and you are doubly bound to sustain the reputation of each of the bodies which you belong. You do not require me to tell you that the character and honour of the House of Commons are the nation's best possessions, and it is therefore difficult to exaggerate the mischief done by the tone of low morality attributed to public men, and exhibited in itself by the most powerful organ in the country. There is nothing in which the press of England is so valuable as for the fearless advocacy by each journal of its own line of opinions, when it is done with an honesty and consistency that command respect, and at the same time, show a capability of feeling respect for all that is great and estimable in public life, with a full appreciation of the cares and anxieties and sacrifices of those acting under onerous responsibility; and who, while closely watched, should be justly and generously judged. The journalism of England, so honourably conducted, elevating the tone of public morality, and sustaining the character of public men, is of inestimable value in strengthening the national institutions; but it is nothing short of a national calamity when public opinion is influenced by great jour-

right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge. The influences which led them to me that honour were of the same nature as those which induced Mr. Delane to confer upon me a similar honour—the nature of meeting agreeable society, and I trust they were not disappointed. I had also myself the honour of being a member of the society which assembled under Lord Derby's roof, and in availing myself of that privilege, I did nothing more than that which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, or Mr. Delane did when they visited me; that is to say, to sit on fair and equal terms in the society in which they met, and endeavour to make themselves agreeable while there.

DISRAELI: Before this discussion closes I should wish to extract from it a useful result. I would therefore request the House to bear in mind one objection which has been made in this discussion by the hon. Member for Berkshire—I allude to the disapprobation which has been expressed of the practice of quoting, or to influence our decision, the opinions of articles in morning journals previous to the occurrence of the debate. I have a help feeling that to quote the anonymous opinions of contemporary publications as an object tends to lower very much the value and authority of our debates in this House where we ought to depend upon our own knowledge, our own powers of observation, illustrated, of course, by the example of those who may be called classical authorities in dealing with the subject under our consideration. The practice, then, of enforcing our views by quotations made from anonymous contemporary writings is one which, I think, ought not to be encouraged. I should not consider it necessary to say more upon what has taken place this evening between the hon. gentlemen who are more particularly mentioned in this discussion—and of whom, I may say—in passing, that they are both highly respected in this House—were it not to express my dissent from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud with regard to the somewhat exaggerated view which he has taken of the press in this country. He stated with much seriousness, referring to the Sovereign and the House of Parliament, that the press was the Fourth Estate of the realm; but that is not an accurate expression, and the use of it is, at the best, but the introduction of a species of slang phraseology into our debates. It is not true that the press is a Fourth Estate, and that therefore it holds a position of political responsibility. There is, no doubt, a responsibility attaching to newspapers, inasmuch as those directing them are subject, so far as their general conduct is concerned, to the criticism of the country. They are also responsible to public opinion; and I for one do not believe that a newspaper which is conducted with a total absence of principle which is employed in the particular manner in which, according to the view of the right hon. Gentleman, the journal in question is employed, could for so many years continue to possess that degree of patronage and confidence on the part of the public which it enjoys. As a general principle a newspaper must depend for its support upon public opinion, and although The Times doubt sometimes sins greatly in the criticisms which it passes on public men—probably most papers do—yet we must not lose sight of the fact that a free press is, after all, a great blessing, and we must not be too ready to find fault with what we may be disposed to regard as the error which it may commit. The noble Lord who has just spoken very playfully reminded the House that he has been subjected in the course of his life to considerable criticism; but it does not, I am glad to find, appear to have done the noble Lord, physically at least, any harm, and as for the moral effect of public criticism I believe there are few public men who do not have derived from it some profit. I myself—if I may be allowed to speak of myself—one who occupies a position so much inferior to that of the noble Lord,—has had my share of hostile criticism; nor do I pretend to say that when it was new to me it was quite so agreeable, or that I was quite so indifferent to it, as long habit has now made me. This, however, I may say, that, so long as the criticism is able and intelligent—I care not for its general malignity—one may derive from it some profit. I agree with the noble Lord that on the whole, it is inexpedient to ask the House to be the confidant of our complaints whenever we may be subjected to severe remarks. If the public press in this country is to be a free press it is not for us to criticise with too much promptitude intellectual efforts which it must be remembered are written under conditions of immense difficulty. And as for responsibility, we must always recollect that these enterprises are responsible to the general opinion of the country, and that public opinion cannot be enlisted in their favour unless it is found that, either by their information, their criticism, or the general intelligence which pervades their performance, they are, on the whole, of advantage to the community at large.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE
LICENCES BILL.—SECOND READING.
ADJOURNED DEBATE.—SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [2nd April] proposed to Question "That the Bill be now read a second time:" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question again proposed, "That the word "now" stand part of the Question:"

Debate resumed.

MR. AYRTON said, that this Bill had been introduced to accomplish three objects—first, to bring under the supervision of the Excise and the police, by a new system of licensing, all houses used for the purpose of providing food or refreshment for the people; secondly, to enable some of these houses, under certain conditions, to obtain licences from the Excise for the sale of wine, without first obtaining the sanction of justices of the peace as they were now bound to do; and, thirdly, to diminish the duty now paid by wholesale dealers in wine. He might dismiss the last of these as comparatively unimportant; but he objected to the Bill because it sought to attain the other two objects. His objections were totally different from those which had been pertinaciously ascribed to him without the walls of the House. No one who knew him would suppose that his opposition to this Bill was grounded on the interest of any class of traders. No one who had any knowledge of the course which he had pursued, both in and out of doors, could ever have imagined that he had objected to this Bill because it was opposed to the interest of the publicans. The first objection he had to make to the Bill was, that it proposed to lay a tax on those who were engaged in the sale of food to the people; and after the various efforts which had been made in every facility for li

he never expected
such a proposition
It was clear that i
the Chancellor of his thoughts fixe
ficient pastrycook
and had not bes numberless small
found in the Me
towns all over t
tions which were the small towns
were most unjus
while the large share of represe
subjected to th
the country dis
share of repres
He objected, a once Parliame
levying taxes
pared, on prin
a graduated
They must f
whole questio
class arbitrar
of the Exche
were to pay c rent, shops
same rate of right hon. G scrupulously
justice whe
years ago
houses; an
the day w difficulties
sible even
the questi
Member f
House wa
of the Ex
of taxatio manner without neral pol
class of were th
ation.
ought t uries of necessa
which not be therefo
their c an ex

The House should consider whether this system, once adopted, would not ultimately put a tax on every shop and compel every trader to take out a licence. The question would not rest with the poor shopkeepers. Once they were taxed, they would demand that the tax should be extended to every one engaged in industry; and the continental system of finance would soon prevail, under which every trader and manufacturer would be required to take out a licence, and pay a considerable sum for it too. The argument of the shopkeepers would be, that 5 per cent on their rental was as large as 5 per cent on the rental of any other trader, and they would require that all persons engaged in industry should pay one shilling in the pound on their rental. Were they prepared to embark on such a system? The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not avoid this question. He was asking the House to impose a new duty, and he was bound to state whether he was going to adopt the policy of the French Government, and require every man engaged in business to take out a licence from the Crown, and pay on some principle proportioned to its magnitude. The subject required much further elucidation before they could safely proceed to impose such a tax. We were in a transition state. The income tax was sanctioned for one year; it was a temporary arrangement; but this new tax was not a temporary one; it promised to be permanent, and if adopted at all must be extended. It was necessary to come to some clear understanding with reference to the income tax, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended now to make arrangements with a view to its remission at the earliest period, or adopted the policy of others who claimed to be associated with him in finance, of keeping on the income tax and making its increase or diminution the mode in which the increase or diminution of expenditure was to be met in that House. That was the spirit in which the Budget had been supported by those who claimed to be junior partners with the right hon. Gentleman in the firm recently established. Were they, then, proceeding on the principle of putting an end to the income tax altogether, in accordance with the opinions again and again expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or on the principle of maintaining it as a permanent tax? A tax of this nature on a class of shops that were very numerous and intimately connected with the supply of the community's wants was one of serious import, and when thoroughly understood and put in practice would evoke a spirit of hostility to those connected with it which at no distant day they would be the first to regret. But the proposal to facilitate the sale of wine by granting licences to pastrycooks and confectioners was by far the most important part of the question. He hoped the House would not hastily or inconsiderately entertain a proposition of such immense practical importance as this without being fully satisfied that a necessity existed for new legislation on the subject, and that such legislation would promote the objects contemplated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer dealt with this part of the subject in a somewhat remarkable manner. He said he would not consent to the reduction of the wine duties unless he were satisfied that he could obtain new channels to extend the sale of the commodity, and that such a measure would not be injurious to public morals or tend to promote the inebriety of the people. In reply to the deputation who waited upon him, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he proposed to consider the question upon its moral tendencies and the probability that it would increase sobriety, and that any considerations as to revenue would be of secondary and trivial importance. But in the House of Commons, although he connected his measure with the promotion of sobriety, he yet shadowed out to the House, in language which was not to be misunderstood, that he regarded the measure as one which was necessary in a financial point of view, and that he would understand Members, according as they supported or opposed it, to be favourable or unfriendly to the financial scheme of the Government. He hoped they might now understand that in discussing a proposition to alter the laws which had hitherto been found best for maintaining the morality of the people, they were to proceed irrespective of considerations of finance. Those laws were good and wise as far as they went, but he believed some extension of the power to repress the sale of intoxicating drinks might be made with advantage, and with this object they ought to be reconsidered at an early period. Under them authority was given to justices of the peace to license the sale by retail of all kinds of intoxicating drinks, except beer; licences to sell beer of intoxicating quality could be obtained on complying with certain conditions which might be easily evad-

[Second Night.]

od; and beer of such inferior quality as to be unintoxicating could be vended without any licence whatever. Inquiry might, in his opinion, take place with advantage as to whether the restrictions imposed on dealers in beer had accomplished the purpose which was intended, or whether new regulations should be devised. The complaint of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that, owing to the effect of the law having been to separate the trades of eating and drinking, and thereby to encourage instead of repress drunkenness, it was necessary for him to propose new legislation. Was there any foundation in fact for that assertion? He totally denied that the operation of the law had been attended with any such result; and, if he were right, the main reason for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Motion would entirely fail. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to state in how many public-houses the trade in intoxicating drinks was carried on apart from that of eating. He did not believe that any means of obtaining such information existed, but if he were to speculate on the point, he should say the number of cases where the trade was so divided did not exceed 5 per cent. So little doubt existed on this point that early in the reign of James I. a declaratory Act was passed, reciting,—

“Whereas the ancient, true, and principal use of inns, alehouses, and other victualling houses, was for the receipt, relief, and lodging of way-faring persons, travelling from place to place, and for such supply of the wants of such persons as are not able by greater quantities to make their provision of victuals; and were not meant for the entertainment and harbouring of lewd and idle persons to spend and consume their time and money in drunken and idle manner.”

The law continued the same to the present day, and it was a dereliction of duty on the part of justices of the peace to grant licences without seeing that the houses in question contained suitable accommodation for persons who might be in need of it. He was free to admit that justices of the peace, especially in large towns, had not been as exact as they ought to be on every occasion. Under the old corporations much corruption had existed, and in the Metropolis there had never been proper sympathy between the justices of the peace and the inhabitants; but he denied that the general rule of conduct of magistrates throughout England had been to grant licences unless the requirements of the law were fulfilled. The consequence was that even in the smallest towns and villages in England an accommodation was unknown in any public-house. If a public-housekeeper refused to give an accommodation, he was committing a criminal offence. Had the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Motion in mind, because the law had been to separate the trades of eating and drinking, and thereby to encourage instead of repress drunkenness, it was necessary for him to propose new legislation. Still, the number of public-houses was not increased but a small body of public-houses. The law was rather a failure in abandoning the trade in intoxicating drinks was carried on apart from that of eating. He did not believe that any means of obtaining such information existed, but if he were to speculate on the point, he should say the number of cases where the trade was so divided did not exceed 5 per cent. So little doubt existed on this point that early in the reign of James I. a declaratory Act was passed, reciting,—

“Whereas the ancient, true, and principal use of inns, alehouses, and other victualling houses, was for the receipt, relief, and lodging of way-faring persons, travelling from place to place, and for such supply of the wants of such persons as are not able by greater quantities to make their provision of victuals; and were not meant for the entertainment and harbouring of lewd and idle persons to spend and consume their time and money in drunken and idle manner.”

The law continued the same to the present day, and it was a dereliction of duty on the part of justices of the peace to grant licences without seeing that the houses in question contained suitable accommodation for persons who might be in need of it. He was free to admit that justices of the peace, especially in large towns, had not been as exact as they ought to be on every occasion. Under the old corporations much corruption had existed, and in the Metropolis there had never been proper sympathy between the justices of the peace and the inhabitants; but he denied that the general rule of conduct of magistrates throughout England had been to grant licences unless the requirements of the law were fulfilled. The consequence was that even in the smallest towns and villages in that wherever there was an extravagant number of drinking-houses, there would be found an extravagant degree of drinking. This was an opinion confirmed by all writers who had been great observers of manners, such as Goldsmith and Smollett. The Bill disregarded this principle and the Chancellor of the Exchequer asserted that he could effect a reform by coupling eating with drinking. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could carry out his principle, what was the law he would have to propose? He must declare that no man should have anything to drink unless he had something to eat. If he did not enact that the seller must give his customer food before he supplied him with drink, the conditions which this legislation would impose on the trade would be of the most illusory and futile character. All that they required was that a man should say that he sold food, and then he could have a licence to sell drink. Under the existing law, however, the licensed victualler was under a legal obligation to provide the public with food as well as drink. The absolute power now confided to justices had been intrusted to them precisely because the legislation now recommended by the right hon. Gentleman had entirely failed. It was found impossible, owing to the evasion and fraud of these tradesmen, to obtain a conviction against them; and it was therefore necessary to invest magistrates with the general discretion they now possessed in this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer sought to revive the special legislation dictated by the wisdom of the reign of James I., which did not attain the object for which it was devised. The right hon. Gentleman wished to extend to the poor man the benefits which the rich derived from their clubs. The answer to that was, that the people could establish clubs for themselves, the law making no difference between rich and poor in that respect. The people might hire rooms, buy their own wine, have their own refreshments, and enjoy every convenience that was secured through the medium of a club to its own members. And why did they not do this? Because they did not possess the same self-restraint as the higher classes of society. Not having this good quality developed in them in the same degree, they were unable to follow the example of the rich; and therefore they went to the public-houses, where they were exposed to the temptations to which they too often succumbed. It was no kindness to the working people give them increased facilities for the gratification of their appetites, and legislators ought to guard them, as far as possible against the consequences of their want of self-control. Men surrounded with luxury, and with no temptation to indulge in brutal excesses, could not properly appreciate the position in which the working classes were placed. Toiling all day long until they were often physically exhausted and depressed in mind, with no mental resources, and none of the pleasures within the reach of the wealthy, the labouring classes almost of necessity plunged into the grosser enjoyment and excitement induced by spirituous liquors. Sometimes employers held out strong inducements for over-work, which rendered the workman the easy victim of intemperance, and so it had almost passed into a proverb: a good workman was often a great drunkard. This was an especial reason why the temptations to intoxication should be restricted as much as possible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had represented that there was something so charming in wine that wherever it existed in profusion sobriety was found to reign supreme. That was a very pleasing doctrine; but unfortunately it was not supported by experience. The late King of France—a man of the largest experience and most moderate views of public affairs—had declared it as his opinion that the drunkenness of France was occasioned by wine—that in one part of his kingdom much intemperance was caused by gin, but that wine was the great source of the evil. This was confirmed by those who had seen the horrors and debasing effects resulting from the practice of the common people resorting to the wine-shops outside the barriers of Paris, where they obtained the article free of duty. What was the opinion in the Household Words ascribed to Mr. Dickens, of the innumerable advantages derived from the wine-shops of France? It must be remembered that travellers in general only saw things on the surface; they walked chiefly through fine streets and into places of fashionable resort, and saw only the polished surface of society, which led them often to think, "All is virtue abroad while their more minute and truthful experiences at home induced them to think that there was nothing but vice in their own country. The moment, however, that persons went abroad to make it the subject of special inquiry, quite an official report of the other account was given. Mr. Dickens said that the wineshops were the colleges and consols of the poor in France where the professors of evil continued every day their lessons, where falsehood, theft and assassination were talked of and encouraged, in the midst of a moral pestilence of envy and vengeance, by the men of crime and of revolution. That was an illustration of the advantage which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected to result to the poor from the establishment of these charming places in England. "I should be delighted," said the right hon. Gentleman, "to exchange the intemperance of Paris for that of London." But he (Mr. Ayrton) would by no means like to see such an exchange, as he believed English people would by no means be the gainers. What would hon. Members think when they were told that if the population of England consumed wine and spirits in proportion to the consumption in Paris they would drink 404,000,000 gallons of wine and 29,000,000 gallons of spirits every year? This showed we had nothing to gain by an exchange with Paris. He had recently received a letter written by a gentleman who had gone into some of the wine-drinking streets of Paris. In one establishment this gentleman saw 500 men, women, and children drinking; and he was told by the proprietor that the day before (Sunday) there were 2,000. Hundreds were more or less intoxicated. In another of these wine places the scene begged description—one man was dragging another out by the hair into the lane, and he was informed by the cabman that he had seen from 80 to 100 lying drunk at a time in one room. Such facts as these ought to dispel the halo of poetry which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thrown around this question by describing a wine-producing country as an Elysium; whereas, when you could penetrate behind the scenes in Paris, you found a debasement and intoxication which rivalled, if it did not exceed, anything in the vilest places in England. At Nantes, which was situated in a great wine district, so much wine was drunk before the vine disease showed itself, that a proportionate consumption in this country would amount to 1,100,000,000 gallons. At Nantes a little beer was consumed, a little cider, a harmless drink called hydromel, and no spirits at all. According to the theory of the official report of the contrary, showed common, and tem and that of the cut to market nine ou in a state of intox state of things in likely to be the es absurd theory ad was plenty of wis be temperance; sounder theory people were gen afford to buy th produce intoxic considered now effect of these t wines on the wages were big purchase it. that we must wine so much were true th the Budget b One of the cellar of the to have che mained wher Mr. Ayrton strated that be of the st convention port 100 shape of v while the shape of b a duty of being Ss mium of spirit in had the containi importec rate th the sam gin. T have th cover f At pr tailers of spi cent lower was deale for t show of w ur system of levying duties had made it profitable to do so. This was not a question of light wines, for in this country light wines devoid of strength would never be drunk. When it was said that the Treaty could give us nothing but light wines, he asked the House to form their own opinions by the experience of Paris itself. Chevalier, remarking that we should have wine cheaper in this country than it was in Paris, described the wine sold in that city in these graphic terms:—"In the cabarets of the barriers of Paris, one finds nothing but wine doctored and coloured in twenty ways." But what security was there that wine would come to the English consumer any purer if less noxious than the Parisians obtained it. He believed that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject was the result of some communications from those who seemed to believe in free trade almost as a religion, and to think that if every one were allowed to buy and sell as he liked, we should have nothing but virtue and happiness throughout the world. That, however, was a totally erroneous view. Even Manchester itself saw this, for there was no body of justices who were more impressed than the justices of that city with the inapplicability of the principles of free trade to the sale of intoxicating drinks, and it was gratifying that they had discovered some limits to the theory of free trade. It was a total misconception to think that free trade meant freedom in the sale of that which was injurious to society; for the true doctrine of free trade was—that you should have freedom in conducting trade to promote the welfare of society. But the moment you ceased to do that you forfeited your freedom; and the House had a right to come forward and say, "You shall not, under the name of freedom, do that which is wrong, and tends to promote immorality and vice." The Factory Act and many other Acts proceeded on this principle. For centuries the Legislature of this country had said that the sale of intoxicating drinks was not to be considered in the ordinary course of trade, because it had a most serious effect in reference to the welfare of society, and this was the principle which he sought to maintain. Let hon. Members recollect for a moment the consequences which would ensue from entering on a mistaken path. If they took a wrong step in this direction, they would add to that great category of misery and vice which pervaded the country; whilst

Mr. Ayrton

[Second Night.

if they should err in the other direction by leaving things as they were, they would do no mischief, even if they did no good. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he could not afford to create new interests but what would he do by this Bill but create new interests?—for the people licensed under this Bill would surely complain if an subsequent legislation interfered with them even though their interests were evidently founded on public demoralization. This was a good ground for leaving the matter as it was until they should have to deal with it for a very different purpose than merely to increase the revenue. They were told that intemperance was the source of almost all the evil and crime which afflicted this country, and they knew by long experience that intemperance was produced by the number of houses which were opened to promote it; and he, therefore, trusted that the House would pause before they gave increased facilities for such a purpose and that they would consider that the best course to pursue was to reject this Bill and to stand by the principle that those who dealt in intoxicating drinks were not to have freedom of trade, but were to be subject to any extent of control which the community should think right to impose. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be induced to take a better view of the case, and that he would no longer give himself up to the delusion that by opening new sources of intemperance he would promote the temperance of the people.

Mr. LIDDELL said, his objections to this Bill were very simple. He objected to it because, disguised its provisions as they liked, and apply to its provision whatever plausible arguments they liked it was a proposal to encourage drinking—and drinking in company away from home—and, above all, it would be likely to affect a class that had not hitherto been addicted to habits of drunkenness, namely the middle classes of the community. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, said he did not anticipate that if this Bill were passed, there would be much reduction in the consumption either of spirits or beer and, that being so, it was perfectly clear that it was not the classes who now consumed beer and spirits that were expected to consume wine. Then a new class of drinkers was to be encouraged from among those who were too proud or too well conducted at present habitually to frequent the public-house. This Bill, in fact, was framed to introduce into this country for the first time the kind of house that was known on the Continent as the café; but nobody who had lived abroad and seen the habits of the café frequenters would desire those listless, lazy habits to be introduced among the young men of this country. It was to be feared that those who could afford to pay for wine would not frequent these places much during the week, and that Sunday afternoon would be particularly chosen for this purpose. He should be the last person to throw any impediment in the way of innocent recreation of the working and industrious classes on Sundays, and he was glad to see cheap trains to take them into the country; but just as this habit of going into the country was becoming somewhat general they were about to introduce a new sort of temptation to stay in the town:—in all our large towns we should have the café, where on Sunday afternoons the youth of both sexes would congregate, substituted for the cheap excursion trains which carried thousands of our hard-worked population and their families into the country for fresh air and innocent enjoyment. Let them see on what the case for this Bill really rested. It rested on the simple assertion, hitherto almost uncontradicted, except in the able speech which they had just heard, that a public necessity existed for the increased sale of wine, and that new channels must be opened for that purpose. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that there were 63,000 licensed victualliers in England, but that only 25,000 of them were licensed for the sale of wine. Now there were 7,000,000 adult males in this country, and therefore we had already a wine-shop for every 280 of them; in addition to which there was a wine merchant in almost every street who sold wine by wholesale, not—which was a great recommendation—"to be drunk on the premises," but in private houses for the comfort of the inmates in family and social intercourse. It was said that there would be a certain amount of convenience in allowing a person to have a glass of wine in a confectioner's shop; and if they could stop there he (Mr. Liddell) saw no reason why this should not be conceded. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected them to believe his very broad statement as to the absolute necessity that existed for the establishment of places where people could to the same temptation? The next authority, Sir Richard Mayne, said that under the vintners' privilege, though they had the privilege of selling wine only, he believed they sold other things, and that it was very difficult to say whether it was wine or spirits that was served out in glasses, and to prove it in evidence. With these facts before them he could not understand how the Chancellor of the Exchequer could guard against illegal and perhaps immoral practices taking place in these wine shops. But another portion of the Bill seemed to contain more evils than the whole of the rest put together, in the permission that it gave to every sort of shop to sell wine in small quantities by retail. He could speak from personal knowledge of the effect that this was likely to produce. When in Belgium, he visited a remote village, in which was a very large store, where every kind of article was sold, and which was immensely frequented by the surrounding population. He asked the owner how it was he attracted such immense custom? to which he replied that he had a sovereign remedy for drawing custom, for to every customer who bought an article he gave a small glass of spirits; and in that way he drove an enormous trade. Did the House, he would ask, wish to introduce that system into this country, and hold out inducements for its adoption by the small dealers of this country? Mr. Haughton, a gentleman from Ireland, examined before the Licensing Committee, said that a great deal of evil attended the practice of allowing grocers to sell spirits in Ireland, and that it caused a great deal of drunkenness amongst domestic servants. Did they imagine that if the sale of wine was legalized in shops, it would not be sold, or perhaps given, to attract custom; and did the House wish to see the system encouraged? It, moreover, seemed to him to be a most unusual course to ask the House to legislate for the sale of foreign articles in this country. He had voted for the Commercial Treaty with France on the broad principle of increasing the commercial intercourse between the two countries; but he confessed he often blushed at the amount of error which appeared to manifest itself in working out the details of the Treaty. However that might be, he thought that to legislate for the introduction into this country of a foreign commodity, and to legislate for its sale, were two different things. The latter was a matter which ought to be left to the ordinary operations of trade. The arguments used in favour of the measure were identical with those used in introducing the Beer Act; but experience proved that the unrestricted sale of beer had been attended with the most mischievous consequences to the morality of the community, and he would rather encourage the sale of some beverage that would give a stimulus to English production, such as hops and barley, than create new channels to carry off the dregs and refuse of French and Spanish vineyards. What were the safeguards provided against what might be said to be the abuse of this Bill? There was a rating clause that provided that no house rated below £10 should have a licence to sell wine. Did that operate with regard to beerhouses? No, it only opened the avenue to fraud. The effect of it was that the party went to the overseer, and getting the overseer to rate him to the requisite amount, whether the value of the house warranted it or not, he succeeded in obtaining his licence; and the same thing would happen with regard to these winchouses. Then with reference to the forfeiture of licence, the same law and power existed in regard to the publican and the beerseller—did it operate to prevent a vast amount of immorality, for the perpetration of which they were going to open up a new description of business? The Chancellor of the Exchequer ridiculed the notion that the magistrates of this country were to be the judges of the amount the people should be allowed to consume. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could invent a mode by which the same amount of control over public order could be arrived at, the magistrates would in a body thank him for being relieved from what was a most delicate, odious, and invidious function. In saying this he believed he spoke the feelings of a great mass of the magistracy. But as long as the House placed control over the sale of liquor, to whom could it be better entrusted than to those who were the guardians of order and the poor? And so far from increasing that which was the greatest evil in the way of magisterial control, if they wished to increase their authority and not diminish their responsibility, they would, instead of opening up new classes of excise licences, place under their control all these houses including the beershops. If it was contended that the magistrates were not the fit persons to judge of the wants of the community, let them find out a fitter body, and relieve the bench of magistrates. But virtually this Bill gave the magistrates no power or authority in the initiative in this matter, because, after all, all the magistrates had to do, was to ascertain whether the house was an eating-house within the terms of the Act and not a disorderly house; and any one who wished for a licence would take care that his house was well-conducted for some months previous, and there was nothing more easy than to comply with the stipulation. Virtually, there was no control. The magistrates were allowed to have control afterwards; but it was so odious and difficult to exercise it, that he thought no two magistrates in the country would be found to exercise the power given in this Bill. It did not give them the right power at the right time, and it gave them the wrong power at the wrong time. There were penalties, no doubt, many and severe; but an Excise licensed house was an evil against which no amount of penalty was available. It was a hydra-headed evil that produced and reproduced itself as fast as you put it down. If they deprived one of its licence half a dozen more would spring up. He positively denied that public convenience called for the Bill. It was true that a quarter of a million persons had signed petitions against the Bill, chiefly perhaps under the organization of the licensed victuallers and the Temperance Alliance; but there were 480 petitions presented from public meetings, which he took to be a far more correct representation of public opinion. In conclusion, he might state that he had presented a petition expressed sagaciously, and with much foresight, from 400 of the women of Newcastle—the wives, sisters, and daughters of working men there—in which they said they believed that the enlargement of the channels for the sale of foreign wines would not tend in any degree to increase the enjoyment and comfort of their homes, but that it would seriously tend to the promotion of drunken and demoralising habits, and they wished it to be understood that neither they nor their families sought for enlarged means for the sale of wines on the premises, being convinced that such a liberty would prove highly objectionable, and materially interfere with their domestic comfort.

[Second Night.]

[Second Night.]

Mr. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said that, representing an extensive district, he wished to explain to the House his reasons for supporting the second reading to the Bill. First, lers, who thought t be affected by it. that the interest of community, who had pital in their trade for so many years, Bill introduced for r he would not sup The second body o totallers, who were tion whatever from the sale of intoxic in any way encour who were affect With regard to doubt the beerhe out the countr often a great nu neighbourhood. he would put t the law now in it did not enab lady to get a whole Metrop of a public-ho seemed to him not at all des was the trade sent in such amendment Haymarket late hour c trict in a lic, whethe gious coun licences fo By the Bi supplied isting int perience they need phantom to the e licensed drinks. to its si houses While 347,00 houses lation 645 p total not s ches/ migt would be well conducted than could be obtained from a beer-shop under licence from the Excise. The Bill contained many errors, and rather than that it should pass in its present shape, he would vote against the second reading; but he believed it was capable of amendment in Committee. So far as the Bill provided facilities for the sale of wine to those who wanted it, it was a good measure. In the City of London almost every pastrycook who desired a licence from the magistrates could get one; the only condition imposed being an honourable understanding that he would not open on Sundays, nor after eight o'clock at night on other days, nor convert his house into a gin-shop. Yet in no part of England did so much sobriety and good order prevail as in the City of London. What was wanted was a class of respectable cheap eating-houses where persons who had occasion to be from home might obtain suitable refreshments. There was no occasion for these houses being kept open late at night. The most objectionable part of the Bill was that rendering it necessary for every house for the sale of any refreshments to have a licence. It certainly seemed monstrous to require a baker, who sold a few buns or biscuits over his counter, to take out a licence; and he could not help looking upon such a provision as an improper and unfair interference with the freedom of trade. He was for limiting rather than extending the hours in the evening to which these new refreshment houses might keep open, and he would fix nine in winter and ten in summer. But with regard to placing them under the supervision of the police, he would ask hon. Members how they would like, while they were regaling themselves at Gunter's in Belgravia, or Farrance's in Spring Gardens, or similar places, to see a policeman come in to take a survey of the premises and of those who frequented them? Believing, however, that the Bill might in Committee be made not only unobjectionable but even popular, he should vote for the second reading.

Mr. PALK said, that the principle of this Bill was to increase the consumption of intoxicating liquors. If a stranger were to be informed that this Bill, which had met with so much applause, was based upon the principles which had been repudiated thirty years ago, and that the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing it forward were those used by a former Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goulburn) in 1830, he would express his astonishment; but if he were further told that the financial scheme of the right hon. Gentleman rested entirely on the consumption of spirituous liquors, and that the great object of his changes would lead to the demoralization of the country, he would only exclaim, "Quem Deus vult perdere, dementat." That was the real tenor of the measure. He did not dispute that the Bill might be amended in Committee; but he objected to the principle of a measure which was to increase the consumption of intoxicating liquors; for if the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not succeed in creating a demand for French wines, the revenue which he expected to obtain from that source would not be forthcoming. His scheme so far would be an entire failure. Mr. Goulburn, when introducing the Beer Bill in 1830, used very nearly the same language which the right hon. Gentleman held when he recently brought forward his Budget. When Mr. Goulburn introduced the new licensing system in 1830, he denied that any injury would be done to the morals of the people by an increase in the number of public-houses. He said that the Bill would at once conduce to the comfort and health of the people by affording them cheap and ready means of obtaining a more wholesome beverage, removing them from the temptation of the common alehouse, and introducing them to other houses which would be secured by greater securities for good order. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer said that by this Bill wine, which had been a luxury confined to the rich, would now become a means of comfort to the poor; and he compared the intemperance in Paris with the intemperance in London. But it appeared to him (Mr. Palk) that the intemperance of London that of Paris must be superadded, or the Chancellor's scheme must prove a failure. Mr. Goulburn said in 1830 there would be no increase in immorality by the increase of public-houses; but what took place? In 1834 a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into the evils of drunkenness; they reported that those evils were attributed, to a great extent, to beer. In 1849 the Lords had another Committee, and they came to the conclusion that the multiplication of houses for the consumption of intoxicating liquors, which the Beer Act, had increased from 123,396, was an evil of the first

[Second A

tude, as it not only increased the temptations to drink, but induced respectable publicans, under the control of the magistrates, to adopt practices degrading to their character and injurious to morality for the purpose of attracting custom to their houses. What safeguard had they that the very same thing might not happen if they passed this Bill? The Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to create a new demand for a liquor which was not now one of great popularity, but he had failed to show that the demand for French wines would lessen the demand for spirituous liquors or promote the cause of morality and good conduct. He was positively reversing that course of progress and improvement which had guided the policy of the country for many years past. Parliament had attempted much of late years to promote the education, the religion, and the amusements of the poor; it had founded institutions for the reformation of juvenile offenders; and having by these means given a high tone of morality to the public policy, the right hon. Gentleman would extinguish all the good that had been done by establishing free trade in drunkenness. To make his scheme realize his financial anticipations, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must erect foreign intemperance upon the intemperance of England, and the intemperance of wine upon the intemperance of spirituous liquors. His experience convinced him that the greater the facilities for drinking, the more drunkenness was multiplied. England was, indeed, arrived at a pitiable state if she could not do without a revenue derived from the degradation of the people. He trusted that hon. Members would not, for the sake of the trifling sum this Bill would raise, vote for a Bill in which the slightest error was of the deepest importance, because it would make or mar the labourer and artisan, the strength and wealth of England. Believing the principle of the Bill to be vicious, and its action most injurious, he entreated the House to refuse it a second reading.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, that if any consideration could induce him to support this Bill, it would be the deep respect he entertained for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was with the greatest reluctance, therefore, that he differed from the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the present measure. He had considered the subject very carefully, and had taken into view the possible extension of the measure at some future period to Ireland; for if country it was a measure had been that it was a p finance; but it revenue by increasing liquors, and of wine, free of duty put on the sale was assumed that would be consumed present consumptive spirits—

"That those would before,

"While those who the more."

He suspected that support the measure they were entirely fluence of the licence others supported the teetotalers. He was fluence of either of no interest in the this country, though land; and he was nothing of the sort. Between those two extremes opposition to the Bill the conviction that thing wrong about it. letter from Mr. James lin, a distinguished abstinance principle, tendency of the measure increase intemperance a petite for intoxicating people of a higher class were in the habit of frequenting the house. The hon. Member (Mr. Alderman Salomon) confessed to speak in favour really spoken against in the inspection of publicans by the police. hesitated to permit him to visit such places; but no little danger in doing were to find people sitting and to be supplied with wine, while the police to inspect the establishments some very nice tea-shops but what respectable man to allow his children to do if they were turned into what which would then become garden, and the tea-house ferred into what were known as shoben-shops, where people could get drunk on the sly. It had been observed by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) that if the Bill passed into a law there was not a shop in London, for the sale of any commodity whatever, that might not obtain a licence for the sale of foreign wines to be drunk over the counter. The result would be that, when their wives and daughters entered Shoolbred's, or any other establishment of that sort, they would at once have a glass of wine placed at their elbows and be invited to drink it.

MR. HUMBERSTON was of opinion that, in bringing forward this measure, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proceeded upon erroneous grounds. The right hon. Gentleman said, that there was a necessity for combining the business of eating with the business of drinking; but there were two operations in eating, namely, eating for pleasure and eating for business; just as in drinking, there was drinking for drunk and drinking for dry. He presumed that the eating-houses to which the Bill was intended to apply were principally those resorted to by men of business who were unable to resort to their own homes for refreshment; and what was the advantage of combining eating with drinking in these houses? The object of an eating-house keeper at present was to provide the food required by his customers, and if any drink were required the person who wanted it put down his money, and it was fetched from the adjoining public-house. So that the eating-house keeper had no interest whatever in pressing liquor upon his customers, whilst the latter was not bound to drink anything to the good of the house, as it was termed. This he thought was a very great advantage in the existing system. The proposed system would encourage wine-selling, and would be more profitable, to the exclusion of the legitimate business of an eating-house keeper. The House having resolved to reduce the duties upon foreign wines, of course it became necessary to review the present licensing system, and see how far it might be extended to the Bill before the House; but the proposal of the Government went much too far from that system. The objection that was urged against the proposed system was, that they could not go to a confectioner's shop and get a glass of wine; undoubtedly there was great reluctance on the part of magistrates to grant licences generally. But whence did that reluctance arise? The magistrates did not grant licences. They only gave a certificate of an individual's fitness to keep a victualling-house, and the person obtained that certificate then went to the Excise, where he procured a wine licence. Now; what he pointed out was, that some distinction must be drawn here, and that in granting certificates magistrates should be satisfied in certifying that the holder was entitled to sell wine, and he should necessarily have a spirit licence. At present magistrates had not the power, nor could they restrict their certificate in any way so as to entitle the holder to obtain a licence for the sale of wine. The certificate once granted by the magistrates entitles the holder to obtain a spirit licence as well as a wine licence, hence the reluctance of magistrates to grant these certificates, for they do not give them the power to grant a certificate for a wine licence only, and there is no longer any reluctance in granting them. In asking for an extension of the power to eating-houses the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going upon wrong grounds. Such refreshment houses were not to be taken into consideration, and the only result would be the conversion of eating-houses into mere drinking-houses. The extension of the Bill which authorized the sale of wine by any shopkeeper was entirely unobjectionable. It was conceived in the spirit of the Beer Bill, which gave people the opportunity of purchasing beer near their own houses and drinking it home for consumption in their own houses, though, unfortunately, the practice in regard to beershops was entirely different from the intentions of the present measure, and beershops were the resort of the worst characters in the country. To give to the ordinary tradesman the power of selling wine, and to allow any man to enter and purchase wine for consumption in his own house, would be entirely unobjectionable. As it stood, however, anybody who put a bottle of bread and cheese in his shop might give it the appearance of an eating-house, and might have a licence for the sale of wine on the premises. He thought the suggestion he had made in regard to the method of granting licences under the Bill would be a good Amendment. Neither trade nor the public ought to be forced at the expense of morality; and he hoped that the Bill might either be withdrawn and another introduced, or else that it would be public-houses in everything except being set to magisterial control. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not be ignorant of these matters, because they had been fully explained to him by a deputy at the head of which was a gentleman whose name ought to have been sufficient to secure the sympathies of the right hon. gentleman—Mr. Homer—more especially where there was reason to suppose that Homer himself was anything but a teetotaler; as we read in Horace:—

[Second

audibus arguitur vini vinorum Homerus."

and no regard for the talk about temperance, which he did not believe the Bill would promote at all. But he thought the measure was unfair and unjust to a very important branch of trade, and he would therefore oppose the measure.

A. C. P. VILLIERS said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech had lost the merit of being clear and intelligible, which was certainly more than could be said for those of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Ayrton) and other opponents of this measure, who had used arguments of different kinds and which were opposed to each other; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone came forward as the advocate of the licensed victuallers and the monopoly in fact which they enjoy. His clients were the licensed victuallers, the brewers, and all persons who had invested capital in public-houses, who wished for no change, and who considered that anything that interfered with their monopoly was unjust. He was for everything as it stood, and conceived any departure from the existing system. He (Mr. Villiers) had presided over a Committee upon this subject, and in very good company, come to an entirely different conclusion. There were many arguments to be urged in favour of the monopoly, and it was not the first time that he had contended against them. The system which the hon. and learned Gentleman came forward to defend had been for many years universally condemned. A Committee of the House of Commons had unanimously reported that it was defective and ought to be modified, and the present Bill was framed in conformity to their suggestions. He was not a less advocate of free trade in intoxicating liquors; but the Committee recommended a better system than at present existed; and that was the system which this Bill carried into effect. He readily admitted that in the interests of public morality some control ought to be exercised over houses in which intoxicating drinks were sold; and the present measure would, he thought, afford that advantage; for it provided that the parties whom it would empower to sell wine should give security for the proper management of their business while it invested the magistrates with very large powers in deciding upon the manner in which persons seeking the privilege should conform to the conditions required by law. The public were under a gross delusion as to the securities of the present system against the evils which arose from the sale of intoxicating liquors. In the evidence taken on this subject, magistrates admitted that they had no competency for determining who personally was fit or otherwise to have a licence, and were guided by other considerations in granting them. The Committee therefore recommended that the magistrate should not only inquire into the character of the applicants, but also take proper securities from them, and rely upon the police to enforce the restrictions under which they were to act. In this Bill that suggestion was adopted. The magistrates were to see that the persons who were licensed were responsible and respectable; they would be watched by the police, and they would be subject to all the same restrictions and penalties to which publicans and beer-shop-keepers were liable at present. This Committee, to which so much reference has been made, was very fairly constituted. It consisted of some gentlemen who had been Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and indeed there was hardly a member upon it, except himself, who had not acted in the commission of the peace. The inquiry itself had been promoted by magistrates, and many of the witnesses were magistrates, commissioners of police, and persons of experience in the administration of the law. They all concurred in the opinion that in the selection of persons for licences the present law was defective and that the best security for public-houses being well conducted was the power of withdrawing a licence, coupled with increased powers conferred upon the police. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to argue as if this were an attempt to give a fresh stimulus to drunkenness and to relax restrictions which now existed. He would take issue on that point. When the Bill was first introduced, objection was taken that the magistrates had no discretion in deciding wh were entitled to have those licences ; but this power had now been given to them ; but it had had no effect upon the opposition offered to the measure. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets himself was perhaps consistent, for he believed that he had opposed the Treaty altogether, and the introduction of cheap wines particularly. But he now appeared as the mouthpiece of the teetotallers, who had not opposed the Treaty at all, which had especially the introduction of these wines in view. He had on their part to say, " True it is, we gave our sanction to the Treaty ; we never said a word against the free importation of these wines, but now they are here we will do all we can to prevent their being consumed." But, if I mistake not, they shrink from appearing to be alone, and they knew that the Members that may be joining them, now being engaged in commerce, or representing those who are so, desired to have the Treaty carried out in order to exchange their cottons and crockery and linen yarns for the wine and brandy of France ; and whatever they may say now as to the danger of giving the public a convenient mode of having access to these liquors, they would never have joined the teetotallers in resisting the entry of these wines into this country. The obstruction to this measure is only to prevent the Treaty having its natural effect in making foreign wines accessible to people of moderate fortune. Indeed, the teetotallers are not consistent, for they do not seek their total suppression ; but by having combined with the Members connected with the publicans, they seem to demand that wine should only be consumed side by side with ardent spirits in public-houses, and not where people go in the middle of the day to get wholesome food, with no desire to drink intoxicating liquors to excess. No objection was made to a man who got his dinner at one of these eating-houses giving the money out of his pocket for wine to be fetched in for him, or indeed to his bringing it in his hand with him ; it was only when it was proposed that the landlord should be allowed to lay in a few dozen of bottles in his house for his customers' consumption during the day that the outcry was raised. It was to carry such a simple point as this that all the results of the most terrible intemperance had been sought to be connected with this Bill, but all of which would cease and would never occur, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would now be unopposing system was r propriety that is direct anybody by the House follows from the the licence was the most respect the business and the houses to the strict—but, was remembered one this House to be mittee. It was taken a great in of a Sailors' Evidence, what he to the House, t fented in conse disorderly publi ally licensed in the sailors bei plundered of the quenting those l ent of the Polic examined, and thing which Ad informed the C of half-a-mile long there wer public-houses a many of whic tions as disord whether any away in conseq it happened ve there had beer it could not b the publican kn pen to him, be the application ferred the lice the licensing c to the barman it was shown present when conviction had mitted, and th conducted sinc requirements of rule on which the way in whi in the neighbo was to grant a public-houses i miral Hope con the great autho Mr. Pownall, Committee hov a number of la where there seemed no necessity for n, replied, "Oh, those are old districts;

Mr. C. P. Villiers

trade has gone away from them." It never found, however, that when the neighbourhood had changed and the reements ceased licences were withdrawn.
ording to the magistrates' admissions, asing, then, is a question of property.
en a licence was once granted to a se it gave an additional money value
, and it would be unfair, as they say, deprive a man of his property merely use of a change in the condition of neighbourhood. This, no doubt, was enough on the part of the magises; but it showed conclusively that licensing system was only a means giving value to property connected the sale of intoxicating liquors—that ad nothing to do with police or the aintenance of order, or any other of the al considerations which had been introd into the discussion. Without refer-to any of the statements which had made as to the manner in which the istrates exercised their functions, it clear, from their own showing, that were incompetent to form a decision
the merits of the applicants who came re them, and that in practice they ted licences to an extent which could be injurious to the recipient who ht it as a privilege, and must be demoralizing in the districts where existed. And yet it was the omisfrom the Bill of the provision that application for these wine licences
ld be made to magistrates, in the man-
in which they are made at present,
h had caused all the opposition to it.
ny person wished to know what else
said of the motives that prompted the
of licences they must refer to the book containing evidence taken before Select Committee. There was plenty candal recorded there, to which he ld not refer. It was said that this was a second Beerhouse Bill, and that ybody knew the evil the beerhouses had ueed. It was very easy to say that the house system had failed—there was not ody to affront by that whom hon. Mem-cared about affronting, though there not a few Gentlemen within hearing se feelings would be offended if any-g harsh were said about the public-
e system. He had seen no evidence how that the beerhouse system had d, though a great deal may be said of erhouse that is or ought to be said of a public-house. On the contrary, they bi the evidence of Sir R. Mayne and other that in some of the larger towns they we better conducted than the public-house

In Manchester there were 400 publi houses and 1,400 beerhouses, and the were informed that drunkenness occurri
in the case only of 1 per cent of the pop
lation; while in Liverpool, where th
public-houses greatly exceeded the bee houses in number, the ratio of intoxicati was 1 in 28. In all large towns it wou be found that, although persons frequen beerhouses for the sake of company, ar
might encounter bad associates there,
was not by those establishments that drun kenness was peculiarly promoted, and pr
bably far less so than by the licenced gi palace. He knew among hon. Gentl men it was said that all sorts of infamou characters assembled there, and that crim
of all sorts were concocted. But he believ that the crime that was always held in vie
in those cases was poaching. But th result of the inquiries made before th Game Committee, a few years ago, mere proved that poaching, as it had existi
before the passing of the Beer Act, co
tinued to the present day; and the strik ing fact was mentioned by one of the I spectors of Prisons who was examined b
fore that Committee that one-fourth
the persons confined in gaol in this count
were committed for offences against th game laws which, if he was not mistake
was precisely the proportion mention to exist before the Game Committee 1817. Another objection taken to th
Bill was that it proposed to tax a class persons who had not been taxed before-namely, the keepers of coffee-houses. L any one who thinks that these house should not be watched by the police, co
pare the beerhouses as to which so much pr
judice existed, with the coffee-shops, whic had so much increased of late. The fact w that many of these houses were the reso
of the lowest characters, and not bein
under the control of the authorities cou be open at all hours of the night. The had the testimony of the police that whe
the public and beerhouses were close for the night the bad characters flocke to the coffee-shops, and Sir R. Mayn stated that 139 of these remained ope
all night in London, and were often fill with the worst characters, who, havin either no homes or bad homes to retur
to, passed the night at these establis
ments. It was one of the argumen not the Bill that the Government were to impose a tax upon refreshment-houses, thereby mulcting innocent and undisciplined persons; but all the evidence before the Committee showed the same desirability of authorizing the police to enter all such places of public resort which they were unable to do without they were licensed. It was chiefly for the purpose of bringing under supervision and control coffee-houses, and places of that description, as to the character of which there was the strongest concurring testimony from people of different kinds, that they had been included in the provisions of the Bill. Indeed, on the part of the main coffee and eating-house keepers an objection had been made to the Committee as to the measure referred to, and a desire was expressed that some system of registry or licensing might be adopted in order that only those that were respectable should be licensed. Another ground of opposition to the measure was that it would generally increase the facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that the system under which drinking-houses were formerly licensed would become more lax. He did not only say that there was no ground for these assertions. It would influence the public much if it did. He entertained the strongest possible feeling as to the necessity for repressing drunkenness; he was decidedly of opinion that the trade in intoxicating liquors ought to be regarded as distinct from every other, and that judicious restrictions should be imposed upon it. Nothing but a belief that the best security would be afforded by the vigilant control of the police, and by the caution to be exercised in the granting of licences, could induce him to support such a Bill as was now present; but from the securities that the Bill provided, he believed it would be harmless for evil, and it would at the same time be productive of the greatest convenience to persons of the middle classes who were in the habit of resorting to eating-houses. The persons who talked about the "trade in drunkenness" did not properly understand the phrase which they employed, and seemed only desirous of gaining discredit on opinions which they did not appreciate. Monopoly in any particular business was not necessary to make it safe, and it was not opposed to freedom of trade to protect the public against disorder. A measure of this nature was much recommended by the altered habits of the present day. The great majority of persons now living were obliged to be so, and they could not be otherwise. The only remedy was to send them to the workhouse. There were many reasons as to the necessity of which private persons could not judge for themselves against the habits of the people that the foreign population also was a cause of drunkenness; and the necessity of the measure to be educated and to be drunk. The public part, however, was low-price and suit to the legislative strength and strength could be believed in the prudent classes of the nation.

Mr. Gentleman to be believed he had a serious question years ago many businesses. Gentleman weight (Mr. H. of the not believe. hon. G. discuss and the Commi man w in the

Mr. C. P. Villiers

h the Report that he took exception to provisions; and though he could not do for the right hon. Gentleman's vote on he reminded him of the unanimous commendation of the Committee, which might possibly have forgotten, he yet might be able to lessen his authority with the House. If hon. Members had been asked to support a Bill founded on the representations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he for one should not have objected to it. For what had the right hon. Gentleman stated? He declared himself favourable, like the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, to the present system of licensing; and that he wished to do nothing but what was necessary, directly or indirectly, for his particular object—which was supposed was to sell wine, to which there could be no objection. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he wished to proceed without prejudice to the question of altering the present system. So did he; but he thought he should be able to show, not only that the Bill did prejudice the existing system, but prejudiced it in a way as would render it absolutely impossible to alter it on any future occasion. The first object which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in view was that of importation of wine on the reduced duty which could be thrown open to the whole of the summer. With that he quite agreed. The next object was that the sale of wine should only be restricted to the same extent as the sale of other liquors. He also agreed with that. The question then was, whether the mode in which he sought to effect that was a proper and reasonable mode; and that was the real question which they had to consider. He would shortly state to the House what the recommendations of the Committee were; he would not have troubled the House with them but for the extraordinary statement which they had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman, that the Bill carried out the commendations of the Committee. The first recommendation of the Committee was, that no intoxicating drinks should be sold without a licence. There was no difference of opinion as to that. The next was, that there should be one uniform licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Was the present Bill on all fours with the recommendation of the Committee in that respect? On the contrary, it was formed upon an entirely conflicting principle. The next recommendation of the Committee—and it was unanimous—was that such licences should be granted by the magistrates; he would not say whether that was right or wrong, but at all events it was the recommendation of the Report. They commended that the sale of intoxicating liquors should be open to all persons of good character. The Bill, however, provided nothing at all about character; it provided that the licence should be granted to persons who kept drinking-houses, and a person must be a person of good character indeed to keep a disorderly house. Was the provision of the Bill and its import on all fours in that particular? The Committee then came to the question of coffee-houses. That was a very large category of houses, and not only applied to coffee-houses and shops, but to temporary hotels, eating-houses, and shell-fish shops with all similar places of public resort. They were not to be subject to the control of the police. There was a division of the Committee on that point, which was nearly the only division which took place. The right hon. Gentleman wanted to place them under the control of the police. The Committee said no, because they were to be visited by regularly appointed inspectors. What did this Bill provide? It provided not only that such places of public resort should be subject to the police, but applied the same principle not only to refreshment-houses, but also to the shops of every old woman—or every young woman who sold a nut, an orange, or a ginger-beer. [The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER intimated dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but when he referred to the Bill he found that the provisions applied to all places in which any victuals or refreshments were sold. Well, then, oranges could very well be sold under the category of refreshments, and he owned that an orange was a very good refreshment to him. All those places were to be liable to pay a licence and to be subject to the invasion of the police; because it was provided that every one, great or small—(for the restriction as to £10 or £20 rent applied only to wine licences, and not to refreshment-houses)—who had a licence was to be subject to inspection. He would not trouble the other day to walk through a large district in the neighbourhood bounded by Victoria Street on one side, the Strand on the other, extending from the Horse Guards to Vauxhall Bridge. He traversed the streets in order to see what sort of shops they were that sold oranges, and he found that there were hundreds of little at sold oranges, fruit, bundle wood, red rings, and other sorts of sweet-meats,

and in all these shops there were tarts
and biscuits. In every one of those shops
they saw small articles of that kind sold;
and therefore it was not right of the right
hon. Gentleman to say that they did not come within the provisions of the Bill, although he shook his head. He would be willing to say that where there was one refreshment house there were five of the shops of the same character which he had described, and he mentioned the fact to show the oppression which this Bill would cause to those people. The right hon. Gentleman had made a very great speech which had taken up very much with the House; he said he wanted to give increased facilities for the sale of wine, and that it was desirable that persons who sold food should be enabled to sell drink also. That was very reasonable.
Mr. Henley said so too. It was a very reasonable condition to apply to the beer licences or any other licences to sell drink, that food should also be sold; but the real fact was that people could buy their food cheaper in other places than they could at the licensed shops, and, therefore, they would not have the advantage which was supposed they would; whereas, on the other hand, in every place in which an licence of food was sold, there would be imposed upon the people this perpetual blister of the police. That was enacted by the Bill; it put those persons under the harrow and nuisance of the police that they might be driven to take out a wine licence. That is what the Government called promoting the morality of the people. Let those who wanted to take up a wine or beer licence have full liberty to do so; but do not put restraint upon people who do not want to have such licence, by exposing them to the same inconveniences as those who do not; it will be exposed to. The right
hon. Gentleman had talked a great deal about the evidence given before the Committee. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would admit that if there were any facts strongly established, and which would justify the Committee in their Report, it was that, having two kinds of houses open,
there was a sort of competition to tempt
people to do that which they would not otherwise do. But now the right hon. Gentleman proposed to set up a third set of competing houses, and this in the very face of the recommendation of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman talked of magisterial security. But what was it

he proposed to hold out to the illusion of the
before the eye
them supposed
when they had no security,
could put it
the right hon.
act? The proposed to give petty session
issued by the three specific
if the house
the meaning keeping it di-
wine or liqu-Again, the his head; but
Act. Now, man point
was in the vi-
—from a street
which somet-
—might not drunk? "Ti-
and ale," anor "a crust
All this he part of the been got by
with a stout
it. If a people or if disorder it appeared against the
That he called backs. How that a house
certainly, a apprehended disorderly because a "social evil" a gambling
house of disorderly
elements had become in which they
and cudgel
matters of the
the case will come before
the question that how
kept open?
Send for the
to indict the duty as magisterial man said
in spirit of confidence did not suppose

Mr Henley

ht hon. Gentleman in the magistrates' court exactly to that length, and that he ended they should act without sufficient information before them. But the House had some odd information upon this subject. A little while ago the noble Lord Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord J. Russell) in giving some wholesome advice to an inexperienced young King in whom he had taken a great interest—an interest which was also experienced by Her Majesty—used language so remarkable that (Mr. Henley) thought he must have had the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his eye when he published it. The noble Lord was raised at a time when people were in the habit of calling a spade a spade. The noble Lord said,—

“Let the Neapolitan Government arrest no man without bringing him to trial face to face with his accusers. Let them subject no man to injurious restrictions without proof of some crime or offence against public order. Let the law as it stands be equally applied to all.”

Subsequently Mr. Elliot had written to the noble Lord as follows:—

“Naples, March 3.

“For that, although they had proofs sufficient to satisfy themselves (the Ministers) of the guilt of the persons arrested, the evidence was not such as would procure a conviction in a court of justice. ‘In plainer words,’ I answered, ‘you are resolved to accept as conclusive the denunciations of spies whom you dare not bring face to face with the accused.’ And this, without apparent shame, M. Carafa frankly admitted to be the state of the case; repenting, that he was aware they could not produce a legal conviction, but that they had no doubt whatever of the guilt of the accused.”

Now what was it, let him ask, that the noble Lord and his colleagues desired the magistrates of England to do behind the backs of those persons who wanted to invest their capital in winchouses without bringing them face to face with their accusers? Why, it was clear the noble Lord was about to sanction here that very line of conduct which in the case of Naples he had so strongly denounced. But, to return to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had a speech of that right hon. Gentleman's had been published, from which also he wished to read an extract, inasmuch as he thought it very likely the right hon. Gentleman would contradict the statements which it contained. The speech in question had been published in The Alliance newspaper, and professed to have been made in answer to a deputation which had waited on him on the subject of granting licences. There was his own description of a clause in his Bill. Reference was made to the fact that beerhouse licences could not be taken away except after conviction. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was made to answer in answer to that remark,

“But in my Bill there is no conviction at all necessary. Any misconduct will endanger a licence. Therefore, as to the question of control, I should be very sorry if the control provided by the Bill is not ten times the control over the beerhouse. In the first place, the man must give notice to the magistrates; in the second place, the magistrates have nothing to do but simply to certify matters which they are sole judges. If they certify the facts, either that the house is not an eating-house in the meaning of the Act or that it is a disorderly house, frequented by disorderly persons—(which he should like to know, was the sort of evidence which would be required to prove that it was a disorderly house; was it sufficient that certain persons belonging to the class designated as ‘social evil’ had been seen going into it?)—the licence cannot issue. Now, it issues for twelve months, irrespective of any conviction at all. Therefore, under this Bill, licensed houses will be under the most absolute control, for there is an appeal whatever; nothing is required but the magistrate's certificate that it is a disorderly house, and even if the magistrates declare that fact falsely, from interested motives, still the licence is not issued. If that is not strong enough, I do not know what is.”

That was the Report published of the right hon. Gentleman's address to the deputation to which he referred. Now, if that language was used, he asked the House whether it was calculated to convey a true meaning of his measure to those parties who had waited on him? The right hon. Gentleman, when he spoke of magistrates acting falsely and from interested motives seemed to forget that there was such a place as the Queen's Bench in existence. He (Mr. Henley) took it if a magistrate had acted falsely or from interested motives that there would soon be a criminal information sued out against him in that place where learned and upright Judges presided. The Lord Chancellor, too, would deem it to be his duty to strike his name out of the commission of the peace. It would also be very strange if the lawyers would not find out some mode of bringing an action against such a man for damages. But would it be tolerated for one moment that people were to be convicted without hearing them? They had the strongest evidence within the last few months of what ought to be done under such circumstances. The Lord Chancellor, in a recent case, told most rev. Prelate that he could not decide without hearing the accused, and he took a great deal of pains to tell him why. The noble and learned Lord not only gave his reasons that would be sufficient for a layman, but he reminded the most rev. Prelate that Adam himself was heard before he was judged. That reference, to be sure, might have been for the special benefit of the party with whom he was dealing. Now, in the same spirit, he (Mr. Henley) told the right hon. Gentleman that he had no right to attempt to inveigle the magistrates of England into an act which no law attempted to justify until this precious Bill of the right hon. Gentleman's came into force, namely, to damn a man's character behind his back. All sorts of reflections were even now cast upon magistrates, even in the case of a hearing in open court; what, then, would be said to them when such things would be done in secret? Why, if they were foolish enough to act under this Bill the magistrates of England would stink in all men's nostrils. He had now stated the objections he had to this Bill. It was so framed that it would be almost impossible to alter it in Committee. The effect of the Bill was to tax every private person that sold victuals. How far the particular clause which went to that end would go, he did not pretend to say; but it would go very far, and it would be useless to alter the Bill in Committee, because its whole scheme needed alteration. Before sitting down, he could not help protesting against the course Government had taken in wholly disregarding the forms of the House, and that had led them into such inconveniences as they would have escaped if the ordinary course had been taken. If they had been asked to go into Committee, as they ought to have been, then the whole question would have been well raised, and the Government would have had the advantage of the discussion to see how they should frame their Bill. The Government, however, had taken the other course, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that it was better that they should have the Bill in order that they might know what was meant to be accomplished by it. Now, they had seen it, and certainly the naked idea in Committee had received a development which no ingenuity less than that of the right hon. Gentleman could have given it. No doubt the Resolution in Committee had been framed very widely, capable of anything—hanging everybody indeed; and the Bill did go far in that direction. He should be very glad to give all proper facilities to open houses for the sale of wine. The House having chosen to alter the duties, it would be wrong not to do so. But while

they
surc
out tart
test
cak
cha
him who ties
been thin
hou
in p it.
per did noin
by diff
so n
the upo
ing
this Gen
ter
the take rect
He
dra
a l mig littl
den
had bre
not had wou
for ever peti
but licen
out opin teou
end Upo
have wou
take sub duri
tant agai
whin

Mr. Henley

an absurd, hypocritical pretence—it would powerfully tend to promote licentiousness. He would make no attempt to defend himself from the ridicule this assertion might excite, but would pass on to the question which deserved most anxious consideration—whether the result of that Bill would not inevitably be a fearful increase in drunkenness. Of course, if the Bill would only create a general consumption of light and other light wines, every reasonable man would give it his hearty support; the point to be looked to was whether the result would not prove to be an almost universal sale in the eating-houses and beer-houses throughout the United Kingdom, under the name and pretence of wine, of ardent spirits, that was the point to grasp. Now, undoubtedly, the present habits of the mass of the people would crave a stronger and more stimulating drink than light claret, and he saw no possibility of preventing these wines from being mixed with brandy up to any strength whatever; again of other ardent spirits being surreptitiously sold in conjunction with them. The Bill, no doubt, attempted to provide that by allowing the police a free access into all houses where wines were sold, but he thought that no one could who studied the evidence given before the Committee on Public-houses without feel that this would be wholly ineffectual. Richard Mayne expressly told the Committee with regard to even the few existing wine-shops that, practically, you could not prove in evidence whether wine was sold or other drink under its name. That duty would become an impossibility if, as seemed likely if the Bill were carried, 150,000 to 200,000 places would be opened for the sale of wine. Not only common sense, but he was sorry to say, if the evidence laid before that Committee was to be trusted, experience too, had shown that if they required the police to be constantly entering these houses and examining the contents of the bottles and casks, the practical result would be to corrupt and demoralize the police, but not to attain the object which they were aiming. For this he thought it would be wrong to expose the police to so powerful a temptation. Therefore seemed to him to be as clear as daylight that the Bill would result in an universal sale of ardent spirits in almost every beer-house and eating-house in the kingdom. To that, however, he would not assent, if sound and effectual precautions were taken by the Bill against the excessive abuse of those commodities. Were any such precautions taken? Virtually none whatever. The Bill allowed almost any one to obtain a licence from the Excise and merely required that notice should be sent to the magistrates, and if they chose they would be at liberty to impose a veto in the case of any individual against whom they had specific grounds of complaint. But it required no deep knowledge of human nature to feel assured that, except in the rarest cases, the magistrates would not thrust their necks into a yoke which they were not called upon to assume. When they required them to issue the licences they threw upon them a clear duty, and they did it; but it was quite another thing to grant the licences through a different agency, merely giving the magistrates leave to put themselves forward to undertake a burdensome and invidious duty not exacted from them by the law. Practically, therefore, he thought the consequence of this Bill would be the unchecked, unrestrained sale, of ardent spirits. Now could they forget that vivid and striking experiment that was tried at Liverpool where the magistrates granted licences to every applicant; the result being, that whereas on an average of great towns one person in 400 is taken up for drunkenness in Liverpool one person in forty was taken up; and at last the magistrates themselves became so alarmed by the result of their own doings that they would not grant a licence to anybody. Still more emphatic was the warning given by the result of the Beer Bill? There was no one who took an interest in the wellbeing of the poor there was not a magistrate in the United Kingdom, who did not say that the Beer Bill had wrought infinite misery; not because what it was right to allow free trade in beer, but that it was wrong, it was a cruel wrong to the working class itself, not to adopt due precautions against that liberality degenerating into licentiousness. With this before him he felt it impossible to give his support to the Bill. On the other hand it would be only common sense to allow that free trade in wine was a necessary corollary to the commercial treaty with France. They could not dream of placing the sale of those wines under the restrictions of the existing licensing system with its close and monopolizing character. No statesman would propose that. The weighing these strong but conflicting considerations, his anxious hope was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be i indeed, by the expression of opinion that night, to withdraw this Bill, which excited opposition from both parties, and then at the earliest period bring in a well-considered measure, that would not attempt to draw any vain and illusory distinction between wine and spirits, but would apply to both the same system of precaution—a system at once more potent than the licensing system, and yet free from any taint of monopoly. There was no reason for supposing that such a substitute could not be found. That was not the occasion for delineating its features, but he might state in the barest words possible what he thought were the principles on which any scheme of precaution ought to be based. The licensing system was founded on the idea of checking drunkenness by restricting the number of houses for the sale of spirits. The effect of that was to give a monopoly to the selected houses, and to place in the hands of a few individuals the strange and arbitrary power of deciding for a district how much drink it wanted. Moreover, so much of the time and attention of the magistrates were taken up that they had little to bestow on the performance of their other duty—namely, that of renewing licences already granted. He would, therefore, discard that feature of the licensing system. His idea was, that instead of cutting and slashing at the whole trade they should concentrate all their force upon its abuse alone. To that end they ought to recognize the well-established fact that nearly all the worst drunkenness arose after eleven o'clock at night. He would, therefore, allow any householder to get a licence from the Excise for the sale of any liquor whatever up to that hour, paying, however, more for it than now. After eleven o'clock he would allow no house to be open for the sale of any intoxicating liquor whatever, except under a special licence for that purpose; and those night licences he would encompass with every kind of safeguard. They ought to ask a very large annual sum, both as some guarantee for respectability, and also as making them easier of control, because they would be fewer in number; but mainly as an inducement to the great mass of public-houses not to take out a night licence but to close at eleven o'clock. Again, the eleven o'clock licences should be granted and renewed each year by the magistrates; who, however, should have no power to limit the number for fear of monopoly, but whose one only duty regard-other parties, to the London brewers the licensing system gave no monopoly at all. Doubtless the overthrow of the licensing system would cause them a most serious loss for a time by depreciating the property upon the security of which they had made enormous advances, but not because it would deprive them of any monopoly. If the House would allow him he would briefly explain the exact nature of the connection between the London brewers and the licensing system. It might be convenient to the House to have some precise knowledge on that point, instead of the vague surmises and gross misrepresentations that had got hold of the public mind. Of course he could only speak for the firm to which he belonged, but his impression was that the same system was pursued by all the principal London breweries. It was usually imagined that the London brewers formed a compact organized body, keenly alive to its own interest, and so powerful in its union that it could override that of the public. He would state one fact that would, he thought, dispel that illusion. He had been for fifteen years connected with that business. During that time the London brewers had met upon only two occasions to discuss any trade question whatever. The first of those occasions was when the price of barley had risen to an enormous height. Several of them met—not all, some having refused to join—and it was agreed to raise the price of beer. In a few weeks they had to meet again and bring it down to its former level, because they found their trade was rapidly passing into other hands. The other occasion was when the extra duty was imposed on malt during the Russian war. They then all agreed to raise the price of beer in due proportion, and lowered it again as soon as the extra duty was taken off. Those were the only occasions on which any trade question had been discussed by the London brewers during the last fifteen years. Why, if they had ever so powerful an organization among themselves they could not stand out for a moment against the competition of the 2,000 country brewers, some of whom already did a large trade in the Metropolis—for instance, the Dublin stout and Burton ale brewers. The other assumption was that the licensing system had so greatly reduced the number of public-houses that the brewers had been able to get hold of nearly all, and to put in their own nominees, who therefore were in abject subjection to them. He denied that the publicans in London were in subjection to the brewers. He asserted that if not all, yet far the greater number of the licensed victuallers of London were perfectly free to deal with whatever brewery they pleased. He would give the House some facts that would prove that assertion. Of those who dealt with his firm, three-fifths were out of London. No one supposed that over those they could have any control whatever. Of the two-fifths resident in London, just 17 per cent were their tenants; but of those only two were tenants at will—all the remainder had leases, in no case for less than ten years. But then of the eighty-three per cent who occupied their own houses, a large number had borrowed money from them to enable them to take those houses up, and it was generally thought that in taking a loan the publican bound himself to them hand and foot. Nothing could be more untrue. The publican was as free after taking the loan as he was before. Of course, while he held their loan he dealt with them; but the moment anything annoyed him, he had only to go across to any other firm, who would be too delighted to advance him the money with which he paid off his loan from the one party and transferred his account to the other. And if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would ever do them the honour to come down and examine into their system, which they would be too happy to throw wide open before him, he could give him other equally strong proofs of their entire independence.

Mr. Buxton

SIR MORTON PETO said, he intended to support the second Reading of this Bill, because he believed that a great body of his constituents desired that he should do so. The objections raised by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) were all such as could be dealt with in Committee; and because he believed not only that the Bill would not, as had been stated, give increased facilities for intoxication, but that it would lead to a directly opposite result. He had found in those countries where he had to carry out extensive contracts, and where wine was the principle beverage, that the natives employed by him were among the soberest of his workmen. For instance, in connection with the contract his firm had undertaken for the construction of the Mediterranean Railway, upon which were some of the heaviest engineering earthworks that it had ever fallen to his lot to construct, he had taken into his employment about 3,000 of the Piedmontese peasantry. These men drank the wine of the country, they worked well, they saved money, and they took it home to their families; and he had not heard of a single case of drunkenness having occurred amongst them. Now, if this were the case there, he could not understand why, the same state of things being established, and wine rendered easily and cheaply accessible to our working men, the same result should not be attained in this country. For these reasons he felt that he was conscientiously performing his duty in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he assented to the principles laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting the wine duties; but he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was willing to relinquish the 4th clause of his Bill, that being the one which imposed a tax upon all refreshment-houses of whatsoever degree they might be. There were throughout the country many small shops at which were sold apples, oranges, ginger-beer, ginger-bread, &c., and which would doubtless be brought within the provisions of the Bill, as they were in every sense of the word refreshment-houses; but the proprietors were in many cases poor women in a humble condition of life, who managed to eke out an existence by the sale of the articles to which he had referred. Were such as these, then, to be compelled to pay a licence of 10s. 6d.? His own impression had been, when listening to the speech made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the introduction of this Bill, that it was intended only to compel those refreshment-houses that sold the wine which he anticipated would, under his new measure, find its way into this country to take out licences. His vote upon the second reading of the Bill would depend entirely upon the answer the right hon. Gentleman gave to this question; for he quite approved of the licence being made compulsory where wine was sold, but should strongly oppose any attempt to impose a licence upon all refreshment-houses whether they sold wine or not.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—The short, but, I think, most able speech of my hon. Friend (Sir M. Peto) has opened the line of remark which I should have wished to take, and has diminished the labour, such as it is, which still lies before me, with out, with to do me hon. Gen giving hi and objection to detail.

hon. Gen to the B occasion vote pre to the re cise desc the wine condition the hour gistrates a hearin, that have tions I a been left

~~and~~ a favour because aid to t acute and he has h Bills as has had framed t especially not find sound ob half so turn on he comp having n and stroi shoulder that we being he on the fir that eith the hon. have rea whether is suffice most un to impos upon all —not to all house aumed u it upon b purpose aumed o consumpt business That is

Sir Morton Peto

Bill. The right hon. Gentleman will see that the object with which the clause has been framed entirely disposes of his gingerbread, oranges, and barley-sugar cases, and all the rest of it, because these are not houses kept open for the purpose of selling refreshment to be consumed on the premises. That I hold to be clear as a matter of fact. But the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) is a wider one. I believe it will be answered by the exemptions in the seventh clause, which apply to all small places. At the same time, I look upon this part of the Bill as involving matter which is secondary and incidental to the main object of the measure, and which, undoubtedly, I, for my part, thought it my duty to adopt mainly in deference to the authority of a unanimous Committee of this House, and to what I know to be the views of the police authorities. To me it seems not unreasonable that, especially in large towns, in conformity with the views taken by the Committee, those houses which are kept open for the purpose of the consumption of refreshments upon the premises, and which become places of public resort and amusement, should, under certain conditions, and in principle, be brought within the superintendence of the police. And I am bound to say that I do not believe there is that great objection to the supervision of the police by this description of persons which has been supposed. I have only received one remonstrance—and one, I think, which ought to be attended to—from the bakers, who say that they occasionally sell bread to be consumed on the premises; and if they are within the operation of the Bill they certainly ought to be relieved from it. But I do not regard this portion of the Bill as forming any part of its essence, and only wish the House to give a candid consideration to the recommendations of the Committee upon this subject. Any proposals which accord with the general spirit of the suggestions made by the Committee will answer my purpose, and even if the House thought fit to strike out of the Bill all that relates to the licensing of refreshment-houses, the main object of the measure would not be affected. Then, as to the hearing before the magistrates, to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) devoted so large a portion of his speech, there is only one thing which the gentlemen of the Alliance who reported what fell from me would have done well to add had they recollected it. I frankly owned referring to the simple and arbitrary discretion given to magistrates, that this Bill was drawn with an almost unlimited desire to give them every possible power to decide matters of fact, and required only honesty and intelligence to give it effect. And I do say that the provisions of the Bill, as they stand, are so stringent that I believe I shall find it necessary to limit and restrain them. I so entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman, that if I had had the opportunity of reprinting the Bill at an early period, I would have inserted words to give express recognition to the right of hearing. Such being the case, the question between the right hon. Gentlemen and myself is simply one of detail, and in order to consider the details it is that I ask the House to allow the Bill to be discussed in Committee. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) has spoken of the position of a great and powerful party in respect to this matter. All that has been said by my hon. Friend I am sure has been said in good faith and sincerity; but I doubt whether what he has described as his own case is precisely the case of other persons in similar positions. The hon. Gentleman says, "Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer withdraw this Bill and bring in another, and he will have no difficulty in passing it." It is a very great compliment to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to suppose that, even with the assistance of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, of the Revenue departments, and of my official colleagues, I could frame a system novel in its application in such a way as beforehand to put aside all objections. But I am not so sanguine. I believe there is nothing like a Committee of this House, with its variety of minds, of interests, and of powers to bring to bear upon particulars, for considering the details of this measure. Then this question comes back to this point, do we mean rigidly to stand by the licensing system as it exists, or not? That is the real question before the House. It is no easy matter to raise this subject at all. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) is one who will manfully face the question when it is raised; but he knows that it is not easy to deal with a question of this kind, and I say with unfeigned respect that the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) discussed to-night the claims of the licensed victuallers with an ingenuousness not often met with, although its influence sometimes direct-es negatively, the decisions of entatives. The right hon. Gen-enley) has fairly said that the

 , having induced the House to a large sacrifice of revenue in nit French wines at a low duty,
 duty to submit to the House
 actory state of the law with re-
 he sale of wine in this country.
 sfactory, in the first place, as
 e sale of wine not to be drunk
 rises; and, above all, unsatisregards the sale of wine to be n houses of refreshment. I
 m. Member for Leominster (Mr.
 that he would give every ent within reasonable limits to the
 of liquors of this kind in fa-disposing of the case of fami-
 isposing of the whole country.
 w a social organization under cially in great towns, but also owns, there are hundreds, thou-of thousands, aye, in London
 thousands of persons—shop-
 women, seamstresses, agents, travellers, and others—the na-
 e daily occupations would dis-
 n from profiting by the boon
 hon. Member for Leominster
 hom, to consume wine in their Vo plead on behalf of those desire to meet a legitimate nee offer a measure which inns at promoting the use of a more innocuous drink in com-
 the spirits which are sold now.
 gitimate object of legislation,
 you now to allow this Bill to ed in Committee. But then eal case. The question is not es shall be heard by the magis-whether we should tax coffee-whether the Bill is likely to nt increase of intemperance, nly consideration we ought to this occasion; and I feel that
 n. Gentleman opposite will not the subject if he records his t the second reading. It is whether this Bill will tend to increase intemperance. Who lls us such will be the case?
 y who combine to form the op-
 his Bill upon the ground that to increase drunkenness? It proposition, but it proceeds who are singularly united in ecordant discord. There is an anciller of the Exchequer

old fable, called, I believe, the "Visio Hercules," which is in point. When cules was young, he dreamt that he c to a certain point of the road, where was met by two figures—one the figure Virtue, and the other the figure of V
 He was solicited by Virtue to go way and by Vice to go another.
 are, in regard to this Bill, much in position of Hercules, as we are enc
 tered by two figures of Virtue and V
 But instead
 one way, an other, we leagued aga
 the road and ceed. It is that is forn
 know the vi support the
 the hon. and bone (Mr. E. overboard in used are a g
 together, wh
 and to deal v
 of wine is to
 of ardent sp sophers will distinction;
 "alcoholic lic
 and such like Member for them the fall
 are so disti
 tween the lig
 and the gin
 our great to deplorable d
 that prevails
 that no Engl
 a proper use
 found a testin
 weight, comi
 sacred profes distinguished
 —Dr. Guthri devoted hims
 sided for son
 in one of h
 and Sorrow Brussels and national festi
 in seven wee those capital
 seven short or any other Sir, is the t ness. I have and Vice; an

all the common sense of the House of Commons and of the country at large. I have heard references made to the number of petitions presented against this Bill; I deny that this Bill is disapproved by the public opinion of England. We all know that wherever there is an organization the numbers which it commands are readily available for the purpose of signing petitions; but in this case we have the strongest evidence, from the press, from various authorities, and even from several distinguished friends of temperance, in favour of the principle of the measure. The real question is this, Will you attempt to modify or improve the present system? I grant that this Bill is so far inconsistent with the Report of the Committee that it is short of that Report; but I hold that it is in harmony both with the spirit and with the letter of that Report. I will refer to some of the erroneous opinions that have been urged against the Bill. It is insisted by some that you should treat the use of spirits, and even of the lightest wine, as you treat the use of brandy, for instance. It is insisted that you have nothing to look at except the number of houses for the sale of liquors in order to ascertain the measure of drunkenness that prevails. The case of Liverpool has been referred to, and I will show the House how untrue that is in the case of Liverpool. It is true there is a large number of public-houses in Liverpool; I think the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) when he was dealing with this subject, and when he was referring to the case of Liverpool and Manchester, did great injustice even to those beerhouses with respect to which so much has been said. He alluded to the great difference in point of opinion in favour of Manchester against Liverpool, but he omitted to notice that the characteristic of Manchester was that there was a greater number of public-houses and a smaller number of beerhouses, and that the characteristic of Liverpool was the reverse. It is not true that in Liverpool the offences vary with the number of public-houses. I have got before me the number of persons brought before the magistrates in Liverpool for drunkenness in a series of years, and also the number of licences granted. I find that in 1846 the magistrates granted seventeen new licences to public-houses; and in 1847 there was a diminution of 256 in the number of persons brought up for drunkenness. In 1852 the magistrates gave no new licences; and in 1853 there was an increase of 1,144 in the number of persons brought up for drunkenness. In 1854 the magistrates gave two new licences; and there was an increase of 1,018 in the persons taken up for drunkenness. In 1857 the magistrates gave the issue of a number of thirty-two new licences in Liverpool; and in 1858 there was a decrease of 1,259 in the persons brought up for drunkenness. That shows you how loose and how wildly those doctrines are thrown about. Some hon. Members may have seen a tract in which a great number of medical men in this country are declared to declare that all strong liquors, under every condition, are extremely mischievous, and that total and universal abstinence from alcoholic drinks and intoxicating beverages of all kinds would greatly contribute to the health and prosperity of the human race. Naturally enough, I looked among the names for that of the gentleman of professional assistance I had availed myself of, and by whom I have been recently assisted. I found his signature appended to the tract, at which I was not a little surprised, seeing I remembered that he recommended me, as a means of recovering my strength, to abstain from all strong and not illiberal potations. I afterward asked him whether he had signed that document or not; he replied that he had; and pressing my surprise at his having done so, he assured me that in signing it he meant nothing more than that excess of drinking was less injurious than excess of abstinence. That was the opinion of a very eminent medical man, Dr. Ferguson; and I think it is a gross error to suppose that the testimony of those who study the habits of mankind is against the moderate use of spirituous liquors. It is said by some that there can be no such thing as a moderate use of them—that the thing is altogether evil. But it seems to me that if you were to proscribe the use of them you would proscribe a great many other things, not the love of money, for example, which is prevalent and as universal as the use of wine? I never heard that those who have denounced the use of alcoholic liquors have denounced their own principles with consistent effect; and if they did so, the effect would be that they should go, like the anchorites of old, and people the deserts of Egypt. But the doctrine, that the moderate use of wine is to be treated as an unqualified evil, and almost as a sin, is inconsistent with the usages and necessities of human life. That, however, is at the root of the objection made by one portion of the op-

Virtue the temperance community. there was another important element consideration of the question—common sense, and in that respect the principle of measure was directly opposed to the commendation contained in the Report of the Select Committee. The Chancellor and the Exchequer was undeterred by the warning of experience. Acting on the principles enunciated in the Report of the Committee and on those of common sense, should vote against the Second Read-

Question put,
The House divided:—Ayes 267; Noes
: Majority 74.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

will read 2^o and committed for Thurs.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER said, hon. Members were aware in the Bill, as it now stood, the licences were printed in italics, and would
 in fact, form part of it, until agreed in Committee of Ways and Means. He hoped, therefore, that they would permit to go into Committee of Ways and Means at once. The licences could be discussed on the first clause of the Bill.

Mr. NEWDEGATE and Mr. AYRTON objected to the course proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he refrained from pressing request against the wish of the House. proposed to go into Committee of Ways and Means on Thursday, before going into Committee on the Wine Licen-

CENSUS (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he objected to its being gone into at this time to-night. He thought it would be better to make the Irish Census annually than occasionally.

Mr. CARDWELL hoped his hon. friend would not object to the Second Reading, and reserve any suggestions he might wish to make for another occasion. The Bill introduced no new principle and cost no new expense. The same system would be adopted now as had been employed on former occasions, and the whole constabulary would do the work at almost trifling cost.

Mr. HADFIELD asked why a distinction should be made between the mode of

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

taking the census in England?

Bill read 2^d. and committed

Hou

HOUSE OF LORDS

Tuesday, May 8, 1962

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st E3
(£18,280,000).

2^a Duchy of Cornwall (Limitati
Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amer

BANKRUPT LAW (SCOTLAND)
MENT BILL—SECOND R

Order of the Day for the Session
read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR the second reading of this Bill was to remedy a flagrant had existed for some years in tration of the bankruptcy law, and which had brought credit upon both England and Scotland. By the law of Scotland any had been resident there for four years domiciled so far that he might sue in the Courts as a domiciled of her Majesty in that part of the Kingdom, and he might have a decree of bankruptcy, or a sequestration was called, issued against him. If he succeeded, discharged his obligation in respect of debts, and began the world anew. The spirit of the law had been taken to an extent of which the Scotch probably had no idea. A vast number of bankrupts and insolvents had fled from England to Scotland, and, there for forty days, amusing themselves perhaps with deer stalking and shooting, got a sequestration against themselves at their own instance. It was true that an advertisement was published informing the creditors that they were about to be done, but it did not oblige them to appear at Aberdeen or some other remote part of the Kingdom. Happening to be at Tobermory, Western Islands, about eight months ago, he was told that an English firm had established themselves there, for the purpose of doing up the business of English bankrupts and insolvents, and that their object was to get them "whitewashed" or discharged.

for reasons which I gave on a former occasion, such a policy will not be recommended. Those, therefore, who vote for opposition will simply be voting for inquiry. No one, however, I presume, will do so, unless he shall think that alterations are really required, and believe there is fair prospect of an adequate remedy being suggested, should a Commission be issued.

As far as argument goes, I should be glad to sit down at once, and to rest my case upon the speech which I addressed to your Lordships in the month of May, 1858. I have in no way altered the opinions to which I then gave vent, and to this day that address remains unanswered. If I turn for an example of this to the conjecture that the subject was not of sufficient importance, I am met by the fact, that, for the last six months and more, pamphlets with reference to a Revision of the Liturgy and its meetings have been held in different parts of the country to debate the subject, the various papers taking cognizance of ecclesiastical matters have been filled with articles and letters regarding it, and even the daily press has taken part in the discussion. If I turn, to what I should naturally turn to, for a solution of the difficulty—namely, the insignificance of the individual who enunciated these opinions, I am again baffled by the fact that that speech and the humble individual who has now the honour to address me have been the subject of a manifesto of unparalleled, which has obtained the signature of nearly ten thousand of the nobility. To this declaration it will be my duty later to call your Lordships' particular attention; I will therefore leave it to the present.

However, in all probability, many of your Lordships now present, neither read nor saw my former statement, as they will have but an imperfect recollection of it, and as, moreover, many circumstances have happened since which have a special bearing upon this case, I fear it will be absolutely necessary for me again to trespass upon your patience, in order to secure a full understanding of the question at issue.

The circumstances to which I allude are these: your Lordships will recollect that when I brought forward this question originally, the question had for so many years been in abeyance, or been only incidentally alluded to at rare and distant intervals, that it came a new one, and must be trusted in the archives of the House much so, indeed, and I did I find it, that I will at that time not to ask of this House; and in the assurance your Lordships will be guided by a wise discretion, ever, has happened since. I will recollect that one of the Liturgy which I thought of, was that containing the State Service, after I had brought my proposition to the House, a noble Earl drew the attention of the House to that part of the Prayer Book, and suggesting the House to add to the purpose of removing it accordingly removed. I doubtless, and justly, whatever it may be, of the Liturgy to him; but, may be allowed to pick up crumbs which fall from the table; because, although certain, it is just possible, given notice of my Motion might have waited a while I had crowned his well-deserved, however, be permitted to infinitely prefer my own way of dealing with these matters to this House on the recommendation of my noble Friend. I propose my noble Friend's measure; and so much did I when a noble Duke proposed a short delay to check the motion, and to see whether it might not be allowed. The Service Book of these days is of these great landmarks in our history—I expressed my objection to such a proposition; and I doubt, as the event has proved, prejudices—if you like of many old-fashioned persons necessarily shocked by the proposed change of action.

But this is not all that I have to say, that which some persons consider as too fearful an alteration in matters, the House of Commons has appealed to for a confirmation. Well, my Lords, and what is the position there? Yes, undoubtedly, but from whom did it come? Some envious Nonconformists.

not very difficult to foresee. But there is again another manifestation of clerical opinion, which may guide us in our decision. It is that declaration to which I have already alluded, and to which I now beg to invite your Lordships' attention.

If any one had told me previously that I should have been the object of an address signed by ten thousand of our clergy, I should have suspected his sanity; nevertheless, such has actually come to pass, and as it begins with Lord Ebury, ends with Lord Ebury, and is an anticipatory inculcation of my conduct, I hope the framers will not be offended if I comment upon it with perfect frankness. All I fear is that, in the course of my remarks upon it, I may seem to appear somewhat ungrateful to those who have placed me on so lofty a pedestal. The declaration, with its preface, my Lords, has two capital defects: it is feeble, and apparently disingenuous. There is nothing that candid men so much condemn as taking a sentence out of a man's writings, and attempting to give it a signification which, when taken with the context, it will not bear. As to this quotation from my speech, it is unnecessary that I should read or even refer you to my speech, from which it is an extract; it is so unskilful that it carries its own condemnation with it. And how my respected friend, the Dean of Westminster, himself the author of an able treatise on the Revision of the Bible, could have suffered himself to stand godfather to such a production, I am at a loss to conceive. So much for the preface; now for the declaration itself. I should have thought that when so solemn a proceeding was had recourse to as that of demanding an expression of the opinion of the clerical body of England and Ireland, it would have been asked upon some definite alternative. But what does this tell us? You will recollect that this is based upon my speech of 1858, in which I laid down three points—that Revision was desired, that it was desirable, and that the method by which I proposed to effect it was both constitutional and expedient. Does this declaration deny any one of those propositions? Does it deny that our canons and formularies require revision? Not at all? All it says is, that any attempt to revise at this time would be dangerous. We old political stagers know full well the meaning of meeting a question, hitherto encountered by a direct negative with the previous question, i.e., that it is not the right time; it is simply a prelude to a final surrender. This manifesto, therefore, may justly be called the Retreat of the Ten Thousand. And, my Lords, considering that this address pledges its signers to nothing—that it was issued not long after the declaration of distinguished prelates of Canterbury Convocation against Revision—that sea and land were compassed to obtain signatures, for it was sent not only to every clergyman in England, but also to those in Ireland—and that even to this milk-and-water document nothing like half the clergy have appended their names—I am entitled to say that the majority of the clergy have no foregone conclusions on this head, but that they are willing to give a candid and impartial consideration to any proposition for improving the Canons and Prayer Book of our Church. But, say these gentlemen, "it is not the time." Not the time! but, my Lords, when is the good time to come? Will you listen to these words? "Ornatior quidem, accuratior, plenior, brevior, potest ea et debet fieri, sed tranquillis hominum animis, non inter media dissidia mutuasque suspiciones." By whom, and at what time, do your Lordships think these words were spoken? They are taken from a sermon of Archbishop Secker, delivered just one hundred years ago; and, if things are to proceed in this way, it is possible that some hon. Member or noble Lord may make a Motion similar to mine in 1860, and say, "These words were quoted by a Peer one hundred years ago, moving for a Royal Commission, as used by an Archbishop one hundred years before that."

I do not think it would have been very difficult to give an answer to this declaration, even had it merely said, "We object to Revision at this time;" though it might not have been very clear with what arguments it was necessary to grapple. Fortunately, however, reasons are here assigned for the objection. "It will endanger," say they, "the peace and unity of the Church." Peace and unity of the Church, my Lords? Why, where has this sacred cohort been living? Peace and unity of the Church! It will be my melancholy task, to show not only that there is no peace or unity to disturb, and that this state of things is owing, not to any agitation for a Revision of the Liturgy, but that it is in consequence of that Revision not having taken place one hundred years ago, and there not having been a complete modification of that Act of Uniformity, Proceeding by Duplex Querela in the Arches, on Preliminaries.

Proceeding by Duplex Querela in the Arches, on the Main Question.

Appeal to Judicial Committee of Privy Council, Motion to stay proceedings in Queen's Bench.

Do. do. in Common Pleas.

Do. do. in Exchequer.

Bishop renounces communion with his Metropolitan.

350. The Queen v. Rev. Mr. James.—Indictment for Refusing to Marry. Spring Assizes, Easter, 1860.

351. Riots at St. Barnabas, Pimlico.—Proceedings at Police Courts, &c. Involved Resignation of Rev. Mr. Bennett.

351. Manifesto of Archbishops and Bishops to the Clergy of Church of England.—On Ritual Objections.

354 to 1859. Ditcher v. Danison.—Involving Doctrines of the Church of England respecting Baptism and the Eucharist. Representation of Archbishop: Reference to Bishop: Consideration and Admonition by Bishop: Application to a second Bishop: Proceeding by Archbishop: Proceeding (1st) in Court of Queen's Bench: Mandamus of Archbishop: Proceeding (2nd) in Court of Queen's Bench: Commission. Judgment (still unreported): Appeal to Arches: Proceeding by Mandamus—Court of Queen's Bench: Further proceeding in Arches: Appeal to Privy Council.

357. Westerton v. Liddell, and Liddell v. Beal.—As to Decoration of Churches. Arches and Privy Council. Now again in Arches (1860).

358. Rev. Temple West.—Confession and Abolution. (Boyn Hill Case.) Proceeding by Commission in Diocese of Oxford.

359. Rev. A. Poole's Case.—Confession and Abolution. Proceeding before Bishop of London: Appeal to Archbishop: Mandamus from Court of Queen's Bench: Hearing before Archbishop's Auditor: Archbishop's Judgment: Appeal to Privy Council (now pending).

360. St. George's-in-the-East and Mr. Rosier's Case.—Involving proceedings in Police Courts and Courts of Arches, and Questions as to Ritual Objections, Ceremonials, Doctrine and Teaching, Decorations, Brawling.

Other proceedings have agitated the Church, such as—

Rev. Dr. Pusey—Suspended for a Sormon: Abdemon Wilberforce's Secession.—Threatened Law Proceedings: Debate in the House of Commons, carried to a second day, on the induction of Mr. Bennett to Frome; The Madeira (Mr. Pusey's) Case:—A Bishop and Dean Excommunicated: The Jerusalem Bishopric Case: Golightly v. the Bishop of Chichester: The Lewes Burial Case, with Riots: Rev. Mr. Bricknell's Case.—Mentioned: Bishop of Winchester v. Heath: Cross v. Vicar of Enfield and his Churchwardens.—Two Suits now pending.

These are some, though by no means all, of the cases which have so painfully occupied public attention. It must be borne in mind that, after all this litigation, with the exception of the Stone Altar Case, scarcely anything is settled; and, at this very moment, the suits of Westerton v. Liddell, and Poole v. Ar again before the Court, are lectured that time spent in these would be sufficient, as to provide the means of spiritual destitution. The peaceful and described by the President over the letter recently the following to

"In dealing, however, with Liturgy, we must look to the Church at large. What is the loss? Not the calling on Divine Word characterized our youth—a calm as compatible with agreeable to the law of our Reformed would still say it moves.' But I find introduction of such any rate obsolete; cases unable to conform and ceremonies such scenes with weakness on the part (the law at present interfere), and such all sides, are together of the Laity towards

Listen also to Right Rev. Prelate

"Again, the proceedings of several last few years; to deny the Protectors of England, and errors of the Church a few weak-minded willing congregations and unauthorized ceremonies; and, of our Church and ability, and movements, in some Romish doctrine churches. . . . causes, may be estrangement between of our population Gloucester and Bristol

Probably there Lordships who disastrous effect on own neighbour case within my and important cases been neglected—died. The parson rector with open all the aid in the Uniformity, which, on St. Bartholomew's Day following, ejected 2,000 ministers from their livings,—which, if rigidly enforced (as it was intended to be), would have established a system of persecution unparalleled in any Protestant country,—and which, notwithstanding the succeeding Act of Toleration, Annual Indemnity Acts, and other relaxations, has deprived the Church of England of the support of those who now form the Wesleyan and other powerful and pious persuasions, and has considerably impaired her influence and usefulness.”—(Lives of Chancellors, by LORD CAMPBELL, vol. iv., p. 85.)

That, my Lords, is the description of this Act given by the Lord Chancellor, now seated on the Woolsack.

Well, the Act was passed—the old dominant party triumphed. Then came the Five Mile Act, the Test and Corporation Act, and so on. And in our Litany, and so it remains to this day, we invoked the Divine blessing upon that, which, if we are permitted to know anything of the counsels of the Most High, is one of the most hateful things in the sight of the Supreme Being, namely, the use of the sword of the civil magistrate for the propagation of religious truth. But we were not satisfied with praying; we prosecuted the hapless Nonconformists from city to city, from town to town, from village to village, haling men and women, and committing them to prison and to death. But how wonderfully do we see Divine Providence overruling all things to some good! But for this persecution, humanly speaking, we should never have possessed a book which, with the single exception of Holy Writ, has done more good, and gone through more editions, than any other work that ever was written—I mean, the incomparable allegory of The Pilgrim's Progress. And so hot was our persecution against our Nonconformist brethren, that we actually drove them into the arms of the Papists, and they together, by a strange conjuncture, obtained the Act of Toleration, one of the great charters of our liberty, from the hands of a Popish monarch. I will not go over the dreary history of our Church in the eighteenth century, during which the trumpet blown by Wesley and Whitefield scarcely interfered with our slumbers; but it is well worthy of remark, that no abundant blessing seems to have been vouchsafed to us, so long as one of these persecuting Acts remained upon our Statute-book. I myself sat six or seven years in Parliament before the Test and Corporation Act, and the Roman Catholic Disabilities Act, were repealed; and from that era we may date that remarkable revival of genuine religion which I have described in an earlier part of my address.

I am now compelled to ask your Lordships' attention to some very serious dangers, to which we are exposed, if we continue any longer as we are, and neglect to attempt that comprehension which I believe can certainly be effected, and to which the last clause of the prefatory part of my Motion points. My Lords, my right Rev. Diocesan has very correctly defined the theory of an Established Church. He said, during the debate on the Services in Theatres, that his only idea of a National Church was one rooted in the affections of the people. I am sure you will concur in the propriety of that definition. But, my Lords, can anybody, seeing what is passing around us, bring himself to assert that such, or anything like such, is the case with our Establishment? It is a very painful subject to speak upon; but it is much better to speak out. That, as a body, the ministers of our Church are highly respected, we have ample testimony; and if I could only persuade your Lordships to adopt this Motion, there is just ground for hoping that the Church would realize the definition of my right Rev. Friend. But can we shut our eyes to this fact? The pastors of at least four millions of the inhabitants of this country are content, for conscience' sake, to forego all participation in a revenue of £4,000,000 a year, all hopes of attaining one of some thirty life peerages, many other great positions of dignity, usefulness, and affluence, together with a high social status amongst the aristocracy of the country. And when to this we add the consideration of the deep attachment of the great portion of this vast multitude to their pastors, is it possible to say of our Church that she is rooted and grounded in the affections of the people? Does it not, on the contrary, suggest that we are in circumstances calculated to excite alarm, and show the absolute necessity of attempting a remedy for these unquestionable evils? I grieve to say, my Lords, that I could mention other indications of a similar nature; but I refrain from doing so, because it is a painful subject, and because I have already so greatly trespassed on the attention of the House.

Supposing there was no such thing as Dissent, I should desire a Revision of the Liturgy and Canons for the good of our own communion; but with a state of Non-mformity to the extent of that which is arising us in the face, a man must be dead to all sense of the magnitude of the evils of disunion, the vantage-ground it gives our common enemy, the hindrance to success in our common object—one in comparison to which all other earthly objects sink into insignificance—if he be not ready to strain every nerve to put an end to it. The basis of the National Church ought to be as broad as possible.

But it is said, however this may be, all attempts at conciliation and concession will do nothing; you will drive some of our attached Churchmen away—you will win nothing from the ranks of Dissent. These are assertions wholly unsupported by practical proof. As to losing attached Churchmen, were it proposed to exact the new test, or to narrow the platform of our National Establishment, I could understand such a consequence. But that, to cause a latitude, always allowed in some essentials, should be conveyed in language less ambiguous than heretofore, men arearranted in retaining and propagating the doctrines of our Church should, notwithstanding, leave our ranks, I can only consider as a libel upon the heads and hearts of those of whom such a course is predicted. And, again, as to not conciliating our Nonconformist brethren, no doubt the difficulties will be considerable. The wall of separation which we have been carefully building up for 300 years, cannot be pulled down in a day. Certainly, if comprehension is attempted, none will be kept; but it is contrary to all history, to experience, and to present appearances, to suppose, that an advance on our part will not be met by a corresponding approach from the other side. Many eminent men do not think that an attempt at comprehension will fail. Listen, in regard to this point, once more to the words of the late Lord Hale:—

"Much, too, were it to be wished that certain able forms of prayer might be introduced here and there for the relief of scrupulous consciences, infelicitously wounded by having to read offices which suppose a totally different state of discipline in the Church. But of these things there is little to be said. The spirit of Catholic comprehension has never found a home in more than a very few hearts within our Church, the majority have mostly contented for little except maintaining their own position in whatsoever manner and however numerous multitudes they might exclude from it. I do not mean that the removal of hindrances and objections would of itself bring back our brethren who have separated from us out of the pale of the Church. Though we retrace our steps, we cannot regain our former position; for the world meanwhile has been rolling onward. Nor can the manifold feelings of bitterness, and animosity, of pride, and self-will, which are generated and fostered by habitual schism, be stifled or eradicated in a moment. If our Dissenting brethren are to be reclaimed, it must be the work of time, and can only be accomplished by the preaching of the Gospel of truth and peace, and by proving that the Spirit does indeed dwell in the Church, manifesting himself by works of holiness and love. But the taking down of the fences which have hitherto kept them out, so far as this may be done without injury to truth and order, is a requisite preparative for this work."—Preface to his Sermon upon Unity, pp. 12, 13.

Lord Ebury

I have, also, a letter from a Layman well acquainted with the feelings of the Nonconformist body in the Northern district:—

"From what I have said you will see that I do not think the 'Religious Dissenters,' the office-bearers amongst them, would be likely to join the Church, because these are the very men most affected by the practical conditions of Lay-Church life referred to. But I have no doubt that a great number of persons would take the opportunity which various discontents and distastes had long prepared them, and I am bound to admit that many Dissenters that I have spoken to agree in thinking that there would be a large secession. Yet the strong point, I think, is in the likelihood that the better sources of the ministry would be, for a time, lost to Dissent."

I have many others bearing upon this question, all in the same sense. I commend strongly to those who are interested in this question, a published correspondence between the Bishop of Adelaide and Mr. Binney, a distinguished Nonconformist minister, in a volume called "Church Life in Australia," in which this subject is elaborately treated; and although they cannot hit upon any definite plan of union, it is impossible to rise from a perusal of the correspondence without being convinced that the day is not far distant when the most devoutly-to-be-wished-for consummation will be achieved—at all events, in our Australian colonies.

Well, my Lords, but perhaps you will ask me what it is that I desire the Commission to do. Now, I think I have shown you a state of disorder in our ecclesiastical system, as now constituted, calling so loudly for remedies, that, if a Commission were appointed, common sense would direct them at once to take into consideration the numerous special demands that have been made for improvement, rejecting what to them appears objectionable, recommending what seems the most practicable, just as did the American Convention of our sister

Church, taking evidence, either written or oral, upon points of doubt and difficulty, and circulating queries when they desire further information. But as I have been so often asked the question what my own views are, I am perfectly willing, so far as I can, to answer it, though of course it can only be in general terms:—

The Commission would, I presume, be composed of Ecclesiastics, with the admixture of a few Laymen; at all events, of some civilians to assist in the review of our Canons and Constitutions. It would be animated, doubtless, by the spirit which is so well set forth in the letter of the American Episcopal Convention to the Anglican Bishops (1786), namely, "not to depart from any doctrine of our Church, but carefully to consider the alteration of such things as are calculated to remove objections, which it would appear to be more conducive to union and general content to obviate than to dispute."

As to the Canons, in regard to the validity and operation of which the greatest variety of opinion prevails—and which, if allowed to remain as they now are, it is possible may become the source of even more vexatious litigation than ever they have been previously—I presume those that are deemed obsolete will be expunged; whilst any that it is considered useful to retain, will be couched in comprehensible language, and placed in harmony with existing use. Although, in old phraseology, in their entirety, they are called the Book of Canons, yet there is in fact no Book. They are of two sorts—the old black-letter Canons framed before the Reformation, and sanctioned by Act of Parliament 25th Henry VIII., so far as they be not contrary to custom, statute, or Royal prerogative; the others, of 1603, which were never confirmed by Parliament, and which are supposed to be binding on the clergy alone, though doubts have been frequently expressed whether, in fact, they are binding on any one; and, in truth, they are almost universally disregarded. The historian of the early Puritans says of them—

"The disgrace of these barbarous Canons belongs to the Convocation in which they passed; but prejudice, fomented from time to time by some of her assailants, still lays it to the Church of England; and it must be allowed that some degree of censure fairly belongs to her for permitting the Canons to remain so long without revision, for the Canons in their present state are discreditable to the Church, unsuited to the age, and urgently wanting revision."

With regard to the Prayer Book, the changes most generally desired are these:—First and foremost, an without which other alterations scarcely be considered a boon, stand the abolition of the Terms of Subscription forced by the Act of the 14th of Charles II. They were not considered essential to the Church of Jewel and Hooker during the stormiest periods of our Church History. They are a disgrace to our Statute-book since the year 1860. Then, the abbreviation of the Morning Service and Daily Service, and the removal of the objections to which they are subject in the language of Archdeacon Berridge—

"Our Morning Services last too long, on a moral and physical point of view—too long in keeping up a proper degree of attention and devoted feeling—too long physically, inasmuch as they tax the very old and very young, and to the labour under a want of health, it often occasions painful weariness."

On a former occasion I gave a detailed specification of the repetitions and redundancies contained in the Morning Service. I presume it is not necessary that I repeat them now; I will, therefore, in passing, remark that the repetitions are generally considered even greater hindrances to devotion than the length.

Then, as an attempt at rigid uniformity is as useless as it is inexpedient, the officiating minister should be at liberty to make selections for Services within certain limits, when he considered them better adapted to the circumstances of his congregation than those prescribed.

Next, the remodelling of the Calendar and Rubrics: a want almost universally admitted: specially substituting the inspired Word of God for the Apocryphal Lessons.

I think it is also desired that the Services should be arranged for three Services on each Sunday, optional selections, as in the American Book of Prayers.

As to the Athanasian Creed, it has been proposed either that the damnatory clauses should be expunged, or that the Creed should be so far altered as not to make the reading of it compulsory; in fact, in our Churches it is very seldom read, and in some not at all. Both in this case and in the saying of Daily Prayer and the Service for the Saints' Days—the Act of Conformity and Terms of Subscription are perpetually violated; and it were much to be wished that the ordering of these things be so altered as not to make their observance absolutely imperative.

The Occasional Services—for the Visitation of the Sick, Baptism, Ma-

Catechism, and Ordination—should also come under review, in order, as I mentioned in my previous Address to this House, to see whether certain expressions contained in them might not be so modified as to give a more unequivocal latitude to permitted difference of opinion than they do at present, and where unity is indispensable, more clearly to define our Church's teaching in matters which have within the last few years, and which are still, giving rise to the most lamentable and violent contests before our Courts of Law.

The Burial Service, as it now is required to be performed, has been declared to be a scandal by four thousand clergymen, of various shades of opinion.

It is in the knowledge of your Lordships that the Marriage Service is habitually mutilated.

Lastly, I see no reason why we should continue to pray in bad grammar, false concords, and obsolete terms; and it is, therefore much wished that more suitable terms should be substituted for them, especially such as would not easily be misunderstood by the poorer classes.

I have now brought this long statement to a close; all that remains for me is once again to point the attention of the House to the object of this Motion. It is that, after a lapse of two hundred years, the only means known to our Constitution should be resorted to, in order to inquire whether changes cannot be made which will render the Services of our Church more edifying than they now are to the public at large—our Canons more in accordance with the enlightened Christianity of our times. I have dwelt at considerable length upon the discords in our Church, for the purpose of demonstrating that they are greatly owing to this—that the work of revision was not undertaken and carried out a century ago. I have pointed out the formidable aspect presented to us by the vast and increasing extent of Nonconformity: no one whom I have now the honour to address can have forgotten the astonishment and alarm produced by the publication of the Religious Census two years ago. We are now upon the eve of another: will any one venture to predict what its results will disclose?

Unhappily, I must not forget to add, that there is a growing discontent amongst our people with the Rulers of the Church; many think that they are unwilling honestly to grapple with, and effectually to put down that spirit our pale, which has shown, so largely in this diocese, whether the management of the comprehensive administration of our ecclesial, the formation of the Church, with a revision been openly discussed.

Lord Ebury

Your Lordships have marked that through statement I have in my case with the opinion in the Church to whom, at various times respect and reverence how much more possible must be than any utter. Let me, therefore yet once again to solicit to read, and with the

The following is Professor Stanley, re

"Why is it that the loftier characters—their power, the fitted, and would most the study of theology, of our Church—are in a few within the last ten they were in former days.

"The fact as regards place (Oxford) is, I fear

Dr. Vaughan, in his Sundays," has much He says—

"I fear it cannot be and extensive shaking as to the truth and doctrine. We see it with cated in many ways. class of society, it is in great and growing in young men otherwise as the profession of a class those whose character tion, and we are sure, inclination destined to ourable service, are when the time comes that; no obscurity, a tractiveness, and no w enough to deter them they may escape the n selves to believe all the faith, or to assent with scribed order of our

One additional qu Remonstrance of Rejection of the E fairly sum up the mitted to you:—

"Must we always be all damned that do n

Athanasian Creed, which so few do understand; and, on the contrary, to declare every man saved at his burial, how wicked soever he lived all his life before? And must we always be bound to many other grievances and defects of this nature, which I could tell you of, and still deny ourselves all redress under the burden of them, by refusing all those improvements and alterations, which it is now in our power to effect, because some of our brethren are obstinately bent upon doing nothing for the satisfaction of those who dissent from us? In sum, it cannot be denied that there are many things in our Liturgy which may be amended and improved, many defects in our discipline and constitution which may be supplied, and abundance of other particulars in our Church which may receive a great advance for the better, enabling us to promote religion and piety, and to suppress sin and iniquity amongst us."

I have now only one more duty to discharge, and that is to offer your Lordships my heartfelt thanks for the patience with which you have been pleased to listen to me. I am fully conscious of my own insufficiency; I wish that consistently with my duty I could have curtailed the address; but you will see how vast the subject really is, and how impossible it was for me to do justice to it, and to the hundreds of thousands of clients out of this House, who are awaiting with deep anxiety the result of this night's debate, without, to the best of my ability bringing the whole case before you. And however inefficiently I may have performed my task, I shall sit down with at least so much of comfort that I have spared no pains which I could possibly devote to it, to master a question involving the most important interests and the highest destinies of our beloved country. The noble Lord concluded by moving to resolve—

That it is the Opinion of this House, that whereas the particular Forms of Divine Worship and the Rites and Ceremonies appointed to be used therein, being Things in their own Nature indifferent and alterable, and so acknowledged, it is but reasonable that upon weighty and important Considerations, according to the various Exigency of Times and Occasions, such Changes and Alterations should be made therein as to those that are in Place of Authority should from Time to Time seem either necessary or expedient:

And whereas the Book of Canons is fit to be reviewed and made more suitable to the State of the Church:

And whereas it is desirable, as far as may be, to remove all unnecessary Barriers to a Union of the People in the matter of Public Worship:

That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be pleased to appoint a Commission to prepare such Alterations and Amendments in the Canons and Book of Common Prayer as to them may appear desirable, and to consider of such other matters as in their Judgment may most conduce to the ends above mentioned.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY
My Lords—It is always difficult to reply to a speech so long considered, and embracing so many topics as that which has just been delivered by the noble Lord; as the manner in which he has spoken himself and of the object which he has in view makes it not only appear difficult but ungracious to oppose him; but I have no alternative, being convinced that the course which the noble Lord proposes for your Lordships, instead of promoting the welfare of the Church which he desires to benefit, would inflict upon it a very serious injury. The long consideration which the noble Lord has given to the subject which he has brought forward and the many suggestions which he has received from various quarters, have led him into a very wide and extensive field of discussion. I trust that he will not deem it any want of respect on my part or think that his speech has received a reply, if I decline to answer him point by point, or to follow him through all the excursions of a somewhat desultory speech but take up the subject on general ground. Indeed, it was only towards the latter end of the noble Lord's speech that I became aware of the real object of his Motion, and to that portion alone of his speech will I address myself. It appears to me that the revision of the Liturgy may be considered under two principal heads which are distinct and may be separately treated. There is, first, such a revision should alter some of the Rubrics, correct obsolete words or phrases, retrench some of the prayers, and omit certain repetition chiefly with a view of shortening the services, in deference to a popular objection. Probably there are few persons who do not think our Liturgy capable of receiving some degree of improvement of this kind. The noble Lord on a former occasion introduced to our notice several opinions to this effect, and among them I found myself honoured by being cited as an authority. I do not retract my opinion, especially given. I still think there are several matters in which amendment might be made; though I confess when it has come to the point I have never found anything like unanimity as to the changes desired. What have appeared blemishes to some have been beauties in the eyes of others. Be whether those changes are in themselves desirable or not is not the question—many things are desirable in themselves, which nevertheless, it might not be desirable

It is only common prudence the advantage to be gained with which it is to be procured, and that if alterations be attempted not give rise to greater evils are intended to remove. So, my regard to a revision of the Liturgy that you agree with the Request of the noble Mover, and address to Her Majesty? Suppose Her Majesty to accede to the Address, and a Royal Commission appointed; suppose a majority of Commissioners to agree, recommending changes to be made. Those recommendations must be submitted to the Upper House, to the Lower House, to both Houses of Parliament, to one and then the other, before they are ultimately laid before Her Majesty for her approval. Would it be reasonable to subject the Liturgy to all these divisions, all the different opinions, all the controversies, not to say the dissensions, and not to anticipate the cavils which must be expected to undergo in the course of its tedious progress through all these various assemblies? Could the advantage overbalance the cost?

Yet such is the process which legislation has rendered necessary, that not a single iota of our Common Prayer has been authoritatively changed. I do not mean the Canons, which are under the sanction of the House of Lords, and may be separated from the Liturgy, and may be separately considered. These, doubtless, are the canons which have influenced the minds of the clergy and induced them to the proposed revision. They are disposed to remain content with the present, rather than to risk a change—in that which, with all its suppositions, is familiar to the public mind, and sanctioned by the usage of three centuries.

On these grounds I oppose that revision which is confined to mere trenchments and omissions, and touches whatever has reference to doctrine. But the noble Lord has not said so; neither do those stop here who are his associates, and who look to him as their advocate. These would be a partial revision of little value, unless there were also a doctrinal revision. Now I will venture to be candid, and say that it is imprudent. I have no objection to that if we were framing Sermons for the first time, services to which the whole body of the clergy had not declared their adhesion, I should be inclined to modify certain sentences and forms of expression which admit of different interpretations—which are, in fact, differently interpreted by the clergy themselves, and often become occasion of division. I should not be ashamed to borrow some hints from our brethren in America, if our circumstances were the same as theirs eighty years ago, and we had then to begin the world anew. Our case is very different. Our clergy, the whole body of them, have given their assent to our Liturgy as it is, and as it has come down to them from our Reformers. They have interpreted it according to their view of its general tenour, they have based their teaching on that interpretation, and have adhered to the doctrine which they believe it to inculcate. Could there be a more manifest injustice than to impose upon them a Liturgy which should be framed in a different spirit, and adopt a different tone of doctrine? Could they reasonably be expected to assent to changes which, if they effected anything, would neutralize their former teaching, and contradict the sentiments which they conscientiously maintain? This injustice was so strongly felt by a valued friend of mine—one of the ablest advocates of revision—that he proposed to place the alterations between brackets, and to leave an alternative to the clergyman to read whichever sentence he approved. I leave it for your Lordships to judge whether such a scheme would be calculated to produce harmony either among the clergy or their congregations. The very proposal proves the difficulties with which the subject is surrounded. After all, those questions of theology of which the noble Lord has spoken, and which he wishes to see more closely defined, are not questions which can be settled by a Liturgy. A Liturgy did not originate them, and a Liturgy cannot determine them. They are questions on which differences will exist in the Church as long as the Church itself exists—that is, to the end of time. It was through the influence of a Liturgy that Cyprian laid the foundation of a system, which, however erroneous I believe it to be, extended for ten centuries throughout the whole of Christendom. Our Liturgy as it exists, stands on this vantage ground—all who administer it have solemnly declared their assent to it. Could we expect the same assent to any change? Could we propose any change to which all parties would agree? Would any be inclined to approve a revision which did not favor their own opinions? I have thus briefly stated the principles on which, with the concurrence of my right rev. Brethren, I feel it my duty to resist the Motion of the noble Lord. We are not actuated by a bigoted attachment to things as they are, or by a pusillanimous apprehension of innovation, but we think that whatever objections may be advanced against our Liturgy as it is, there are greater objections to attempting its revision. We think that a verbal revision would not be worth its cost; we think that a doctrinal revision would throw the Church into confusion. Such an effect would be lamented by no man more than by the noble Lord himself, who, we are assured, has no other object at heart than to promote the welfare and increase the efficiency of the Church, of which he is an attached and conscientious member.

Archbishop of Canterbury

LORD LYTTTELTON: I wish to say a few words on this question, because, though I cannot vote with my noble Friend, I should be sorry he should suppose that I differ altogether with him. Some years ago, on a Motion of my noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) about Convocation, I said, what I would now repeat, that I cannot hold, on this or any similar question, the doctrine of finality, simply and abstractedly. I conceive that any organized body, such as the Church of England, ought not to be deprived of the liberty that properly belongs to it, of adjusting from time to time its standards and formularies, being matters of human origin and composition. And as to the time, I think it is no great arrogance on behalf of the Churchmen of this day to believe that they are as well qualified to deal with such subjects as those of the times, whether troubled, apathetic, or corrupt, of the Reformation, the Hampton Court Conference, or the Savoy Conference. But as soon as we leave this general view, we are met by the two important points—first, the division of this particular subject into matters relating to theological doctrine and those not so relating; and next, the exact manner in which any changes should be carried into effect. Now, questions of doctrine are, of course, infinitely more important, and men look at them with very much more sensitiveness than the others. And I am ready to say that if my noble Friend had limited his view to the former class, and had distinctly provided, as he has not done in his Motion, though he has in his speeches, that any alterations should be submitted to Convocation as well as to Parliament, I should not have objected to it. I apprehend that, admitting that there were cases of exception in worse times, and such as should not be drawn into precedents, the ancient rule in all such matters, in the English, as in the primitive and ancient Church, was this, that the consent of the Bishops as a body, of the Clergy as a body, and of the Laity as a body, should be essential. This view has of late years received remarkable confirmation in the case of many of our Colonial Churches, which, after a very vain attempt on the part of some, both in this country and in the colonies, to keep them in a state in which they had all the disadvantages, and none of the advantages, of an Establishment, have attained freedom within certain limits, to regulate their own affairs; and in every case have done so on the principle I have mentioned. And I apprehend that in former times in this country it was considered that this principle was sufficiently maintained by the operation of Convocation and of Parliament. I am disposed to think that it would still be so, sufficiently for practical purposes to command the confidence of the Church, in matters not touching doctrine; for I cannot think that such a measure, if unobjectionable in itself, should be objected to on account of apprehensions of possible ulterior consequences against which we should have sufficient confidence in the protection of Providence and the strength of the Church, to trust that we should be able to guard. But when we come to questions of doctrine, the matter is very different. Convocation of late years has attained a certain power of action. But if it were proposed to confer upon it a real enacting power, I am confident that there are not ten of the clergy of England who would admit that as at present constituted it was a sufficient representative body of the clergy to which it was proper that questions of doctrine should be intrusted. So with regard to Parliament—at least, to the House of Commons. The inevitable progress of legislation has brought about such changes in the Constitution in this respect, that in the opinion of no one—not certainly in its own—can it be looked on as a representation of the laity of the English Church. For want, therefore, of a proper authority to deal with them, I should object to questions of doctrine being at present brought forward. No doubt it would be difficult to adapt to our actual political system, and to provide for the working of a reformed representation of the Church in all its parts; but I believe it might be done, and that that is a previous question to be disposed of before the other one can be treated. But I must add, that even were all these points provided for, I should object to an inquiry such as my noble Friend now proposes, from the animus with which it has been done, which it is impossible to overlook in estimating the expediency and probable effects of such a proceeding. My noble Friend intends comprehension; but it is comprehension all in one direction. He professes to wish to retain the general status quo of the Church; what he aims at would destroy that status quo. There is a famous saying of Lord Chatham, that in our Church we have Calvinistic Articles, a Popish Liturgy, and an Arminian Clergy. So expressed, no doubt, this is a rhetorical sarcasm; but it points to an undoubted fact, that in the historical result of the constitution of the English Church there was a certain amount of compromise between extreme parties and views. I have been elsewhere taken to task for asserting this, and it has been denied that there was any such intentional compromise. I believe it might be shown that there was; but that is quite a distinct question. The important fact is that there stands the Prayer Book as it is. Some may think it the result of providential care, others may attribute it to unworthy human motives, others to accident. But these, though they may be interesting points of historical research, are not of present practical importance. The question is, what is the feeling in the matter of the members of the actual English Church? Now, I beg not to be understood as referring to my own opinion on any of these points, which is of no consequence; but I state it as an undeniable fact that the points referred to by my noble Friend and his supporters are viewed by very large numbers of Churchmen—not only extreme, but reasonable and moderate men—as of essential importance; and that therefore, assuming as we do that the general character of the Church is to be maintained, those alterations should not be made. The only answer that has ever been offered to this is, that those who hold such views will be still at liberty to do so, though all reference to them be expunged from the Liturgy. The obvious fallacy of such a reply has been pointed out; it can be tested in a moment by substituting some of the great doctrines on which all are agreed, such as the Trinity or the Atonement. No one would be satisfied, or deny that the character of the Church was lost in that respect, if all mention of such doctrines were omitted on the plea that men were still free to hold them. Agreeing, then, that were the other difficulties in the way removed, a Royal Commission of Inquiry, whatever might be its scope, would be in itself quite unexceptionable, for the reasons I have stated I must concur in the recommendation of the most rev. Primate.

Lord Lyttelton

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that it was an evil incident to discussions of this kind that they brought into agitation questions on which those who were bound by their position to take part in them were liable to be misunderstood and misrepresented. It was of the utmost importance that those who represented the Church in that House should be distinctly understood as to the grounds upon which they opposed the Motion of the noble Lord, but that Motion embraced a variety of subjects on which it was most difficult to avoid being misunderstood, either in advocating or opposing it. His right rev. Brethren were not of the number of those who were afraid of touching the old house, lest it should tumble about their ears. On the contrary, they believed that the Church of England stood upon the firmest foundations, and that it never stood more firmly or more securely than, by God's blessing, it did at the present moment; he was, therefore, sorry that the noble Lord should, in some degree, represent them as afraid to touch a single stone, lest the whole fabric should tumble down. He—and he believed that a majority of those who took an interest in the Church of England would agree with him—must protest against such a misrepresentation of their views. The noble Lord had spoken of a Resolution which he said had been proposed in the Upper House of Convocation, in which that body had expressed its determination to resist every alteration in the Prayer Book under any circumstances, and therefore he presumed every alteration in the Rubrics. He (the Bishop of London) was not aware that he had ever been a party to such a Resolution; still less was he so much aware of the secrets of the Lower House as to know what the Noble Lord had stated that when such a Resolution was proposed to them it fell to the ground for want of a supporter. His belief that the only thing to which the hops agreed to on that occasion was the e as that as to which they were now

 ed—namely, that they would resist Motion of the noble Lord. What was practical grievance of which the noble
 d complained, and what was the prac-
 l good which he sought to effect?
 noble Lord had complained that the ices gave rise to dissensions. He did believe that those dissensions arose
 n the Rubrics, but that they were in the result of that variety of opinion
 o doctrine which the noble Lord had that he did not desire to touch, and part the consequence of an excess of in persons who were much excited by igious questions. A clergyman might a parish in a blaze without touching the sion of the Rubrics. It would be pose for a man of strong opinions to manithem without infringing the letter of law, let them make the law as strint as they please; and he believed that attempt to put an end to such dissens as had been referred to by means of revision of the Prayer Book would be rly futile. There was a way of put-g an end to these dissensions; but it one about which it did not become to say much. Let them arm with er authority those to whom authority
 nged, and many of these dissensions ld disappear. Again, the noble Lord referred to the question of the Burial vice, which he said was a great cause of atisfaction. Now there seemed to be h misunderstanding in respect of the ial Service, and it might be as well
 him (the Bishop of London) to state view which he entertained upon that ect. He held that no clergyman could prosecuted for omitting to read, or for htly altering the Burial Service, un-
 the Bishop of the diocese was a party
 he prosecution. If, therefore, a clergy-n, who had any doubt as to the course
 ch he ought to pursue, wrote to the op before he took any motion in the ter, the Bishop would inform him ether he was determined to stand by and prevent his being exposed to prosecution, or whether, in his opin-
 it was right that the Burial Service
 ld be read; and no prosecution could instituted against the clergyman if he
 s acted on the advice of the Bishop.
 e noble Lord surely could not desire
 t every freshly ordained curate should every instance be the judge as to whether or not it was right that the Service should be read over the

 of those who had been brought churchyard. It must be a very case, indeed, which justified a d
 from the use of the ordinary serv-
 he undertook to say that even n
 still more when the matter was tly
 ly ventilated, those serious cases perfectly well dealt with by the
 the Ordinary without any alterati-Burial Service. Then with regard ening the services, he did not know
 the world agreed with the nobl
 There were occasions when they al services to be very long; but had sidered sufficiently what power existed for abbreviating them? F illustrate this by what lately to in respect to the Consecration Ser-had been supposed that it was a necessity to have the whole Morn-vice immediately preceding the C-tion Service; and then, with a gr-ber of communicants, the Services lengthened out as to weary many occurred on the consecration of the Bishop of Calcutta, when the Se-Westminster Abbey lasted, ho
 from eleven to four. But it was s to the most rev. Prelate that it necessary to have the whole of the together; and accordingly, on the cation of a Consecration at Wes-Abbey they were divided—the Service took place at eight o'clock Consecration at eleven o'clock—an convenience was removed. That emplified the degree of liberty w longed to them under the pres-
 when they came to examine into noble Lord had spoken rather ha
 the 10,000 clergymen who did his proposal, and would not pled-selves as a whole to the changes suggested in the Rubrics, the can-
 the Prayer Book. The noble L spoken much of these clergy; bu observed an unexpected silence
 opinions of certain other persons he had directly appealed. Unless been misinformed the noble L
 written a circular to the church requesting that he might know
 the Service was not found a gr-too long; and it would certainl teresting—he was very curious
 what answer he received—what t
 of those persons were upon this
 There was no proof of any real c

feeling on the part of the middle-class laity in favour of the abridgment of the Service. His own experience was that such was the inherent conservatism of that body that, if a clergyman ventured to make the changes which even the existing law or his Bishop sanctioned, he would be in great danger of giving offence. Certainly he did not believe the laity were earnestly desirous of the alterations which the noble Lord wished to introduce, even in respect to the Morning Service, except in the way now allowed by law. He confessed he had been a little staggered at first by the phrase in the noble Lord's Resolution, "the Book of Canons." It appeared, however, that the noble Lord had taken the words from the Commission issued by William III.; it was difficult to say to what the phrase referred, unless to the Canons of 1603. Now, as a general rule, those Canons had never been regarded as binding the laity; although some of them certainly bound the clergy in matters ecclesiastical. They had never been sanctioned by Parliament, but rested on the authority of Convocation and the Sovereign. Convocation had lately taken the step of petitioning Her Majesty in favour of the alteration of one of those Canons; and if the answer of Her Majesty was in the affirmative, the alteration might be effected. What, then, would be the use of throwing open the whole questions of the Rubrics, the Canons, and the Prayer Book, when the rival Parliament over the way was already perfectly competent to do what was requisite, in the matter, provided only they had the assent of the Sovereign? With regard to the Athanasian Creed, one suggestion that had been made was that, if the words "shall be read" were changed to "may be read," all the difficulty it occasioned to tender consciences would disappear. Others again had proposed—and among them an eminent theologian, a late Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford—that this creed should be placed among the Thirty-nine Articles, and not used as part of the regular Services. He could not, however, think that it was desirable to accept the noble Lord's Motion in order to obtain this change. The question now raised on this point was, as their Lordships were aware, by no means new. He could say from his own experience that the difficulties involved in it had been before the minds of the clergy for the last twenty-five years, and now gave no trouble to their

The Bishop of London

consciences. It was not felt that there was anything dishonest or inconsistent with the most perfect fair dealing in its being understood by every one that there were various senses in which various minds took the different propositions which occurred in parts of that Creed. It was not pretended before the world that they were all perfectly agreed upon questions which went beyond the limited sphere of man's intellect; but they were agreed to use certain old and venerable forms, amongst which was this creed; which forms they were loth to touch, because they thought to tamper with them might be to destroy that harmony which, in spite of all the noble Lord had said, they at present enjoyed. Perhaps the men of very tender consciences were really deserving of more attention than many of the noble Lord's other correspondents; it was impossible, for example, to see an old, respected, and most useful member of our Church retiring from it in consequence of the difficulties which pressed on his conscience without feeling sympathy for him and others in the same circumstances. But the noble Lord had only mentioned that part of the case incidentally, in connection with the subject of subscription; whereas, in his estimation, it was the strongest part of his case. All kindly regard ought to be paid in the matter of subscription to these scrupulous consciences. It was, however, quite another thing, on account of scruples which pressed upon a few, to open up the whole of the most difficult and delicate questions on which the noble Lord wished them to embark. It was greatly to be regretted if young men of promise were excluded, as was alleged, from the Ministry, by reason of their scruples on these points. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that men of very scrupulous consciences, if they did not find a difficulty in one thing, would be almost sure to find it in another. He might illustrate this matter by an incident connected with a debate which occurred in that House some twenty years ago on the kindred question how subscriptions should be arranged so as not to do violence to tender consciences. A petition was drawn up to their Lordships' House on the subject, and an intimate and dear friend of his was requested to sign it. On reading the petition, however, the whole force of which, he it remarked, was directed to the impropriety of not accommodating subscriptions to the feelings of the most tender consciences, he said there was something in it to which he could not agree. The answer he received was:—"We must have a general form of petition, and you must really sign it, and, in fact, get over your scruples the best way you can." That showed how difficult it was to draw up any form of words whatever, which would command the assent of every mind. A certain degree of liberty in interpreting subscription must be allowed if men were to agree in such cases. He believed the noble Lord's intentions were excellent. It was only fair, as the noble Lord occupied a somewhat invidious position, and was exposed to some obloquy, that he should bear testimony to the continual assistance he had derived from him in every good work since he had had his diocese committed to his charge. But in the present proposal he could not see the least hope of attaining the objects the noble Lord had in view. They were asked so to shape their Services that there should be nothing in them to grate upon one man's feelings; and yet, if they omitted anything of importance, that very omission would grate upon the feelings of some. It had been well said to him lately by a most rev. Prelate, now unfortunately absent, but who took a prominent part in the former discussion of this subject twenty years ago, that "they could not have any excision without leaving some scar." So it would be impossible to strike parts out of the Prayer Book without continually bringing to the minds of those who used it that there was something gone on which they would fondly dwell. He considered it almost a providential circumstance that the Church of England at this moment, to an extent found, he believed, in no other Church, united men of the greatest variety of sentiment, who yet felt that they could act together in the cause of their one Master. The noble Lord had spoken of secessions from the Church caused by the introduction of our present formularies and the subscriptions to them. He hoped to win seceders back by his Motion. But when men had once seceded, and still more when their dissent had become hereditary, it was very difficult to win them back. With the highest respect for those who dissented from the Church of England—giving them full credit for the sincerity of their motives and their perfect conscientiousness, he believed that whatever might have been the reasons for their original secession, it would be very difficult to remove dissent by the alterations which had been suggested by the noble Lord. Believing that it was most desirable that the Prayer Book should express the universal sentiments of all, and that on the whole, as it now stood, it did so better than any other existing form of words; believing it to be most desirable to bring Dissenters back within her pale, but also believing that there would be more danger in making alterations with that view of alienating those who remain than hope of bringing back those who had left our communion; and believing that unfortunate quarrels, to which the noble Lord had alluded, would soon pass away—at all events, that they would not be healed by the proposition of the noble Lord, but would require a totally different mode of treatment from what he had recommended, he felt compelled to refuse his assent to this Motion.

EARL STANHOPE said, he felt himself called upon to make a few observations on this subject in consequence of the part he took two years ago, when he moved an Address to the Crown for the removal of certain State Services from the Prayer Book. That Motion, he maintained, formed no ground or precedent for the proposition of the noble Lord. He asserted then, and he asserted now, that the success of that Motion deprived the noble Lord of one of his strongest arguments. What he (Earl Stanhope) proposed to omit formed no essential part of the Prayer Book; it was no part of its original constitution; it grew out of political occurrences, embittered by party spirit. The noble Lord, on the other hand, proposed that they should deal with the entire Prayer Book, casting it at once on the vast sea of experiment, and taking the chance of what the tide might give them in return. The two Motions, then, were entirely dissimilar. The House was left wholly in doubt as to the extent to which alteration would be carried, the objects the noble Lord had in view not having been clearly and distinctly stated. Then, again, they did not know by whom the Inquiry was to be conducted. He could not, therefore, assent to an inquiry so wide and indefinite. There was one consideration of great importance in a question of this kind, that if they contemplated any change in the Formularies or Rubrics of the Church, they should have the assent and concurrence of the great majority of the Ministers of the Church itself. He held that any change in the sacred volume, or in any of the Rubrics of the Church, even though recommended apparently by reason and argument, would be most injurious if forced on by a minority and imposed on the larger numbers who were unwilling to receive it. For himself, he must say he did not proceed with his Motion till he found that a very large majority of the right rev. Bench, and, so far as he could ascertain, a great majority of the clergy, were disposed to concur with him. In the present instance, not one single Member of that right rev. Bench seemed willing to support the Motion of the noble Lord, while it appeared from the documents read that at least 10,000 of the clergy disapproved it. He could not help thinking that the dangers of any change in the Prayer Book, in such a state of opinion as he had just described, were greater than any advantage that could be expected to be derived from revision. He thought it would be found on examination that any difficulties which had arisen originated, not so much in the regular Services, but rather in the Services or the prayers which were appointed to be used occasionally; and he thought it might be desirable, not to remove or alter a single prayer, but to consider whether some parts of the Rubric, which directed the order, distribution, and arrangement of the Services, might not, with the concurrence of the heads, clergy, and friends of the Church, be altered. These were points to deal with which the authority of the right rev. Prelates might perhaps suffice, without any appeal to that or the other House of Parliament, and on which he hoped they might be able to make some recommendation, which no doubt would be received with general assent. The only course then which he should deem desirable would be a consideration of the subject by the right rev. Bench. There might be an Address of that House to the Crown praying Her Majesty to refer to the consideration of the Bishops, not the prayers or the Services themselves, but only the Rubric or directions for their use on certain occasions, and as to whether these directions should, as now, be obligatory or only in some cases permissive. If such an Address, when moved, had the assent of the Bishops, and if the inquiry when granted were conducted by the Bishops themselves it would certainly be free from any danger, and might be productive of great advantage. But on the other hand, the proposal which the noble Lord now made was, he felt assured, one which was not calculated to receive the assent of their Lordships' House. The arguments against its adoption had been urged with great force by the right rev. Prelate who had just spoken; and, believing that it would tend to unsettle the existing state of things, without effecting any adequate countervailing improvement, he should, while he entertained for the noble Lord great personal respect, and thoroughly appreciated the motives by which he was actuated, offer to the Motion every opposition in his power.

Earl Stanhope

EARL GRANVILLE said, he felt some delicacy in addressing the House upon this subject, but he would observe that, although their Lordships appeared to be almost all opposed to the proposition of the noble Lord, he had not heard a single extreme opinion expressed. But as the noble Lord might consider it somewhat disrespectful towards him if the Members of the Government remained silent, he was reluctantly compelled to declare that they could not support the proposition of the noble Lord. He was of opinion that if that proposition were carried, it would create a considerable amount of evil without any chance of good arising from it. He therefore ventured to appeal to the noble Lord whether it would not be more desirable, having stated so fully and so candidly his views on the matter, that he should withdraw his Motion rather than press it to a division.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, if he were not fully convinced that the noble Lord, in submitting his proposition to the notice of the House, had no other object in view than to promote the welfare of the Church, of which he was a worthy member, he should not at that period of the debate have troubled their Lordships with a single remark; but, knowing and believing that the noble Lord was actuated by the purest and most benevolent sentiments, he appealed to him on behalf of the peace of the Church, which he protested he was sincerely anxious to maintain, not to abstain from dividing the House, for he trusted the noble Lord would do so; because he trusted, that if their Lordships divided upon the Motion, they would express their opinion in a manner so unmistakable, that the noble Lord would be induced to abstain from endangering the peace of the Church, by over and over again stirring a question, the mere discussion of which was by no means so harmless a proceeding as he might perhaps imagine. The more he stirred up a question of this kind, the more he would find the danger and difficulty arising from so doing. Although his noble Friend had spoken at considerable length, although he travelled a great deal through what he called the dreary history of the Church; dreary he (the Bishop of Oxford) admitted it was; but not from the dreariness of the subject itself—although travelling over such a dreary waste, his noble Friend left an impression of absolute uncertainty as to whether he meant to touch the doctrinal status of the Church, or only intended to curtail certain prayers, which he thought, perhaps, too long either for himself or his family, and which he therefore sought to abbreviate for the benefit of the whole community. Now, he thought that it was of the greatest moment that any person who proposed to deal with a question of this gravity, should state distinctly what he really meant by such an inquiry as was moved, and whether it was really his intention to alter the doctrinal status of the Church, or to leave that status wholly untouched. The uncertainty upon that point ran through the whole speech of his noble Friend. His noble Friend had described the Church of England as having had no vitality, and as having obtained greater freedom of action from the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. He (the Bishop of Oxford) rejoiced at the repeal of those Acts; but he did not quite concur with the noble Lord as to the effects produced upon the Church by that measure. There was, however, a remarkable uncertainty as to his real intentions throughout the noble Lord's speech. In order, then, to ascertain what his noble Friend's real intentions were, they were left to judge of them by a reference to opinions of those who had put him forward. They might often obtain a better notion of a Motion by looking at the tail that directed, than at the head which declared. They would be enabled to judge of the noble Lord's real meaning, by observing the petitions that he had presented. Now there was hardly a distinctive doctrine which marked the Church of England as a doctrinal body, separated from those around her, at which his noble Friend himself had not glanced, and which the petitioners did not embody in their petitions. That was a matter he hoped his noble Friend would well consider before he again brought forward this question. His noble Friend desired to see such alterations made in the Liturgy as would have the effect of bringing the body of Dissenters within the pale of the Established Church. Now, the noble Lord could not be a whit more anxious or more earnestly desirous of bringing them back into the community of the Church than he himself was. He believed that such an event would be one of the proudest days of England's glory and welfare. But he believed that nothing would tend more to prevent so blessed a consummation as the existence of any wretched differences amongst themselves (the members of the Church) on those momentous subjects. But while he was of that opinion, he was far from saying that all the blame of separation rested with the Separatists. He believed, on the contrary, much of the blame rested with themselves. He was far from saying that all the piety remained with the members of the Church. He believed that a vast amount of piety and sincerity existed amongst the Dissenters. But the more earnestly he desired the return of their Dissenting brethren to the arms of the Church of England, the more deeply did he feel how essential it was that the Church should maintain her own Apostolic faith untarnished. Instead of believing that that object would be promoted by such an inquiry as the noble Lord proposed, he was convinced that the alteration of one jot or one tittle of our Services would have the opposite effect; that it would tend to the lowering of the truth of the Church, which truth had been handed down to us from the primitive Church to be preserved with the most precious care. Such changes, then, in his opinion, would inflict the most deadly injury upon their Dissenting brethren as well as upon the Church itself. It was, in his opinion, by virtue of the particular tenets and the common Christianity which those who had separated from the Church professed, that they maintained that religious vitality they professed, and which would be imperilled by any trifling with them. It was said by a great man in the sister country, after a long discussion—he meant the late Dr. Challoner:—

"I believe that the connection, through the Establishment, of the Scotch Establishment with your great Church of England has been the means, with God's blessing, of keeping us from the most serious errors."

That was the emanation of a philosophical and a great mind. It was easy to see the way through which error entered. The first thing to observe was an indifference as to whether the whole truth was held

or not. The next was the putting away of the truth. Once that was done the downward progress was commenced; and, looking at the Protestant communities throughout the Continent at that moment, they could see how quickly and how surely the declension ensued. While he believed that his noble Friend only desired to maintain the truth among them, he could not help thinking that he failed to appreciate the greatness or gravity of the subject. His noble Friend did not treat the subject with that solemnity with which it ought to be observed. He seemed to look upon it as an indifferent matter to change a word or alter a form of phraseology, and that it did not touch the vitality of doctrine. But their Lordships should remember that it was the addition of a single word to the creed of Christendom that divided the East and the West—that that little word "filioque" crept in, supposed to express the feelings of all, and which, nevertheless, introduced into the Church of Christ that rent and mighty chasm that not even centuries had sufficed to close or bridge over. In these matters of national religious belief, involving all the intricacies of dogma and doctrine—all the peculiarities of theological disputation—all the sacredness of those ecclesiastical considerations and religious feelings so dear to the Christian community, it was a most perilous thing for any man, even from the best of motives, to stretch forth any uncommanded, any unauthorized hand, to alter the sacred inscripta in the tabernacle of God. He entreated the noble Lord to consider before he dealt with the subject, to consider it deliberately in its various bearings; for, depend upon it, if he attempted to alter the creeds of our ancient Church of England, to omit or prune a prayer, or alter any of the forms of phraseology, it would lead to unavoidable difficulties. It was the pure and simple devotion of those prayers, incorporating the great and vital truths of Scripture, that for the most part sank the deepest into the minds and habits of the people; and it was not so much by the declarations contained in creeds as by the repetition of these devotional phrases that rendered the services so impressive and beneficial. The alteration of a few words here to meet a difficulty, and a few words there to meet an objection might, without any intention or even any observance, have a tendency to strike at the root of the very belief of the great mass of the people of England. When he regarded calmly that which the

The Bishop of Oxford

noble Lord was wishing them to do he felt that the subject required much greater and graver handling than as yet it had received. They must not forget that they were dealing with the Prayer Book. In the greater part of that Book we had the worship of the primitive Church recorded for our example and our guidance. We had those good and great gifts of God combined in it. We had the primitive element handed down to us from the first ages of Christianity; and furthermore, through the medium of that same singular goodness, it was the work of men whom he had prepared, by the most marvellous training and divine indoctrination, for sweeping off the corrupt accretions that during the Middle Ages had crept round that primitive worship. We had their words stamped on the pages of its primitive truth, and we had the results of these habits of mind displayed and handed down in the primitive Christianity of the old Catholic Church, and in the luminous works and labours of those mighty giants whom God raised up to promote his purpose, and who swept away the corruptions of mediæval Christianity. Having such men to form the prayers and principles of that Book, it would in his judgment be a highly rash and unadvised thing, without the gravest considerations, to lay their hands on it to alter it. It had been said in the course of the debate that the Prayer Book was a compromise, or to some extent a compromise. He should be sorry it should go forth to their Lordships in that bald and unsatisfactory way. In the sense of a compromise being an ambiguous statement of the truth, framed so that two parties can subscribe or use it, the one meaning one thing and the other another,—in that sense he ventured to declare, on behalf of the Reformers of the Church of England, that the Prayer Book of the Church of England was not, and that it never was intended to be, a compromise. He was no great lover of compromise himself of anything—least of all of truth, and least of all of Divine truth—because Divine truth was so one and indivisible that if once they began to add or to subtract from it they made the one indivisible truth of God man's lie by virtually mangling God's truth. Therefore he could not allow the Church of England Prayer Book to be in any sense a compromise. But he believed what was meant was not compromise but comprehension, and the ideas were essentially distinct. The truth of God's revelation to man conveyed to us separate propositions, each equally true, and neither contradicting the other; and yet in many cases they were virtually so vast that human intellect could not say how they were to be distinctly reconciled. Take the master truth of all, that God was the Sovereign of the universe, and that he created man as a free agent, and as a responsible creature. These were two great cardinal truths, rising like two great mountain peaks out of the same common basement, both equally bold and incontestably true, rising equally to Heaven, and sustained by the same eternity of truth. Fallible man stood between the two; and, looking at them separately, the one altogether filled the eye and there appeared to be an insuperable disagreement and discord, and hostility between the two, which they could not reconcile, and then came some loftier and mightier spirit—some far-seeing philosopher—who endeavoured to unite the two, which was just as vain and futile; as if by man's feeble mechanism the two great peaks were sought to be brought together in the same mighty mountain chain. The truth of God came in and combined them both; the roots and bases of both struck down deep into the bosom of the infinite and eternal wisdom, and there they found their harmony and reconciliation. Man was to receive both, and each in its completeness, each as that which God had revealed. He followed God's word, as it was developed in its goodness and its fulness, and the love of God as it was apparent in its wisdom, and he must leave it to God to reconcile all that appeared to him to differ. The essence of our national Prayer Book was such that it must not be dealt with or viewed one-sidedly, but such each of those who took the one view or the other view on these great matters could, with a clear conscience, unite in it alike. This was to be done by stating these truths in their integrity and completeness, and not by attempting the puny reason of man in their reconciliation. This was what they had in the Common Prayer Book from the primitive Church, expressive as it was of true Christian aspirations and belief—without pandering, on the one side or the other, to the feelings of the misguided or of the fanatic, who would try to pull down one mountain peak and substitute another of their own, and combining within itself the multifarious truths of God, and so providing for the multifarious wants of human kind. To ask their Lordships to join in an Address—why they knew not, by what machinery they knew not—to effect alterations not clearly specified, but which might perchance diminish the value and advantage of the great inheritance they had received this way was, he thought, a proposition that the House would shrink from. His noble Friend could not entertain the slightest expectation that he would carry such a proposition, when he knew that so many thousands of the clergy, the whole bench of Bishops, and their Lordships' House deprecated any such attempt. He beseeched him, when he knew how easily doubts and difficulties were raised, and how hard it was to overcome and to allay them, that on these sacred grounds he would not enter on so rash an innovation. He had told them at the beginning of his speech that he was justified in bringing forward the proposition because this was not a time of peace; and at the close of it he told them that he was justified in proposing to alter the terms of subscription because they were not now living in the stormy days of the Church. He had no doubt the noble Lord was able to reconcile the two reasons; but the only reason he had for saying that we were not in a time of peace was, that there were a few petty difficulties referred to the decision of the Courts of the land. It appeared to him (the Bishop of Oxford) that this was a proof that the time was one of quietness not of revolution, for the surest mark of quietness was when differences were taken for settlement before the appointed tribunals and men abided by their decision. It resembled an alarm of fire when there was only smoke. The length of the Services had been complained of; but that was merely a bugbear. The fact was that the Morning Prayer performed on Sundays in our churches took forty minutes, and the sermon thirty more, so that what was described as an enormous long service occupied about one hour and a half. In his own diocese, where, acting under the new licences, the parishioners had been asked if they would have the services shortened, the determination was in the negative; and in two or three cases, where the service had been shortened, they wished it altered again, and said they had been accustomed to hear the Litany and the service seemed strange without it. If it was argued that the people were dissatisfied or unsettled on the subject. So it always would be amongst thousands of people, and there was always sure to be some little grasshopper grinding its monotonous note on the green bough, while the flocks and all else below were at peace in the green pastures. Allusion had been made to the clergy and the Burial Service. He did not think it was their wish that that service should be altered; but they complained of lack of discipline in the Church on the subject, and the abuse of the coroner's system, as subjecting them to that which was a grievance to their conscience, and for that for which they were not responsible. He would suggest for the consideration of the noble Lord, how a burial service could be constructed for Christians which they could read with propriety over one who had no hope of resurrection. Was the service to be so altered as to express no hope that the man they were burying had entered into the rest of Christ? That difficulty must either arise, or they must lower down the note of the Church in her Burial Service, until it might be rendered suitable to one dying in open rebellion to the law of God. He believed, however, that the difficulty was greatly exaggerated, and he believed that a due regard to the law, as it at present stood, by compelling the coroner's juries to find a proper verdict in case of suicide would remove the real difficulty of the case. For himself, he felt no difficulty whatever; the law had imposed upon the coroner's jury the duty upon oath of hearing the evidence and declare whether the unhappy man was or was not sane at the time he committed the fatal act, and when they had given their verdict, he would not scruple to assume that the verdict settled the question, and would give him charitably the benefit of it. He did not believe that a clergyman ought to feel any doubt in the matter; he was not made a judge of the facts, which were to be investigated by the jury. The noble Lord, in speaking of the question whether the clergy ought to subscribe their belief, introduced it inadvertently and as a matter that was quite "by the by." He knew his noble Friend would pardon him for speaking with plain earnestness respecting his Motion. He was quite sure he meant good to the Church of England, and that his efforts were directed to the good of souls; but if he would only realize the ultimate consequences of the course on which he had entered, and if he saw that their Lordships had determined not to give their sanction to his proposal, he thought his noble Friend would best consult the person which he loved, by renewing this Motion.

The Bishop of Oxford

THE BISHOP OF CORK, of the clergy of the United Kingdom, expressed his arguments which he submitted to the Motion, objection to the issue of the Bill, which was quires had been recommendations based on forward, there was by whom they could was no such thing as sending the United Kingdom, and changing minor authority was

LORD LYTTLETON using the word "contended" intended that there was a misapprehension of truth.

LORD EBURY, confessed that he had been induced to make some observations from the speeches and high Dignity were erroneous, but knowing that the Bill was the most distinguished Church. He had the whole question and nothing he had discussed had altered his opinion.

On Question,
 How N

HOUSE

Tuesday

MINUTES] PUBLIC
 Births, &c. (Ireland)
 3^d Paper Duty Free

METROPOLIS ACT 1847

MR. EDWIN
 to ask the hon.
 (Tite), Whether
 passed this evening
 of this Bill

MR. TITE, in reply, said, he begged to say that he intended to postpone it for a week, and then, if it were read a second time, he should propose to refer it to a Select Committee. The measure was somewhat urgent, inasmuch as it referred to a debt of £200,000 which had been cast upon the Board of Works by the Commissioners of Sewers.

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

QUESTION.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he rose to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether he has received the Report of Sir Roderick Murchison and Professor Faraday on the processes for preserving the external Stonework of the Houses of Parliament, and whether he has any objection to lay the same before the House, together with Copies of the Instructions or Minutes of Reference to those gentlemen, and any Correspondence not already before the House, which has passed between the Board of Works and the respective patentees, the Referees, or Sir Charles Barry?

MR. COWPER said, he had received the Report of Professor Faraday and Sir Roderick Murchison upon the plans for preserving the external stonework of the Houses of Parliament, but he did not feel at liberty to lay those opinions before the House, they having been given for his guidance, and not being intended to receive publicity. He should, of course, hold himself responsible for any action he might take in consequence of those Reports. He would have no objection to lay upon the table the correspondence that had taken place with the patentees and referees.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to know, Whether the right hon. Gentleman will include in the Papers any instructions or letter of reference to Professor Faraday and Sir Roderick Murchison, in order that the House may know exactly what is the case that has been submitted to those gentlemen?

MR. COWPER said, he had no objection to comply with the desire of the hon. and learned Member.

DISTURBANCES AT TARANAKI.

QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any authentic intelligence has been received with respect to the disturbances reported to have occurred between certain Native tribes in the province of Taranaki, in New Zealand, through a disputed land claim connected with the movement in favour of a Native King, and in consequence of which Captain Murray, commanding a detachment of the 65th Regiment, had proclaimed Martial Law, and that Her Majesty's Ship Niger had left Auckland for the scene of action with considerable reinforcements; and whether there is reason to believe that these disturbances would not spread beyond the province?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE replied that no disturbances had taken place in the province of Taranaki in the sense of any armed insurrection by the natives, nor had there been any disputed land claim connected with a movement in favour of a Native King. What had taken place was, that a piece of land had been bought by the Government from the native owner, a Chief who was willing and desirous to sell it, and the authorities were proceeding to survey it, when they were interrupted by another chief, who, however, did not pretend to have any claim to the land. The question was one of great importance, both to the natives and European inhabitants of New Zealand, inasmuch as it concerned the maintenance of the original treaty with the native chiefs. The Governor proceeded himself in the Niger to New Plymouth with a strong detachment of troops. He (Mr. C. Fortescue) had that day received a letter, from which it appeared that the Governor was meeting the difficulty with great prudence and firmness, and there was reason to hope that no collision would take place with the natives; but if unfortunately there should be a disturbance, it would not, it was believed, extend to the province of Auckland.

INCOME TAX UPON INDIAN SECURITIES.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is intended to subject any Indian securities held by residents in England to Income Tax in India as well as in England?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that he could not answer the question till he saw the Bill as prepared in India.

REMOVAL OF BRIGADIER INNES.

QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, What were the grounds for the removal of Brigadier Innes from his command as Brigadier at Ferozepore, in May, 1857, after the perfect approbation of the Commander-in-Chief had been conveyed, in the Adjutant General's Letter of the 19th of the same month, to that Officer, for the judgment, vigour, and decision with which he had acted at the commencement of the Mutiny in Bengal?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was not quite sure that that was a proper question to be put in the House of Commons; but his answer was that the Indian Government had thought it right, for the interest of the Queen's service, that that Officer should be removed.

THE GRAVES IN THE CRIMEA.

QUESTION.

LORD BURGHLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in consequence of the remonstrance of Her Majesty's Government, any promise or security has been given by the Russian Government that the graves of the officers and men of the British Army, who are interred in the Crimea, shall be protected and held sacred in future?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL replied, that three despatches had been written, bearing date respectively the 31st January, the 4th February, and the 24th May, remonstrating with the Russian Government on the desecration of the graves at Sebastopol and its neighbourhood. The Russian Government, in reply, promised that a full inquiry should be made; and they said they had every desire to preserve the graves in a decent manner. They also said that there was some difficulty in doing so, on account of the graves being scattered; and he (Lord John Russell) had been told that the land on which they were belonged to divers persons who were not amenable to the Russian Government. Her Majesty's Ministers had directed the Consul General at Odessa to place a person in charge of the British cemeteries, at a salary of £100 a year, in order to take care of them.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, &c., (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD NAAS said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the uniform registration of births, deaths, and marriages in Ireland. The good effects of the kindred system of registration which had been established in England since 1836, were now fully appreciated, and he would remind them that the noble Lord who introduced the Bill in that year (Lord John Russell), was asked whether it was intended to extend its provisions to Ireland. The noble Lord said he was aware of the great importance of the inquiry, but he would rather wait and see the effect of the English Bill before he proposed to extend its provisions to Ireland. A quarter of a century had elapsed since that time, and therefore he (Lord Naas, hoped he might bespeak the favourable consideration of the noble Lord for the present measure. In Ireland the want of a system of registration of births, deaths, and marriages had been daily felt. For sanitary and medical purposes it had become almost indispensable; and was of no less importance for the elucidation of questions relating to the descent of property. The opinions of Mr. Armstrong, as cited in the Registrar General's third annual Report, of Mr. Howell, the inspector of factories, and finally, of Dr. Farr, who had considered this subject probably more than any man in England, were unanimous as to the inconveniences experienced in all these respects from the absence of such a system in Ireland. As, too, we were on the eve of taking the decennial census, it became important that not a moment should be lost in entertaining this question. At the International Statistical Congress held at Paris in 1855, the very highest authorities expressed their opinions strongly as to the want of such a system. Its absence indeed seemed incomprehensible to some gentlemen there present, who thought it must be in consequence of some unconquerable antipathy which England felt towards Ireland, whilst others had gone so far as to gravely state it as another proof of the extreme oppression exercised by one country over another, and to allege that it was not allowed for fear lest the Irish should believe they were of much more importance than they really were. Of all the nations of Europe there were only five not possessed of this statistical information—Spain, Greece, Hungary, Turkey, and Ireland—and of these the first four were certainly not the most civilized, or indeed, celebrated for progress of any kind whatever. Even in the States of the Church an accurate account was taken every year of the population. The want was the more remarkable, as in Ireland they had the most complete system of statistics upon every other subject of any nation in the world. There was, first, the Ordnance survey, then a property valuation giving the value and size of almost every tenement in the country, there were agricultural statistics furnished yearly, and criminal and police law statistics, conducted in the best and most accurate manner; and it really only required a system of returns of births, marriages, and deaths, to make the information complete. The means by which he proposed to carry out this system of registration were less expensive and more simple than the method employed in England. In Ireland the only registration at present existing was with respect to Protestant marriages solemnized by ministers of the Established Church, or of the Protestant Dissenters. He proposed to extend the registration to those celebrated by the Roman Catholic clergy. The registration of births and deaths he proposed to take in a different way from the marriages. As to them he availed himself of the present registration districts, and proposed to make the present registrars of marriages the registrars for the district. He also proposed that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to appoint the chief constable at each station of the constabulary an assistant registrar. Thus they would have 1,700 assistant registrars scattered over the whole country, there being about that number of constabulary stations in Ireland. The Registrar General would distribute the necessary books to these constables, with proper instructions for making the entries. It was not proposed that the constables should keep any papers of importance, but that they should forward them at intervals to the registrar of the district, who after taking transcripts should forward the original documents to the Registrar General. As to marriages, the Registrar General was to furnish the officiating clergyman of every Roman Catholic place of worship with the necessary documents for affording this information. These would all be filled up in duplicate by the clergyman, who was to retain them until they were filled up, when one of the copies was to be sent to the Registrar General, and the other to be retained in the clergyman's hands. Beyond that it was proposed that the Registrar General should furnish every quarter certified copies of the necessary statistical information for the year, and that he should publish in the usual way the information which he had thus received. Then, as to the payments; he proposed that every Assistant Registrar, that is to say, the constable, should receive for every birth registered by him 6*d.*; the registrar for every transcript he made 1*d.*; for every entry of marriage sent to the Registrar General, 2*d.* Every clergyman authorized to register marriages for so doing was to receive for each the sum of 1*s.* These and other small fees would be defrayed to the extent of about £9,000 a year out of the Consolidated Fund, and to about an equal extent out of the local rates; the whole expense being under £20,000 a year. These were the main provisions of the Bill. There were also clauses providing for the registration of persons born at sea, and an important clause enabling persons already married, and where marriages were not properly registered, to become registered. He should be most happy to receive any suggestion that might be made for the improvement of the Bill. It had been carefully prepared by persons well acquainted with the subject, and he sincerely hoped that Ireland would not be left another year without a proper system of registration.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was extremely glad that the noble Lord continued to take, in an independent position, the same interest in this subject that he did when in office. The noble Lord had had the honour of laying upon the table the first Bill that was ever proposed to remedy the great want that was now experienced of a registration in Ireland. He concurred with the noble Lord in regarding this as a matter of great importance, not merely in a scientific point of view, but as affecting the interests of the poor of Ireland, who might often be called on to prove the place of their birth in making out a title to legacies left them, perhaps in the Colonies or the United States of America. He was glad the noble Lord had introduced the subject, and he hoped the present Session would not pass over without some measure or other in connection with it being carried into a law. The subject had occupied a great deal of attention and consideration in Ireland, and two plans had been prepared. One was that of the noble Lord, which proposed mainly to effect a system of registration through the aid of the constabulary, and the other was somewhat more analogous to the system adopted in England and Scotland—namely, to obtain the desired information by means of the services of the local authorities, the clerks of the unions, and medical officers employed in the various districts. Ireland possessed a system of medical relief more complete almost than that of any other country. It had more than 700 medical districts, and the total number of dispensaries exceeded 1,000. It was therefore a great question whether it would not be expedient to enlist, in the aid of the Government in collecting the statistical information necessary for a complete registration, the scientific knowledge of the medical profession. It was proposed that, ordinarily under the Registrar General in Dublin, the clerks of the unions should be the registrars; and the information with regard to births and deaths should be collected by the medical officers for each of the dispensary districts. As regarded marriages, it was proposed that the law should remain as it was so far as the marriages of Protestants were involved. With regard to Roman Catholic and other marriages, a machinery very like that proposed by his noble Friend would have to be introduced. He must say he did not think the employment of the constabulary would be so good a machinery as that to which he had referred. In the first place, he presumed that they would proceed in this matter on the basis of the system which prevailed in England—that whatever was paid for out of the Consolidated Fund in England, would be paid for out of the Consolidated Fund in Ireland, and that whatever was paid for by local rating in England, would be paid for by local rating in Ireland. If that was to be the rule, the largest portion of the expenditure would fall upon the local rates; and by adopting the machinery proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Naas), that of the constabulary, it appeared to him (Mr. Cardwell) that they would at the outset experience a difficulty in employing the constabulary, who were paid out of the Consolidated Fund. In the next place, he was not sure whether it would be agreeable that all information should be communicated to the police; and, thirdly, they were liable at any moment to be called away upon other duties. If, on the other hand, they adopted the machinery of the Poor-law medical officers, they would have the local funds paid to persons appointed by local authorities, and who were in constant communication with the ratepayers. It seemed to him that upon the whole

Mr. Cardwell

there were very great merits in both plans, but he was inclined to think that the preponderance was in favour of the plan for entrusting it to the local authorities. He would now give notice that in the course of the week, he would lay upon the table a Bill which had been prepared before the present Session, but which from press of public business he had been prevented from earlier introducing, and which was based upon the plan of local management and entrusting the working of the system to local officers. The House would then have both plans before it, and his anxiety would be that one or other of those plans in the course of the present Session should pass into law. If he should have reason to believe that the plan of the noble Lord met with more general approbation, he should have every assistance which he (Mr. Cardwell) could give him, in carrying that measure into effect. He sincerely trusted that the Session would not pass without having provided some means of keeping up, by detailed information, coupled with a scientific application of that information, a complete record of the whole movements of the population and the social progress of Ireland.

Leave given.

Bill to provide for the uniform Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Lord NAAS and Mr. WHITESIDE.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

PORTPATRICK AND DONAGHADEE HARBOURS.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

GENERAL UPTON said, he wished to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the Petition of the Ayr and Maybole Junction Railway Company, presented in August last, and printed in the Eleventh Report of the Select Committee on Public Petitions, Appendix 202, relative to the application of the grant for Portpatrick and Donaghadee Harbours. The object of the Motion was to carry into effect the object of a petition presented some time since on this subject, in which the petitioners expressed their readiness to agree to complete a junction by railway between Portpatrick and Glasgow, and also between Donaghadee and Belfast, and to make important improvements in both harbours, on receiving a guarantee from the Government that a mail packet service should be established between the two ports, thus completing the communication between Glasgow and Belfast. The late Government had postponed any grant of money for the improvement of the harbours until the completion of the line from Portpatrick to Glasgow and Dumfries; now the railway company contended that they had been exempted from this condition, and that it was enough if they formed a communication with Dumfries, leaving the traffic to find its way from there to Glasgow. The effect of this would be to give the Portpatrick Company eighty miles of traffic, and to cause that additional cost and inconvenience to the public. The company had been bound under a penalty to complete their line to Portpatrick in five years; this they had done; but this did not release them from the other part of their engagement to complete the communication to Glasgow. Nevertheless the Government had seen fit to release them from this obligation. This was done, as alleged, by a letter from the Secretary to the Treasury; but such a letter could not set aside former Minutes. Unless the Government would reconsider their decision he hoped that the House would grant him the Select Committee he asked for. He had no desire to cast reflections upon the character of a gentleman who was now engaged in the public service in the East, or to throw aspersions on Mr. Wilson, but he believed that under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman the Treasury had adopted a course which must have been founded on some misapprehension of the real merits of the case. The subject, he thought, was one at all events which called for further investigation; and he hoped for the support of Irish Members on both sides of the House in the Motion he now submitted; for every one travelling from Ireland to Scotland was interested in the question.

MR. LAING said, he would not detain the House but for a few moments while stating the grounds why the House should not agree to the Motion. It was unnecessary to go into the question whether Donaghadee and Portpatrick were the right points between which the passage ought to be established between Ireland and Scotland, because in 1855 a memorial was presented to the Government with respect to a communication between Scotland and Ireland, and the matter was referred to Commissioners, who reported in favour of a communication between Portpatrick and Donaghadee. A Bill was accordingly brought before Parliament for the purpose of effecting that object, provided it could be brought into connection with railways to the north of Scotland, and upon that application was made to the Government for assistance in the shape of money. A correspondence took place with the Treasury, and a Minute was issued by which they gave a distinct pledge to the promoters of the Dumfries and Portpatrick Railway to propose a vote for the harbours in question, on condition that the railway was completed within a certain time. Parliament had voted the money, and the works were now in progress. Under those circumstances, he did not think that the House of Commons could properly grant the Select Committee which was asked for. The contract which had been made by the Treasury could not be broken unless some collusion of a culpable nature could be proved to have existed between the Secretary to the Treasury and the railway company. Such a charge, if to be brought forward at all, should have been made last Session when Mr. Wilson was still in the country; but there was, in truth, not a shadow of evidence in support of it. The Treasury Minute was drawn up in the regular form, and as the whole transaction had reference to a railway Bill, which, when before Parliament, any party interested could have opposed, no undue secrecy could be alleged. The only contention was that the Government should, by the small outlay of £20,000 on the harbour, force the Portpatrick Company to spend, not only £500,000 on a line eastwards to Dumfries, but £300,000 more on a line towards Ayr. He thought the Government had done very well in obtaining security that the line from Portpatrick to Dumfries should be made, and he hoped the House would not grant a Select Committee in order to re-open a positive contract which had been recognized by three successive Governments, and adopted by the House of Commons, and on the faith of which large and expensive works had been commenced.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that last year he had asked whether the Government intended to expend this £20,000, and he had been informed that no more money would be laid out until the conditions of the grant were fulfilled. He thought that the Government, having in the first instance promised to assist the promoters, were bound to carry out their engagements.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was as anxious as the hon. Gentleman to maintain the just power of the Treasury in its Minutes, but the original Minute of the 15th of August, 1856, undertaking that £20,000 should be laid out in the improvement of the harbour of Portpatrick, was upon condition that two railways should be made—one from Portpatrick to Dumfries, and the other along the coast, in connection with the present Ayr and Maybole Railway. The complaint of the persons interested in the coast line was that by a subsequent Minute in 1857, and by a letter of Mr. Wilson, the Portpatrick Company were told the money should be expended on the harbour if only the line to Dumfries were made. It was not fair to vary the basis of the whole transaction, and he thought the Government ought to withhold the remaining £10,000 until these persons were satisfied.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, that as the Representative of the county in which Portpatrick was situate, he wished to add that the Portpatrick Company had never proposed to make the line to the north; and, as there was nothing to prevent the Ayr and Maybole Company making it, he did not see that they had any just ground of complaint.

MR. DUNLOP pointed out that when the grant was first made it was on the understanding that there should be a line of communication made between Portpatrick and Glasgow on the one hand, and Portpatrick and Dumfries and London on the other. This condition had never been carried out, and the country at large, therefore, had not got the benefit which this grant was intended to secure. He hoped the Treasury would stand to the sum of £20,000, and not consent to any further increase.

Motion made, and Question put—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the Petition of the Ayr and Maybole Junction Railway Company, presented in August last, and printed in the Eleventh Report of the Select Committee on Public Petitions, Appendix 202, relative to the application of the Grant for Portpatrick and Donaghadee Harbours,"

Motion negatived.

BRITISH MUSEUM, &c.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. DILLWYN said, he wished to move for a Return showing the Salaries of Colonel Dunne

the Officers and Assistants employed in the British Museum, the South Kensington Museum, the Museum of Practical Geology, and on the Ordnance Geological Survey; specifying the duties of each person, the date of his appointment, and any regulations which may exist regarding increase of Salary; also stating when and by what amount any such Salaries may have been augmented.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought it was not desirable for the Return to be ordered in its present shape.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had understood that it was to be an unopposed Return.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he considered it to be unnecessary to include the British Museum, because the information in question relative to that institution would have to be adduced before a Committee now sitting.

Return ordered,

"Showing the Names and Salaries of the Officers and Assistants employed in the British Museum, the South Kensington Museum, the Museum of Practical Geology, and on the Ordnance Geological Survey; specifying the duties of each person, the date of his appointment, and any regulations which may exist regarding increase of Salary; also stating when, and by what amount, any such Salaries may have been augmented, and whether any further sums have been paid to such Officers and Assistants for extra duties or special services since their appointment."

EXAMINATIONS FOR FACTORY BOY APPOINTMENTS (PORTSMOUTH).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to move for copies of the examination papers, and the answers thereto, by the candidates for the appointment of factory boys, before the Civil Service Commissioners at Portsmouth, in January, 1860. Without some explanation on his part this might seem a very small matter to bring before the attention of the House, but he should show the House that it really involved points of considerable interest and public importance. The way in which the question originated was this. A lad in whom he took some interest had been twice examined for a berth as a factory boy at Portsmouth, and on both occasions, although not placed on the list of candidates sufficiently high to obtain him the situation, he obtained a place very nearly equal to that of the successful candidates. In January last he went up for a third examination, but in the interval between the second and third examinations the conduct of the examination had been transferred from the schoolmasters to the Civil Service Commissioners. On the third occasion, however, he not only was not successful in getting an appointment, but his name was included in a list of those who were stated to be so utterly incompetent as scarcely to entitle them to be placed on the list of failures. This struck him as being a very singular falling off, and he made inquiries into the matter, when he found that the lad's failing was attributed to his bad spelling. He had not only obtained the evidence of the schoolmaster that the boy was actually superior in abilities to several of those who got appointments; and, as it was alleged that he had failed on account of his spelling, he could only say that he had pages of the boy's spelling in his possession, and that he spelt as correctly as any hon. Member of that House. He had therefore come to the conclusion that the boy had not had that justice to which he was entitled, and he had applied to the Civil Service Commissioners, through the Secretary of the Admiralty, to see the work done at the examination by this boy, and by the five boys who had gained appointments. In order to procure clear and comprehensive information, he had also asked for the examination papers used at the general examinations. He made his application, as he had said, to the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, and in the course of time he received, through Mr. Kempe, an answer from Mr. Maitland, the Secretary of the Civil Service Commissioners. That answer gave the subject a much more serious aspect, and the real and important question was this, whether the Civil Service Commissioners were to be considered from that time forth a totally irresponsible body. That was the real question at issue. Mr. Maitland stated that as the Civil Service Commissioners seemed to be accused of unfairness in the conduct of the examination, they declined to notice the matter in any way whatever. They further expressed the opinion that if their decisions were called into account their services would be no longer useful to the country. Now, he had preferred no charge of unfairness against them; no doubt they had every wish to do that which was just and right towards all the candidates who presented themselves, but they had not the attribute of infallibility. He asked the House whether the tone assumed by them in this communication was such as ought to be assumed by any body of public servants. Were they to say that they would not, under any circumstances, deal with any charge preferred against them? If they were enabled to maintain such a position they would establish a privilege which no other body possessed; yet that was the position claimed by these gentlemen. He could not share such an opinion, and he should be surprised if the House sanctioned it. He had stated, in his reply, to the Civil Service Commissioners, that he preferred no charge of unfairness, but that he demurred to the position laid down by them, and he stated that he knew no instance of servants of the Crown being entitled to such a claim; and, further, that he should take an early opportunity of bringing the question before the House of Commons; and his purpose in moving for these papers was to raise the question of the right of the claim asserted by these gentlemen. It seemed to him a position so monstrous and untenable that he could not think the House of Commons would assent to it. He might be told that at the universities there was no appeal against the decision of the examiners; but there was really no affinity between the cases. Then he might be told that there was a Committee sitting up stairs in connection with the proceedings of the Civil Service Commissioners, and that he must wait till that Committee had reported; but he begged to say that there was nothing in the proceedings of that Committee which affected the question he wished to raise. With the Civil Service Commissioners rested the whole patronage of the country, and was it to be endured that no one, not even the House of Commons, was to impugn their decisions? Supposing an hon. Member were to ask a question of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, the House would be rather astonished to hear the noble Lord reply that as the question implied a charge against him he should not take any notice of it, and still more astonished would the House be if the noble Lord were to add that the utility of the Ministry would be entirely destroyed if he were to answer such charges. Well, then, were the Commissioners to assume a position which not even the head of the Government would take upon himself? Were they to be the only irresponsible body of men in the country? To suppose that they never made mistakes would be absurd, and if the Government supported and the House sanctioned their claim to entire irresponsibility he believed it would cause great surprise and regret throughout the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I heard with satisfaction the statement of the hon. Gentleman that he intended nothing offensive to the Civil Service Commissioners in making this application. I quite admit that as he has stated the question, it is one of considerable importance. My own view differs entirely from his, but the importance of the subject I quite allow. As it stands, the question is a simple one, which may be stated without much difficulty and without much detail. As respects the particular person in whom the hon. Member feels an interest, there is no difficulty in explaining whatever he has referred to as being apparently peculiar. The method of proceeding adopted by the Commissioners is that certain elementary acquirements are treated as absolutely indispensable—and unless a fixed and positive standard with regard to those acquirements is reached by the candidate, the Commissioners will not take cognizance of any other acquirements he may have attained. Such a regulation and distinction between what is essential and what is of secondary or less absolute importance is, I believe, both perfectly well founded in the nature of the case, and justified by the practice of other institutions. In the case of the young person referred to by the hon. Member there was one particular point in the elementary acquirements regarded as essential in which the candidate proved to be defective, and therefore the Commissioners could not ascertain his efficiency in the other branches to which the examination extended. The hon. Member has said that he has many pages of the boy's spelling in his possession which do not exhibit any deficiencies. It must, however, be obvious that positive evidence is much better than negative, and the appeal from the Commissioners to the hon. Member's judgment involves the whole question. It is not alleged that there has been any breach of faith upon this occasion. All persons applying for public appointments are made aware of the conditions upon which those appointments depend, and they all know that an examination must be submitted to, and that from the decision of the examiner there is no appeal, either to the House as a whole or to individual Members. The hon. Gentleman considered the claim of the Civil Service Commissioners unheard of, because they declined to submit their proceedings in particular cases for review; but, so far from being unheard of, it is a claim that is supported by analogy of the proceedings of every other department, and which is grounded upon the necessities of the case. The hon. Gentleman says if my noble Friend at the head of the Government was to say that he would not take notice of any charge that might be brought against him it would be a monstrous claim, and therefore so much more is it a monstrous claim on the part of the Commissioners. But I draw a broad distinction between acts in the nature of executive acts of an ordinary kind, and those particular cases where an essentially judicial function has to be performed. Every public servant who has others under him may be called upon to do something in the nature of a judicial act, by punishing, suspending, or dismissing those under him; and I never heard of a public officer who had performed acts of this kind who did not lodge a claim for his acts of exemption from review just as in this case. There was a very marked case which occurred some years ago, which bears upon this point. A gentleman, whose name I need not mention—an officer of the Customs' establishment, a landing-waiter—was accused of culpability, or connivance at certain frauds, whereby the public revenue was materially injured. A Royal Commission was appointed, of which I was a member, and over which Lord Granville Somerset presided. We instituted a most laborious investigation into these frauds, and we became perfectly convinced that the landing-waiter who was charged with connivance, and had on that account been dismissed, was entirely innocent. We heard all parties; we made a kind of judicial investigation; we reported to the Crown that this gentleman was innocent; but the Chairman of the Board of Customs declined to accede to our recommendation that the gentleman should be restored to his situation. An hon. Member came down armed with our Report, but failed to induce the House to interfere with or to review the acts of the head of a department, who declared that any such interference would be destructive of discipline and injurious to the public service. The gentleman was afterwards re-appointed—and a most deserving public officer he has proved—but not in consequence of any covenant on the part of the authorities to do so. That is an instance which occurs to me, and if ever there was a case in which it was essential to uphold the independence of public functionaries, I think the case now brought forward is one. The whole weight of personal feeling and political influence is continually working against the Civil Service Commissioners, and unless this House and the Government afford them full support it will be impossible for those gentlemen to exercise satisfactorily the functions that have been assigned to them. I do not complain of the hon. Gentleman for finding fault with the Commissioners, but the question is not whether they are infallible, nor whether they have made in this case an error—as it is possible they may have done—but whether it is absolutely necessary for the proper discharge of their functions that, so long as those functions are discharged with honesty and general intelligence, their acts should be exempt from review. That demand is supported by the universal practice of all examining bodies whose examinations are entitled to any respect. The hon. Gentleman says the Universities are not in point; but, if they are not, the particulars in which they differ from the present case give this case greater strength. The Universities are independent bodies, and their conduct cannot be brought before the House in particular cases; they are free from political influence which presses upon public departments. It is not from any personal feeling towards the Commissioners that I say we ought not to call upon them to submit their proceedings to the House, but because if you do so in one case other demands will arise, and these concessions will make the exercise of their functions useless and delusive, affording no security to the public, but working much mischief, because delusive. It must be borne in mind that the Commissioners have in no way declined the jurisdiction of the House. They do not deny that it is within the power of this House to inquire into the acts of any public officer; but the question is, whether it would be prudent or politic to exercise those powers. I think it would be most imprudent and impolitic, and would defeat the useful labours of the Civil Service Commissioners. No claim can be greater upon the public gratitude than the claims of those gentlemen, but it is not upon that ground that I hope the Gentleman will not press his Motion that, if he does, the House will not port him. I oppose the Motion because there are certain prerogatives, belonging essentially to the discharge of the of the Commissioners, which it would be against the interests of the country if we should deprive them of.

Mr. Bentinck

Mr. MONCKTON MILNES: quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the importance and responsibility attaching to the duties assigned to the Civil Service Commissioners, and for that reason that I desire to see the most publicity given to their proceedings. Besides, the general question as to the desirability of examinations for the Service, has been by no means quashed by the public opinion of the country, and I think it will be found that there is a good deal more to be said on the other side of the question. I would say that a matter which has not been fully considered by public opinion, it is on that the public should be fully informed as to all the transactions of this Commission. If the power intrusted is to be exercised in entire secrecy, and not to be subject to the supervision of Parliament, I believe it will degenerate into a very irresponsible power. I am that if publicity is not given to the proceedings, an immense amount of odium will accumulate upon this Commission; and I think it is only fair as to the Commissioners that such a measure as that before the House should be acceded to.

Lord ROBERT CECIL said, he was in favour of the Motion, and hoped that the House would not remain satisfied with the explanations they had heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for they amounted to but a very slight attempt to dispose of the matter. The question really in issue was, whether the whole patronage of the Crown should not be placed in the hands of officers wielding irresponsible power. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had nicknamed the transactions of those officers by characterizing them as "essentially judicial." He (R. Cecil) had never before heard of the application of the term; but if proceedings were to be called "essentially judicial," and if the House of Commons were to be debarred from any power of reviewing the decisions of those Ci-vice Commissioners, then he felt no hesitation in saying that they had lost much more than they had gained by the establishment of such a system. And he would remind the House that not more than two years ago a Government was turned out, not wholly, but mainly, because its appointments were considered improper. But, accepting for the moment, that these proceedings ought to be considered "essentially judicial" in their character, had ever anybody heard of essentially judicial proceedings being carried on in England with closed doors? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in alluding to the examinations at the Universities, had called the attention of the House to the fact that the decisions arrived at in Oxford and Cambridge were subject to no review; but the examinations were conducted in public, so that the bearing of the students could be observed, and some opinion be formed as to whether the decisions of the examiners were fair or not, rendering them, therefore, subject to censure. But the decisions arrived at by the Civil Service Commissioners were not only left without review, but the examinations were conducted in private. He, however, demurred entirely to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge being cited in justification of the Civil Service examination system. The degrees they granted had no influence on the fortunes of any one, save those to whom they were given; whereas all the inferior offices of the Crown were recruited from these Civil Service examinations. There was no analogy between the two. It was of the essence of a free country that the disposal of its public offices should be reviewed and criticised and inquired into by the representatives of the people. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of these Commissioners in complimentary terms. He had no doubt they conducted their duties with great ability and impartiality; he had no ground to impugn the one or the other; but it should be borne in mind that impartiality and ability were not always secured by high names and distinguished position, and that this system which we were establishing might last for generations. Without imputing corruption to the Commissioners, which he would be slow to do, he might still, without insulting them, remark on their eccentricities and crotchets. For instance, they might have peculiar views about education and other matters coming within their province, and they might

Lord Robert Cecil

thrust these peculiar crotchets forward to the detriment of the public service and to the injury of the youths they had to examine and the system they were called upon to administer. He would even go further, and, discarding his allusions to hypothesis, call the attention of the House to the Report last issued by these Commissioners, and especially to the details of the examinations for Indian appointments. In those examinations the Commissioners had been allowed to exercise their most extensive and unfettered powers, and in the results arrived at the House would find materials to fully justify the terms he had used—"eccentricities and crotchets." It would naturally be supposed that in granting Civil Service appointments some attention would be paid to the qualifications of the individual to perform the duties of the position. It was impossible to examine a man in the art of leading an army, or of governing a province; but he could be examined as to his knowledge of Sanscrit and Arabic, and in respect to these Indian examinations, upon his knowledge of those and their kindred languages would depend very much his efficiency in wielding the power with which he desired to be entrusted. It was, therefore, a rational conclusion that the Commissioners would encourage those who possessed these special qualifications for Government in India. But what was the fact? It would be found that men possessing high marks in Arabic and Sanscrit were rejected, whilst men who had no marks at all for proficiency in those languages, but whose knowledge of Latin and Greek, or other languages equally foreign to the duties of the position, had been found good, were chosen. With such facts as these before them, they were not to suppose these Commissioners were, as a matter of course, immaculate; and unless some check, such as that adopted with respect to every other paid servant of the Crown, were established, it would not be surprising if the duty were improperly performed. He agreed that the system was at present on its trial, but it would be found that its direct tendency was to turn all the offices of the Crown into a set of exhibitions for the schoolboys of the country. In no other undertaking was this system adopted; every private firm would look upon it with distrust. There was nothing that commended itself to common sense in the idea that a mere successful book-worm was, as a matter of course, more capable than his unsuccessful competitor of leading an army or ruling a province. The merits of the candidate should be tested by a more careful and ample experience and to obtain that experience they should jealously watch the progress of the present system, and more jealously than otherwise because the system was new, untried, and would most probably fail.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: There are two questions brought under our consideration, and before this House comes to a vote, it is expedient to distinguish between them. One is the expediency of the system of examination; the other is the propriety of making the examination papers public. I remember very well the issue of the Order in Council under which this system was created, and I cannot admit that there was any want of consideration in regard to the framing of that Order, while up to this time it has not been found necessary to make any alterations in the regulations there laid down. Since that time the Commissioners have made annual reports, and the working of the system has been copiously brought under the notice of Parliament, so that there has been ample opportunity of interfering, if interference had been thought necessary. I therefore assume that the general feeling of Parliament and the country is in favour of the maintenance of the system. I do not, therefore, think it necessary to review the ground which the noble Lord has travelled over when he appeared to question the expediency of the general system. The point raised by the Motion, and which we have to decide is, whether it is expedient that any hon. Member of this House should be entitled to call for papers written by candidates at the examinations. I affirm that, if the system is a good one and ought to be supported, it is absolutely necessary that the confidence of the various candidates should be maintained. We have the example of the examinations at the Universities and public schools to go by. The noble Lord, who is so well acquainted with the system of examination at Oxford, said there was publicity given to the examinations at that University. [Lord R. CREIL: At the visd voce examinations.] But these are not visd voce examinations. The rule both at Oxford and Cambridge is that the examination papers written by the candidates both for degrees and studentships, are considered confidential, and that were even the head of a college or any one in authority to complain of the discretion of the examiners, the latter would nevertheless refuse to show the papers. Suppose you were to allow an appeal from the decision of the examining masters by bringing the papers before House of Commons, the effect would be that you would have to bring up the papers not only of the unsuccessful but of the successful candidates. What would be the result? Some Gentlemen might think that a person placed by the examiners six or seven, ought to be four or five; but is a Bill to be brought in reversing the decision of the examiners? Such a mode of conducting the business of the examinations would be absurd and impracticable. The only means of attaining the object of the hon. Gentleman would be to declare that, in the event of a candidate being dissatisfied with the result of an examination, there should be an appeal to some superior board of examiners. But would such a system as that answer? The rule is, that where there is no competition, the original appointment is in one sense absolute. The person is usually sent to the Civil Service examiners in order that they may ascertain whether or not he comes up to a certain standard. If he comes up to the standard, his appointment proceeds; if he does not come up to the standard, another is appointed. In the case of competition, the duty of the examiners is to say which is the best of the candidates, but in no case is the original appointment dependent upon the will of the examiners. It is therefore erroneous to say that the patronage of the Crown is in any sense transferred to the examiners. But what would be the result of the appointment of a superior board of appeal? The result would be simply this, that in any case where candidates were rejected for not coming up to the standard, or rejected in cases of competition, they would appeal and take the chance of a second examination. You would then have the process repeated a second time, before another board not more competent to decide than the first, and you would multiply the trouble and inconvenience without any good result. The necessity of the case seems, therefore, to be that if you are to have these examinations at all you must allow the decision without appeal, to rest with the persons appointed by the Executive Government. If it can be shown that they are not worthy of the confidence of the Government or this House, that they act with unfairness, or are incompetent from literary or other disqualifications, then let the House interfere by an Address to the Crown, to remove them from their offices; but it is impossible to work the system on any other principle than that of placing confidence in the examiners and not violating the secrecy of the examination papers. Therefore any Motion calling for such papers ought not to be assented to.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the rule adopted by the examining Commissioners was to take a certain standard, and to put aside all considerations of special fitness beyond that. [THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Accomplishments, not fitness.] That word would answer his purpose as well as the other. What he wished to say was, that the tendency of such a system as that described by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that if the candidates did not come up to the elementary standard they were put aside altogether and others chosen in their place—would be to make the affair rather a mere schoolboy's examination than the examination of persons capable of performing duties to the public. Spelling, he admitted, was an elementary principle of education, and perhaps, in the absence of any other there was not a better test of whether a man was an educated man or not than that of spelling. But it should not be forgotten that many an eminent man had gone down to his grave deserving well of his country for the services he had performed, but whose ability to spell was in fact nil. Discussing once with Sir George Grey, the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, the merits of a public servant, Sir George said—

"I never knew a more valuable or efficient public officer, for he was able to speak well, write well, and compose well—his reports being truly admirable; but he would never have been able to enter the civil service under the present system, for to the end of his days he could not spell well."

Without alluding to names, he would give another instance. There was an individual who excelled all others in history, mathematics, and composition; not only so, but he was known among his fellows to be the ablest and most efficient candidate for the office; yet that man had been rejected in a competition because he had made a mistake in the spelling of a single word. He would not deny that if resort could be had to no other test the test of spelling might be taken; but he maintained that such elementary parts of education ought not to be taken as conclusive while it was possible to test the abilities and education of candidates in some other way. He could not agree either with the statements that had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to what was understood to be the prevailing practice in the various departments of the Government with respect to the removal and reinstatement of public officers. And he was of opinion that in the case of the individual to whom the right hon. Gentleman had more particularly alluded, that it would have been simple justice to reinstate the man who had been improperly displaced. Indeed, so far from the doctrine laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer having obtained, while he (Mr. Hope) was in the Colonial Office, one of the most difficult and disagreeable portions of their duty was the discussing and determining questions with respect to the removal of public officers. He did not deny that for the efficiency of the public service it would, in many respects, be much better that there should be a power of absolute dismissal; for there were many cases in which a man was inefficient, but in which no fault could be alleged sufficient to justify his discharge. It was, in fact, one of the advantages which private mercantile firms possessed over the Government, that when they had a clerk that did not suit them they could send him away without assigning any reason. Nevertheless, he held that no such custom could be introduced into the Government offices; they must in each case require a justification for the dismissal of a public servant. He did not wish to say a word in disparagement of the Commissioners in the present case, of whose very names he was ignorant, but it could not be contended that they were not liable to errors. Only the other day it transpired that the examiners for military commissions had been deceived by a gross system of fraud. Suppose that had been the case of a competitive examination. If grounds should exist for supposing that improper practices prevailed, were not parties who were aggrieved to be entitled to appeal to the Government, and demand an investigation? Moreover, he could give an example where an appeal had been actually allowed. The military examinations were not only directed to proficiency and scholarship, but also to physical qualifications. A candidate was recently rejected on the ground either of deficiency of eyesight or hearing. The young man's father dissented from the decision. He took the opinion of physicians, which established the lad's fitness, the military examiner gave way, and the boy was received. That was, fortunately, an appeal of a nature which it was possible to substantiate; but the same right ought to be recognized more generally, and he for one could not admit the principle of irresponsibility on the part of the Commissioners which the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed desirous to establish.

Sir George Lewis

MR. LOWE: In order that the House may not be led away from the question at issue, I wish to restate what is the precise claim put forward by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That claim is simply that in the absence of any imputation of fraud, misconduct, and suspicion, the Government shall not be compelled by the friends of candidates who may consider themselves aggrieved, in the House of Commons to publish the answers to the questions that have been proposed. And what does a man contract for with the Government who submits himself to examination? He submits on his part to abide by the result of that examination, and the Government, on their part, undertake that if the examiners place him in a certain position he shall receive a certain place. The Government, also, do not undertake that the Commissioners shall be infallible. They undertake that the Commissioners shall do their duty honestly and fairly, and if they do that the contract is fulfilled, and it would be the height of injustice to the other candidates to reverse the decision of the Commissioners, even if they should have been guilty of some errors. If these examinations are to be re-opened, the candidate who is fortunate enough to have a friend in a Member of Parliament will always be able to obtain a reversal and review of the examination; but the poor man who has no such friend must submit to the result of the examination, although the Commissioners are quite as liable to error in the one case as the other. What remedy can there be in publicity in such a case? This House does not meet to entertain scholastic questions, but to manage the business of the nation, and I trust the time will never come when it finds us engaged in considering examination papers involving questions of spelling and grammar. What would be the result if the House got possession of these papers? What would they do with them? Would they reverse the decision of the examiners? In the department with which I am connected it has always been the practice to refuse these examination papers, on the ground that the person submits to this examination as he would submit to an award in a case of arbitration. The noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) has complained that in the East Indian examination candidates are not examined into those matters which would show their special aptitude for the Indian service.

LORD R. CECIL: I said they were examined in special knowledge, but that those who were proficient in Sanscrit and Arabic were rejected, while those who knew nothing about them were selected.

MR. LOWE: The noble Lord is mistaken in what he said on this point. The subject of education for the Indian service was referred to a Commission of which Lord Macaulay was a Member. That Commission reported that they wished the Indian examination to be open to all the well educated young men in the country. They, therefore, made a list of all the subjects in which young men are usually educated, and assigned to each a number of marks which they believed would represent the relative difficulty of each subject. They did not put Arabic and Sanscrit in that list, but not on the ground of the aptitude which a knowledge of those languages would give a person for the Indian service, but simply and solely because they were studies upon which young men of liberal education might in some cases have entered, and for which they might be, therefore, entitled to receive marks. But the Commissioners drew up their list expressly to exclude those who had turned their attention to the Indian service, in order that the service might be open to all the young men in the country, and that those should not be excluded who had not thought it necessary to devote a certain portion of their time to particular studies. I had something to do with that Report, and, for my own part, I only regretted that Arabic and Sanscrit were included at all, because the admission of those languages into the list tended to create the very error into which the noble Lord had fallen. As the House would not know what to do with these papers if it got them, and as debates on this subject would take up the time of the House without any useful result, I trust that the House will refuse to agree to a Motion which would destroy the independence of the examiners, and put an end to the confidence which the country now places in their decisions.

MR. BENTINCK replied. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to a case which occurred in the Customs some time ago. But in that case, in consequence of the Report of the Committee, the man was re-appointed, while in the case he now brought forward there were no means of obtaining justice if these papers were refused.

Motion made and Question put,

"That there be laid before this House, Copies of the Examination Papers, and the Answers thereto, by the Candidates for the appointments of Factory Boys, before the Civil Service Commissioners at Portsmouth, in January 1860."

The House divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 80: Majority 30.

LOCOMOTIVE BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. GARNETT said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill for regulating the Use of Locomotives on Public and other Roads, and the Tolls to be Levied on such Locomotives, and on the Waggon and Carriages drawn or propelled by the same. The Bill was in principle the same that he had the honour to introduce last year, but he had added new provisions in order to meet the objections which were then urged against it.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he could not conceive how it would be possible, under the most favourable circumstances, to run steam carriages on the public roads consistently with the public safety. He should not object to the Bill at that stage, but he hoped it would be shown to the House that no danger could arise from the use of locomotives on turnpike roads.

Leave given.

Bill for regulating the use of Locomotives on Turnpike and other Roads, and the tolls to be levied on such Locomotives, and on the waggons and carriages drawn or propelled by the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GARNETT, Mr. HEADLAM, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, and Mr. RIDLEY.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

INDIA (BUDGET).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to move that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of the Minutes in Council of the Governor of Madras, dated the 20th day of March, 1860, and of the Minutes of the other Members of the Madras Council, upon Mr. Wilson's Budget;

Mr. Bentinck

together with any Correspondence of the Secretary of State for India in Council with the Governments of India and Madras upon the imposition of the Income Tax; and of Dissents (if any) of Members of the Council of India. There had recently appeared in an Indian newspaper certain Minutes of the Governor of Madras, the Commander-in-Chief, Mr. Maltby, and Mr. Morehead, members of the Council of Madras, expressing their opinions as to the practicability or non-practicability of imposing the new taxes devised by Mr. Wilson upon the people of India at the present moment. In that Minute, Sir Charles Trevelyan expressed his conviction that the present crisis in India was more pregnant with portentous results for good or evil than any which had occurred within the memory of the present generation, and that on the line now taken would depend the future of our empire in the East. Sir Charles then proceeded to say:—

"I have always been of opinion that the financial crisis might be satisfactorily met by the reduction of expenditure only, combined with some obvious administrative improvements, whereby both our civil and military establishments would be rendered more effective, and the existing taxes would be more fully collected. . . . If we determine upon reducing a large portion of our Native Army and improving the condition of the remainder, financial difficulties will be overcome; we shall have a feeling of security which we have not enjoyed for many years, and shall be free to work out those improvements in the different branches of Indian administration on which the prosperity of the country depends. The result of this policy may be as clearly foreseen as anything in human affairs can be; but it will be far otherwise if we use our strength to impose on the people of India a new system of taxation which is extremely distasteful to them, which is not justified by any necessity, and which is totally unsuited to the present state of society in the country. The argument used by myself and my colleagues, and by many of the ablest of the officers serving under us, against the tobacco and licensing taxes are equally applicable to the taxes now proposed. If we use the strength which our present advantages give us to force obnoxious taxes on the people it will place us in a position towards them totally incompatible with the simultaneous reduction of the Native Army. We cannot afford to have a discontented people and a discontented army upon our hands at the same time."

The same Gentleman spoke of the income tax as utterly impracticable, and of the tobacco tax as being next to it most injurious, because it would bring back the evils of a system of native taxation from which the Government had only recently assured the people they were finally relieved. He also said—

"It is a novel experiment, the success of which must be uncertain, and in the event of failure there is the danger of its raising a flame of discontent throughout the whole empire, and uniting the entire people in a feeling of opposition to us."

That was a portentous prognostication, from the fulfilment of which he hoped Heaven would defend us. Mr. Maltby said—

"I hesitate not to give my strong opinion as an individual member of the Government that it would be far safer to dispense with three European regiments, at least two of our Native Cavalry Corps, and a corresponding portion of Native Infantry, than to attempt to introduce the proposed taxes."

Mr. Morehead, whose experience gives great weight to his opinions, said—

"A sullen feeling of dissatisfaction already exists wherever Mr. Wilson's scheme of taxation has been understood by the people, and this feeling will, if the proposed taxation is carried out, undoubtedly become one of general and serious discontent. I agree with Mr. Maltby. I look upon an income tax for the present year as hopeless, and as a general measure it can only end in failure."

Such were the opinions of high authorities upon the proposed scheme. He said nothing as to the mode in which they had got into print. They had been published in the papers, and were known by this time throughout all India, and he believed that it would be found impossible, after that disclosure, to carry out Mr. Wilson's Budget. Sir C. Trevelyan set out with the axiom which every statesman adopted unhesitatingly, that before you attempt to tax a people you must see if you cannot reduce your expenditure, and Sir Charles thought he had proved that reduction was quite practicable.

Mr. A. STEUART moved that the House be counted.

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members being present,

COLONEL SYKES proceeded to say that if 50,000 European troops could break the neck of the mutiny, reduce Delhi, take Lucknow, and hold their own until reinforcements arrived from Europe, that there was not now a Native Prince in India who could withstand a Brigade—nor a fortress to sit down before—and that the people had been to a considerable extent disarmed, there was no necessity to keep a larger force in India now than in 1857. In April 1857, however, the revenue of India amounted to £33,000,000, which was fully sufficient to cover all charges in India and England at that time, and allowed £2,000,000 to be expended on public works and improvements. The state of things which existed in April, 1857, could surely be restored, if the House and the Government only resolved to return to the status of that period. These facts were not to be gainsaid, as they were derived from papers upon the table of the House; and he contended that in these circumstances they would be running a tremendous risk if, in opposition to such opinions as those which had been expressed by Sir Charles Trevelyan and Mr. Maltby, they attempted to impose new taxes when they could do without them. His right hon. Friend (Sir C. Wood) had a vast responsibility resting upon him. He must either maintain a force sufficient to collect those taxes in India, or he must abandon them, and reduce the expenditure of that country within the £37,000,000 which the Indian revenue was now producing. He hoped that before these taxes were insisted upon his right hon. Friend would obtain the opinion of this House upon the subject; for, fortified in that way, he might be able to carry the whole weight of the country with him. In the meantime, as the papers for which he now moved had been printed and circulated in India, he did not see how the Government could well refuse to produce them for the information of this House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Minutes in Council of the Governor of Madras, dated the 20th day of March, 1860, and of the Minutes of other Members of the Madras Council, upon Mr. Wilson's Budget; together with any Correspondence of the Secretary of State for India in Council with the Governments of India and Madras upon the imposition of the Income Tax.

"And of Dissents (if any) of Members of the Council of India."

MR. VANSITTART said, that as he had placed upon the paper a notice of a Motion for Friday next very similar in terms to that just made by his hon. and gallant Friend, he begged to be allowed to detain the House for a few moments. On Friday last he had ventured to condemn the financial scheme which had been so recently introduced to the Legislative Council at Calcutta by Mr. Wilson, and he was not a little surprised to find that opinion so soon receive a strong confirmation from very important and influential authorities.

On Saturday, the following day, the Indian mail arrived, bringing news that the financial Budget was exciting the greatest alarm in India, in the same proportion as the financial Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was beginning to excite distrust and apprehension amongst commercial and monetary circles at home. No less authorities than Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Governor of Madras, and Mr. Maltby, who had been for thirty years in the Civil Service of that Presidency, and who had lately been made a Member of the Council, Mr. Morehead, and Sir Patrick Grant, his colleagues in Council, had denounced this scheme in the strongest terms. Without, however, going into the merits or demerits of the scheme at that moment—though he himself held a very strong opinion on it, and, if no other Member undertook the task, should feel it his duty to bring the question under the consideration of the House—the request of his hon. and gallant Friend ought to be agreed to. The papers had been published in all the Indian journals, and on so grave and important a subject Parliament and the people of this country ought to be placed on the same footing as the Indian community. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India would not resist the production of these papers, and if he did, he (Mr. Vansittart) would gladly support his hon. and gallant Friend in taking the opinion of the House on the subject.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that great exception was taken in this country to Mr. Wilson's policy of laying additional taxes on British manufactures introduced into India. If it were true, as was stated last year, on high authority, that India was chiefly valuable to us in consequence of the commercial advantages which we derived from that country, the policy of taxing British imports was very questionable. It had always been maintained that the raw materials of manufactures should be exempted from taxation or as lightly taxed as the finances of a country would allow; but in this new scheme a double duty had been laid on the importation of the half-manufactured article—cotton twist. The manufacturers of that article in this country had to sustain a competition in India, where there were now a considerable number of factories having the advantages of cheap labour, cotton grown on the spot, and none of the drawbacks of the cost of transporting the material first to England and then to India; and this was a case, therefore, in which special consideration ought to have been paid to them. He hoped that this policy would receive full discussion in the House.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: The House will see, from the observations of my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Buchanan), that my right hon. Friend, Mr. Wilson, is not at all likely to be more successful than Chancellors of the Exchequer in this country in the very difficult task of imposing taxes which will please all parties. My hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes) finds fault with one part of the Budget, because it will not suit the people of India; and my hon. Friend, the Member for Glasgow, finds fault with another portion, because it interferes with the interests of the manufacturers at home. But the question for the House to bear in mind, is the position of the Indian finances. It was my duty last year to state their position; they have received the fullest consideration of Indian Statesmen; and the Supreme Government in India, after the fullest deliberation, and after having taken the opinions of the best authorities, have come reluctantly to the unanimous conclusion that the course which they have taken, coupled with a large reduction of expenditure, is the only one which offers a fair prospect of equalizing expenditure and income. That this is a desirable, nay, an indispensable object to attain, no one in this House, I think, will be prepared to deny. Having refused last year, and rightly refused, I believed, to give an Imperial guarantee for the Indian loan, I must express an earnest hope that the House will leave the responsibility for the arrangement of the Indian finances to the Government in that country, who, after all, must be better able to judge in what manner additional revenue can most easily and justly be obtained. I quite agree with my hon. and gallant Friend, that large reductions ought to be made in Indian expenditure. Ever since I have been in office I have impressed that on the Indian Government; and I am happy to say that last week we received news from India of reductions to a larger extent than we anticipated. The House may be assured that I do look to a large reduction of expenditure, rather than to a large increase of taxation, for equalizing expenditure and income; but the Indian Government have come to the conclusion, and I must say, that I cannot dissent from that view, that both are necessary for that object. I shall not go into a discussion of the Indian Budget, further than to say with regard to the production of the papers, that I hope my gallant Friend will not press for them at the present moment. They only arrived here last Saturday; other questions besides the mere question of the Budget are involved in them; and it is only right that the Indian Council should have the opportunity of giving them a full consideration. I feel the necessity of producing them before long, as strongly as my hon. and gallant Friend; and in a week or ten days I may have no objection to laying them on the table; coupled, however, with other papers, without which it would be impossible to come to an adequate conclusion on the subject.

Mr. Vansittart

COLONEL SYKES, in reply said, he had no objection to leaving the chief responsibility to Indian authorities; but he wished to point out that these authorities were not agreed. The Madras Government objected to the scheme in the strongest manner.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he presumed that after the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Vansittart) the financial scheme of Mr. Wilson would be brought under discussion on some future occasion. He would suggest, therefore, that instead of these desultory discussions, the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for India, should fix a day when, all the papers on the subject being before the House, the whole question of Indian finance should be gone into. In this way the right hon. Gentleman would save both his own time and that of the House.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that it would, of course, be his duty, sooner or later, to bring the finances of India under the notice of the House. The Indian accounts had been received, and were being prepared for printing. As soon as they were printed they would be laid on the table of the House; but, until they were produced, it would be impossible to fix any time at which to enter upon the question; nor in the present state of public business, was it possible for him to do so, if even the papers were now ready.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

STOCK-JOBGING BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BOVILL, in moving the second reading of this Bill said, that it had its origin in the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to obtain a revenue by imposing a penny tax upon contracts made on the Stock Exchange. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared that Sir J. Barnard's Act was obsolete, and on that ground proposed to repeal it, and convert the contracts against which it was directed into a source of revenue. But the right hon. Gentleman did not seem then to be aware of the existence of the Act of 1845, which prohibited all contracts by way of wagering and gaming. The Government afterwards stated that they did not intend to give validity to gambling transactions, but only to deal with contracts for bonâ fide transactions. Now, if the object of the Bill introduced by the Government was merely to prevent interference with the legitimate transactions of bonâ fide purchase and sale, then he quite concurred in it; but, on the other hand, if they intended by their Bill to do more, and to remove the restrictions upon gaming transactions, that Measure would meet with his most strenuous opposition. The Bill which he had prepared, whilst it preserved the penalties against gambling, would be found to do away entirely with every possible restriction which could be considered objectionable as interfering with bonâ fide transactions; and he did not confine it to the mere transactions of immediate purchase and sale. He quite understood that it might be right and proper, in ordinary transactions on the Stock Exchange, that there should be contracts made which might be completed at a future day, and that contracts should be entered into by persons who at the moment might not be possessed of the stock which they contracted to sell. Transactions of that kind however were prohibited by Sir J. Barnard's Act under heavy penalties, and he proposed by his Bill to do away with those restrictions. There was no bonâ fide transaction of purchase and sale which would, after the passing of his Bill, should the House sanction it, be at all interfered with by the provisions of Sir J. Barnard's Act. But he had guardedly abstained from giving any countenance to transactions which were of a purely wagering or gambling character, and had left all the penalties in force as to such bargains, and that was the main difference between the Bill proposed by himself and that proposed by the Government. The objection he felt to the Government measure was, that it remitted the penalties on gambling in the Funds, which were imposed by Sir John Barnard's Act, and it rested with the Government to make out a case for a repeal of those provisions. He had never yet heard any sound argument for the remission of those penalties. The object no doubt was to raise a revenue by taxing gambling transactions, but the Government could not tax them without also legalizing them; and he would ask, was there not something of far higher consideration than the mere question of revenue? He could not help thinking, that of all species of gambling that on the Stock Exchange was the worst and most pernicious. If a man went into a gaming-house, and threw dice, or played at hazard, the chances were equal; but was there any element of fairness in the gambling on the Stock Exchange? Persons who had secret information of the movements of Governments abroad, or who had obtained intelligence from those who ought not to impart it, might operate on the Stock Exchange with a certainty which others could not enjoy, as to the events which would take place. Again, nothing was so easy as for men of large capital to combine in their operations to their certain gain, but to the certain loss of other speculators. Suppose three capitalists on the one hand, and three on the other, wished to realize a million of money—what so easy as to employ six different brokers on either side—innocently, so far as the brokers were concerned—to operate so as to raise or depress the stocks? The parties could themselves sustain no loss, because they were dealing one with the other, but the man who went there to speculate in good faith could not fail to be led on to his destruction and ruin. Such gambling was so easy that if the restrictions upon it were removed an inducement would be held out to many persons, who now resisted the temptation, to embark on those speculations, which, if at first unsuccessful, at once produce ruin, and which, if temporarily profitable, only postponed the fatal period, by fostering a habit of gambling. It was on that account that the repetitions of such scenes as had lately alarmed the commercial world—the case of Mr. Pullinger, and others of the same sort—were so frequent. He was told that there was speculation in other descriptions of property produced by such operations besides the funds, but was that any argument for removing the penalties upon gambling? Would the Government, because they found gambling transactions in existence, be prepared to legalize them? So far from equalizing the market, an effect which had been ascribed to these speculations, they had a most ruinous effect upon trade. A recent case had occurred in which a certain firm having entered into time-bargains to an enormous extent for tallow, found it worth their while to buy up all the tallow in St. Petersburg, in order to keep up the price, but the consequence was that the consumer was taxed with an unnecessarily high price, to satisfy the speculations of one house. In India some years ago, an influential firm employed agents all over the country to bargain for opium, with a view to raise the price, while the firm itself ostensibly was working for a fall in the market, and by those speculations stood to win a million and a half of money. That was no imaginary transaction, for the circumstances of the case were investigated by the Courts of India, and afterwards became the subject of judicial decision in the Privy Council. Were not such cases as those likely to be most destructive to the morality of a people, and was not their immediate effect most injurious upon persons legitimately engaged in trade? The Government of India, in consequence passed a Bill to prohibit all wagering and gambling contracts. He trusted the House, with these examples before them, would not consent to encourage these gambling transactions. Again he would ask why, when year after year, every endeavour was made to put a stop to gaming-houses, the Government should now come forward, and, by a side wind, endeavour in order to obtain a revenue to legalize or remove a single restriction upon gambling? If the great gaming-house in Throgmorton Street were licensed, why should not other gaming-houses be licensed, too, if they applied for the privilege? Why should a penalty be continued against them, and why should not all restrictions be removed from lotteries or betting-houses? It was said that all transactions for the purchase of goods at a future day were of a gambling nature; but if those transactions were confined to legitimate bargains, and were based on the principle of supply and demand, they would be limited in their extent, and would not be productive of injurious results; but not so with gambling in the Funds. He contended, then, that no sufficient grounds were shown for removing any of the penalties and restrictions imposed upon gambling contracts by Sir John Barnard's Act. That Act declared all contracts by way of wagers and gaming to be void, a heavy penalty was imposed for making the wager, and an action for the return of the money was also authorized. The Government proposal would remove the penalty and the power of getting back the money, and simply render the transaction void. That was virtually to encourage gambling; and if they sanctioned it, would they not admit that those speculations were not looked upon by that House in so serious a light as formerly? He had endeavoured to ascertain, from time to time, upon what grounds the Government were resisting his proposal, and insisted upon extending the repeal to gambling transactions. The first suggestion was that Sir John Barnard's Act was an obsolete Act of former days, but that argument was at once removed by showing that in 1845 the Legislature had not treated it as obsolete, but had passed an Act to extend its provisions. The next ground taken up was that the Act was not efficient; but it was a strange way of increasing its efficiency to remove two of its most important restrictions. But did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that if no Act existed these transactions would not increase. He (Mr. Bovill) thought on the contrary that the effect of the provisions making the broker liable to a penalty, besides refunding the money, had a tendency to render him extremely cautious as to the persons with whom he transacted that species of business, and to limit greatly the number of persons who embarked in those gambling speculations. If only six tradesmen in the course of a year were prevented by these restrictions from entering upon that wild course, they ought certainly to be retained by the Legislature. Why was it that the Stock Exchange gentlemen were so anxious for the repeal of this clause? Was it not because the Stock Exchange knew that if the restrictions were withdrawn, and the penalty removed, their transactions in gambling in the British funds would be extensively increased? Could it be said, that the penalties imposed upon gaming-houses did not prevent gambling to a great extent? But it was argued that so long as these contracts were declared illegal the persons who embarked in them had a temptation held out to them to act dishonestly. But then, if that were so, what would they do with the Act of Parliament of 1845, which declared them illegal, and which it was not proposed to touch? Was it not to encourage dishonesty to tax the contracts, while they were declared null and void by the Act of 1845? There was only one argument more.^a The Solicitor General had said that the object of the Government was to make the law uniform, and to put an end to an Act which imposed a penalty only on one description of transactions. But if the question were to be dealt with as a whole, let the Government bring in a Bill to deal with all wagering and gambling transactions whatever. If Sir John Barnard's Act did not apply to transactions in the foreign funds or in railway shares, let the penalties be extended to those cases also. This, however, they did not pretend to do, and therefore to talk about making the law uniform was a mere afterthought. He offered his Bill as one that would legalize every bond fide transaction in the way of contract and sale, and if it was asked how they could ascertain when a transaction was bond fide, his answer was that juries would decide that just as they decided other questions of a similar kind. There would be no difficulty whatever about the matter, for an examination of the broker's books would at once show whether any transaction in which he had been engaged, was a real or a gambling transaction. His object was to legalize honest dealing and to discourage acts of gambling, and in that spirit he moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Bovill

Motion made, and Question proposed—
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. COLLIER said, it had been often asked of late who was Sir John Barnard? He was a citizen of London, and a Metropolitan Member who, 130 years ago, persuaded the House of Commons to pass a very foolish Act of Parliament—an Act that had never met with much favour on either side of Westminster Hall—an Act to which the Judges gave but little effect; and an Act that had been virtually repealed by common sense and the common practice of mankind. Sir John Barnard's views were, that it was necessary, in order to ensure our commercial morality, that men should be prevented from bargaining for that which at the time of the bargain they had not got. The fallacy of his views was pointed out 130 years ago, when it was predicted by many eminent lawyers then in the House that if it passed it would prove in its operations most injurious to trade, and one Member at the time said that it ought to be entitled "A Bill for destroying the commercial credit of the country." If all the evils prophesied in respect of this Act had not arisen, it was because it had been treated as a dead-letter, and men had gone on bargaining and trafficking as if the Act had never passed. He was only surprised such a Bill as that introduced by the Government had not been proposed before. Now, however, there were two Bills before the House. In one the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to repeal entirely Sir J. Barnard's Act; and by the other, which the hon. and learned Member for Guildford had introduced, and in regard to which he appeared to have stolen a march on Government in the nature of a time bargain, it was proposed to repeal a certain portion only, and to retain another portion of Sir John Barnard's Act. His hon. and learned Friend appeared to have changed his opinion lately with reference to Sir John Barnard's Act. A short time since the hon. and learned Member considered it the perfection of wisdom; but, having discovered his mistake, he wished now to repeal a portion of it only. He (Mr. Collier) considered the simple mode of dealing with this subject was to adopt the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and repeal Sir J. Barnard's Act. If that Act were good as applied to time-bargains in funds, it would also be good for railway shares, stock, and every description of mercantile contract. His hon. and learned Friend, however, shrank from such an absurdity. A few years ago an Act had been passed which, by a recent decision of the Courts, applied to every transaction in the nature of a bet. It was quite enough to say that all gaming transactions were illegal, and then Sir J. Barnard's Act was unnecessary. He therefore submitted that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend was useless and mischievous. To use a homely expression, borrowed from the hon. Member for Birmingham, it made "two bites of a cherry"—it repealed a part instead of a whole—while it was desirable to repeal Sir J. Barnard's Act entirely, and at once, and have done with it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Mr. MALINS said, he should support the Amendment. The measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to repeal Sir John

Mr. Collier

Barnard's Act, and leave all trading transactions of a gambling nature to be dealt with under the provisions of the general statute of the present reign, was plain and intelligible. But the partial repeal proposed by his learned Friend drew a distinction of which he was at a loss to understand the principle or advantage. He concurred in the view that if the Act was to have operation at all, it ought to be extended to all gambling transactions in trade. The man who sold Russian or French stock, or corn, or any other merchandise which did not belong to him, was quite as culpable as he who sold a quantity of Three per Cent Stock which was not in his possession. In his opinion, however, the Act was so defective, absurd, and inoperative, that the wisest course the House could take would be to get rid of it altogether.

Mr. MELLOR said, he approved of the measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in preference to that of the hon. and learned Member for Guildford. Sir John Barnard's Act was known to have been brought in because Walpole had been suspected of stock-jobbing; but the Minister, with lofty disdain, allowed it to pass without notice, and against his own judgment. It was, moreover, based upon arguments wholly untenable in modern times, and as it had become a complete dead letter it should be repealed outright. No longer back than Lord Kenyon's time 200 actions were brought against parties for gambling transactions on the Stock Exchange; but all failed on account of the refusal of a broker called as a witness in the first case to make any disclosures. Since then there had been, he believed, no actions of the kind.

Mr. BOVILL said, his Bill only imposed penalties upon what were universally admitted to be improper transactions, while in other cases it removed restrictions which interfered with business.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negativ d.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.—THIRD READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE: SECOND NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th April], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice—

"That the present state of the Finances of the country renders it undesirable to proceed further with the repeal of the Excise Duty on Paper."

I feel I ought to explain my reason for putting this notice on the paper, instead of the usual Amendment that the Bill be read a third time this day six months. I have for some time been of opinion that there was no probability that this Bill could be proceeded with at present. I thought there was other business which must take precedence of it; and it was, therefore, with great surprise that I heard last evening the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was intended to resume the debate to-night. Considering the bearing which the Estimates of the year have upon this question and that we have not yet had an opportunity of discussing them, I certainly did think that we should, before proceeding with this measure, have been allowed to make ourselves acquainted with the financial condition of the country, and to ascertain whether we are now in exactly the same position as when the Budget was brought forward. We have this year departed very widely from the ordinary routine of financial business, because usually some progress is made in the Estimates even before the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his statement to the House. That course, no doubt, is sometimes departed from, but seldom, if ever, has there been a year in which such important business has been brought forward before any progress had been made in the Estimates; and it appears to me that this is not a year that should be chosen for deviating from the usual practice in such matters, because the financial measures of the Government are very important and the annual Estimates of a very peculiar character. The Budget was announced before a single Estimate was produced, and we were compelled, therefore, to take them upon the authority of my right hon. Friend. Since his statement, however, we have had a good many of the Estimates laid on the table, and, to my great surprise—I can hardly now believe I am not under some mistake—I find a considerable difference in one class between the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the statement which appears in the Estimates. I was unable to give earlier notice of my Motion because, until last night, I never thought this Bill would be brought forward before we had made some progress in those Estimates. With regard to the form of the Motion, it is not my wish to dispute the third reading. I do not intend to maintain that the paper duty is a good duty, nor do I in any way dispute the case which my right hon. Friend has made against it. But it appears to me that this is not the right time for repealing it, and in making this Motion I think I am acting in the spirit of the Resolution which was passed two years ago, and to which so much reference has been made as a reason for that repeal. I feel bound, however, to protest against its being considered that we are in any way bound by a Resolution passed in a former Parliament, and especially by a loose Resolution of the sort which was passed in 1858. It is not, indeed, pretended that we are practically and absolutely bound by it, but it is said that the question is, to a certain extent, prejudged by that Resolution—the more so because it was adopted, after full deliberation, with the assent of the then responsible Ministers of the Crown and without a division. If we look, however, to the terms of that Resolution, and to what took place in the debate upon it, I think the case for the repeal of the paper duty in the present year is not at all strengthened. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade moved a Resolution of two parts, the first containing the abstract proposition that the paper duty was not a good permanent source of revenue, and the second declaring that measures ought to be taken to put an end to it. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer did not deny the first part of the Resolution, that it was not desirable to maintain the paper duty as a permanent source of revenue, but he demurred to the second part, that the House ought at an early period to abolish the duty, because he said other things ought first to be taken into consideration. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London also, while assenting to the general proposition that the tax was not a good one, used strong language as to other things which ought first to be done, and said that the faith of Parliament was almost pledged to make remission first of the war duties on tea and sugar. The present Home Secretary reminded the House that they were pledged on the first favourable opportunity to repeal the income tax, and he said he did not like the second part of the Resolution, because it interfered with the redemption of that pledge. The latter part of the Resolution was struck out, and it was generally understood that, although the abstract Resolution was adopted, it was not intended to give effect to it. It may not be a wise thing for the House to adopt an abstract Resolution of that sort; but when it is adopted with the express and distinct refusal to attach words which would give it a practical operation, I cannot find in it any argument that the House is pledged, much less that the Resolution pledges a Parliament which is not the same as that in which the Vote was taken, to any particular measure for giving effect to it. I think it, therefore, a most undesirable precedent for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to refer to an abstract Resolution as one which commits the House to a certain policy; and if abstract propositions are so taken up I think serious mischief may follow. Not denying that the repeal of the paper duty is a good thing if we can afford at, I say the present is not a good time to take such a step; and if it was not thought a good time in 1858, when the expenditure was £63,500,000, still less can it be a good time now, when the expenditure is £71,100,000. Although there may have been a reasonable probability in 1858 that we should have an opportunity at a future time of dispensing with the tax, the case is very different now, with a much larger expenditure and greater difficulty of meeting it. I admit that my objections to the repeal of this duty, are in the nature of objections to the whole financial scheme of the Government. One of the main objections is, that I think we are now sacrificing a large and important portion of indirect taxation without having previously settled the principles upon which the direct taxation to be substituted is to be placed. I do not wish to be understood as saying that I object to the substitution in a proper way of direct for indirect taxation. What I mean is this—that we ought to take very good care to make direct taxation as free as possible from objection, and to put it in such a shape that when we strike away indirect taxation we may be in a position to fall back on direct taxation, with the certainty that it will not fail us in consequence of the objections which it will engender. This is the point in which the scheme of the Government fails. It is very easy and pleasant to strike away indirect taxation, but is it

[Second Night.]

Sir Stafford Northcote

prudent to do so when we have in its place only the income tax, which high authorities tell us is unsuitable as a permanent source of revenue, and when no one can assure us that it can in any way be altered or improved? The other objection which I have is, that for the purpose of change we are forestalling and using up all our resources, postponing burdens, calling in credits, and taking other temporary aids, and accumulating for next year a deficit, which, to say the least, is most undesirable. I think those two objections have become stronger since the financial statement than they were at that time. I will now venture to call the attention of the House to the discrepancy between the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Estimates now laid on the table. My right hon. Friend estimated the charges for the current year—including the debt, the Consolidated Fund, the Army, Navy, Civil Service, and Revenue Estimates, together with a Vote of credit of £500,000 for the China expedition—at £70,100,000. The items for the debt, the Consolidated Fund, and the army and navy amounted to £57,400,000; the Vote of credit to £500,000; the Miscellaneous Estimates to £7,500,000; and the estimates for the collection of the revenue to £4,700,000. Those were the figures given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement, and to the estimates for the collection of the revenue I must request my right hon. Friend's particular attention, because he told us that they showed an apparent increase of £225,000, which would probably be to a great extent recovered by the superior yield of the Post Office amounting to £80,000. Since then the estimates for the collection of the revenue have been laid upon the table, and instead of £4,700,000 they amount to £4,932,432, showing therefore a difference of no less than £232,342. Considering that the estimated surplus was only £464,000, this makes a most serious difference in the calculations upon which the Budget was founded, because it at once does away with something like one-half of that surplus. I have looked at that once or twice, thinking that I must be mistaken, but on referring to the printed Report of my right hon. Friend's speech, I find that I have not misrepresented him in supposing that he took the amount at £4,700,000, and I am sure that I have taken that of the Estimates upon the table correctly at £4,932,432. Had we gone on with the discussion of these Estimates we might have received some explanation of this discrepancy, which would so far have mitigated the objection which I feel to this part of the financial scheme; but it is unreasonable to ask us to grant remissions of taxation before we know what our expenditure really is to be: and therefore I think I am justified in saying that, so far as we can judge, the financial state of the country does not admit of our proceeding with this measure at present. The Miscellaneous Estimates my right hon. Friend took at £7,500,000, including, I presume, the £100,000 which is usually taken for civil contingencies. As yet but six classes of these Estimates have been laid upon the table, but they amount to £6,644,328. Class 7, at the amount at which it stood last year, and the £100,000 for civil contingencies make up an item of £1,128,236, raising the amount of the Miscellaneous Estimates to £7,772,564, which would be an excess over the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman of £272,564. Now, I am aware that there will be a reduction in the amount of Class 7; but is it reasonable to suppose that you can obtain a diminution of no less than £270,000 upon a single class of estimates, the total amount under which is only £988,000? I do not say that it may not be done, but it would have been more satisfactory that we should have had these estimates fully before the House, in order that we might see whether it was a real saving or only a postponement of Votes which will come upon us in a future year. I know that my right hon. Friend is most anxious to reduce these Estimates, but except a reduction in Class 1, which I suppose is in the nature of a postponement of works, and in Class 4, a reduction of £22,000, which has been balanced by an increase of £20,000 in Class 3, he has been able to make no diminution. On the contrary, taking the estimates for the collection of the revenue together with the other classes, I find that there is an actual increase of no less than £85,000 in the present year. I know that I am apparently, in legal parlance, travelling out of the record, but it is a course which is forced upon me, because I cannot state my objections to the course which we are pursuing without pointing out in some detail the difficulty which I experience in going on with this legislation before I can ascertain what is the real state in which the Estimates will ultimately stand. I must also call attention to what has happened with regard to the Army Estimates. It is true that their amount is now pretty much that which my right hon. Friend stated. He said that the charge for the army and the militia would be about £15,300,000. I find that the Estimates upon the table amount to £14,842,000, which, taking the charge for the militia at £460,000, as last year, would give almost that amount. But a very remarkable operation has been performed upon these Estimates. After they had been laid upon the table and the number of men required had been stated at 143,000 and some odd hundreds, they were withdrawn upon the ground that the Governor General of India had sent home more troops than was expected, or something of that sort. They were withdrawn and revised, and in the revised Estimates I observe that the number of men, instead of being 143,000, is 145,000, the actual addition being about 1,900 men; but notwithstanding this there has been no increase of the Estimates. There has been an increase in some Votes, but that has been balanced by a decrease in others, and among these latter are the Votes for clothing, provisions, and warlike stores. Those who have objected to Votes for clothing and provisions after the number of men had been voted have often been told, and it is an argument which has been delivered ex cathedra, that they ought to have objected to the number of men, because after that has been passed the Votes for clothing and provisions follow as a matter of course. That to uninitiated persons seems an argument of great weight, and has, I know, closed the mouths of many persons who were disposed to raise objections; but it can never be used again, because in this instance, although the number of men has been increased, the Vote for clothing has decreased by £18,000, and that for provisions, including forage, by £2,700. The presumption which is raised by these facts is either that the Estimates were originally incorrectly or negligently framed, and the House was asked to vote an unnecessarily large amount, or that they have now been improperly reduced, and we shall at a future period be asked for a Supplementary Vote to supply deficiencies, as has occasionally been the case before. I have had the curiosity to look at the Supplementary Estimate of £1,050,000 which was voted last year, and I find that of that sum £290,000 was voted for clothing, and £350,000 for provisions, that is to say, the Estimates were insufficient under those two heads, under which so remarkable a reduction has now been made. I do not wish to question the accuracy of these Estimates. The circumstances which I have mentioned may be susceptible of a complete and satisfactory explanation, but we ought to have our minds set at rest upon these matters before we proceed with the financial scheme. If we abolish the paper duty, and the Government is afterwards obliged to ask for more money, there will be no means of raising it except by adding a penny to the income tax, or something of that sort, and therefore we ought to have an opportunity of going into these Estimates, and sifting them very carefully, before we agree to the abolition of that tax. These are not the only Votes upon which I would remark. In the item of warlike stores the revised Estimates show a reduction of not less than £80,000, which is a very curious feature, and lets us into something more. The original Estimate for warlike stores was £743,000, of which £250,000 was to be deducted for sums chargeable to the Indian Government. In the revised Estimates the Indian Government is charged, not with £250,000 but with £300,000, and the amount to be voted for miscellaneous stores is reduced from £743,000 to £713,000. Does this mean that India requires at one time one sum and another at another, or that the whole system of the accounts between the Indian Government and the Home Government is one incomprehensible labyrinth and maze, and that you may really make use of it as a matter of account to state things very much as you please? That is a matter on which I want information. We ought to have an account current between this Government and the Indian Government. I do not say anything is wrong, but all this is matter of inquiry. Of course we shall have that inquiry sooner or later; it cannot be prevented; but we should have it with much more profit to ourselves if we had not decided all our financial arrangements before we set about it. I might go into other details, but, in truth, I think I have stated quite enough to prove the case I was anxious to submit to the House that it is really necessary, before we proceed any further in the way of reducing taxation and throwing away for ever these duties on paper, that we should go into our Estimates and ascertain how the country really stands. I have not touched on other matters which are very important indeed, and on which I have in vain endeavoured to extract from Government some information. There is the Vote for fortifications for instance, which stands in the Estimates at £649,000. Do you, or do you not, mean to make any further proposal on that subject? I formerly asked that question, to which no reply was given. I repeated the inquiry, and the answer of the noble Lord was that a Commission had reported on the subject; their Report was under consideration, and when the Government had made up their minds what to do he would inform the House. But there the matter rests. I do not blame the Government for letting the matter rest there; but in the meantime they must not be surprised if rumour is busy spreading reports that they are going to have a large loan for this purpose. If the sum of £10,000,000 is to be borrowed, the interest of it will pretty nearly absorb the amount of the anticipated surplus. Perhaps you mean to deal with it in another way. Perhaps the loan is to be raised in Exchequer bonds, which are to be paid off from year to year; but if you are to spread the repayment of £10,000,000, or £5,000,000, or £6,000,000, over so many years, you will have a million a year or more to provide for that purpose, which might be got, perhaps, from the paper duty better than in any other way. Then, again, this fortification Vote is in a very anomalous state; there is this peculiarity about it, that no details whatever are given. In former years these details were always supplied; but here we have only the bare sum put down of £649,000. Under these circumstances, I think I am not making an unreasonable proposal when I ask the House to affirm my proposition. I wish inquiry; I call for no expression of opinion as to the policy or impolicy of repealing the paper duties, if the finances of the country were in a position to admit of their repeal. I do not wish to raise the question on the merits. All I say is, that you are not now in a position, financially speaking, to part with this important tax. I really do feel that this question of the Estimates and the expenditure, deserves much more consideration from the House than it has yet received; because the whole case of the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to rest on the hope that in future years there will be a considerable reduction of our expenditure. It hangs very much on this, that he looks forward to a time when we shall not have to spend so large an amount on our military and naval establishments. I, too, hope with my right hon. Friend, that this may be so: but I do not see in these Estimates anything that leads me to believe that this anticipation is at all likely to be realized at an early period. A great many Gentlemen, therefore, who were disposed to accept the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals with confidence and joy, trusting to the reduction of expenditure, are very likely to change their opinions on this subject, and come more nearly to the views we on this side of the House have adopted, because, however anxious to concur in the reduction of expenditure, we have not seen our way to such reductions. When the Budget was brought forward, we were told that, in consequence of the measures proposed with regard to our commercial relations with France, and especially arising out of the new treaty, we should find ourselves in such relations with our neighbours over the water, that it would soon be unnecessary to maintain these great warlike establishments; and that, on the other hand, the prosperity of the country would increase so much, owing to the growth of our trade with France, that the elasticity of our resources would soon recover, notwithstanding the reductions which had been made. I ventured to doubt that proposition at the time. But I must say that, looking at what has since taken place, looking at the state of feeling which has been engendered, the sort of distrust, I will not say that has sprung up, but which has increased from time to time as to the position and conduct of the Emperor of France—looking, at the same time, to the dissatisfaction entertained by many of our merchants and manufacturers at the arrangements which have been made—the extension of trade and the prosperity which were promised us, are not altogether so sure as we were led to expect. And the expectation of prosperity from that treaty has been, I will not say destroyed, but very much weakened. Having thus stated the object I have in view, I would just say one word as to the example and precedent set by Sir Robert Peel, so frequently referred to. When Sir Robert Peel put on the income tax it was because our system of indirect taxation was then in a very unsatisfactory condition, it was necessary to effect a reform in that system of indirect taxation, and he put on an income tax for a time to cover the experiment on indirect taxation. Now, we cannot say that our indirect taxation is in the same unsatisfactory state as in 1842; but, on the other hand, it is now our direct taxation which is in a state which requires the most careful and attentive consideration, the most tender and delicate treatment; because, if you are to improve and render it permanent, you will require time both to mature your plans and to bring them into operation. I therefore urge you, if you really wish to follow the example of Sir Robert Peel, to take the converse of his course, and keep your indirect taxation so as to enable you cautiously to put your direct taxation on a sound basis. When my right hon. Friend opposite imposed the succession duty, he had indirect taxes to fall back upon while waiting the result of his experiment. Next year we shall have to grapple seriously with the income tax, to see what can be made of it; whether it can be altered, or made more palatable, or whether it can be replaced by any other system or collection of taxes, direct or indirect. That will be a matter of time and patience; probably it will take years to bring about; and if my own wish could prevail, I should be glad to see this paper duty maintained until we have brought our direct taxes into such a state, that we can repeal it, as Sir Robert Peel proposed to deal with the income tax, when the indirect taxes had sufficiently recovered. But that is not what I ask now. All I ask at present is, that, looking to our present condition and our prospect for the next year, the House, without pronouncing any opinion condemnatory of its principle, will refuse its assent to the Bill for the present.

[Second Night.]

Sir Stafford Northcote

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That to the end of the Question in order to add the words 'the present state of the Finances of the Country renders it undesirable to proceed further with the repeal of the Excise Duty on Paper,'—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, until the close of the hon. Gentleman's speech, I was at a loss to understand precisely what his object was, and what he wishes the House to do. But if I correctly apprehend what he seeks, it is that we are not to maintain the paper duty as a permanent source of taxation, but that we are to hold it, as it were, in suspense until certain operations have been performed upon the income tax, or upon some other portions of our direc-

taxation, in order to make them satisfactory to the taxpayers of the country. I would really submit that that is not a practical proposition to put to the House. I can understand an hon. Member saying, "I decline to repeal a particular tax." I can understand an hon. Member saying, "I will vote for the repeal of such a tax," but I do not understand the course which the hon. Gentleman has taken, namely, that we are to hold this tax under a sort of sentence of death—and to keep the great industries of the country affected by it constantly under the impression that it may at any moment be repealed. If there be one course more objectionable than another it is to condemn a tax, and avow your intention of soon repealing it, and when the opportunity presents itself of carrying out the views you have expressed, to refuse to avail yourselves of it. The hon. Member has not correctly represented what passed upon the occasion some two years ago, when the Resolution was passed to which he was a party.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I was not in the House at the time.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: The hon. Baronet was a Member of the Government, and must have concurred in the course taken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not think I was in the country at the time. I certainly was neither in the House nor a Member of the Government.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Then I was mistaken in considering him a party to it; but I do not know that the point is at all material to the argument. The hon. Gentleman has not, however, correctly represented what then took place. A Resolution was moved to the effect that the paper duty ought not to be maintained as a permanent source of revenue. A second Resolution was proposed to the effect that measures ought to be taken to enable Parliament to dispense with the duty. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer—the right hon. Gentleman opposite—objected to the second Resolution, that is, to taking immediate measures for the repeal of the tax, but consented to the Resolution which condemned the tax as a permanent source of revenue. The House unanimously supported the Government in the view they took. The right hon. Gentleman said then not what the hon. Member for Stamford has related, but this—that although he was not prepared to say that the tax should be immediately repealed, he was prepared to say that it ought to be taken into early consideration. Well, Sir, what is early consideration? Two years have elapsed since that period; and it has been well explained by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that 1860 is a remarkable year, for in this year a large sum falls in from the annuities; and it has been repeatedly stated that an opportunity ought to be taken this year to give some relief from indirect taxation by the repeal of the war duties on tea or sugar or something of that kind. Why has not such a measure been proposed? [Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition.] Then you differ from the hon. Member for Stamford, for he came forward in behalf of revenue; but I understand those cheers to be, not on behalf of revenue, but on behalf of a proposal for substituting the repeal of the duty on sugar or on tea for that of the duty on paper. I really do not think this is an opportunity for raising a question of that kind—upon the third reading of the Paper Duty Bill. If you preferred a repeal of the duty on sugar or on tea, I respectfully submit that this is not the occasion when such a proposition should be addressed to the House. How do we stand? A Bill is brought forward for the repeal of the paper duty. It is read a second time in the House, after full debate, and after ample notice. The Bill passed through Committee without any material opposition. The drawbacks to be allowed to the various persons affected by the repeal of the tax are settled and arranged; and contrary, I maintain, to all precedent—after such a course as this has been taken by the House of Commons the hon. Member for Stamford comes down and asks us not to agree to the third reading of the Bill, but to hold the question in suspense; and the cheers of his friends announce to us that they now want to abandon the paper duty repeal and to substitute the repeal of the war duty on sugar. ["No, no!"] Then what am I to understand? My hon. Friend is very anxious about the Army Estimates. He says he does not understand the Clothing Vote and the Provision Vote. Well, I cannot explain them to him. I am not bound to explain them to him; but I am bound to believe that what the War Department informs the Government is the necessary vote has been considered by them. It is not for me to presume to enter into an argument with the War Department as to whether the exact sum is sufficient which has been asked for the provisions and the clothing of the army. Nor is it for me to go into the point of the expense of the collection of the public revenue, which is a Vote never taken, as I am informed, till the end of July; and therefore it will be absolutely necessary to deal with those financial measures—if you deal with them at all during the Session of Parliament—before that time. I am also surprised at the hon. Member for Stamford telling us he expected that this Bill would not be proceeded with, and that that was the reason he did not give longer notice of his Motion. Why should he expect that the Bill would not be proceeded with? This is an adjourned debate. The third reading of the Bill was moved ten days ago, and the objection then taken was not the objection we have heard to-night, but simply that it was too late in the night to proceed then with the third reading. We heard nothing then about the provisions and clothing Votes of the Army Estimates, or about the expense of collecting the public revenues. I ask the House whether it is fair to deal with a question of this magnitude in the spirit in which it is now proposed to deal with it? I ask you is there no consideration due to the important industry which is affected by the tax? Can you say that it is nothing to keep an industry, employing perhaps, considering all the subsidiary trades, some ten millions of capital, in a perpetual state of suspense as to whether this tax is to be repealed or not? I believe many contracts have already been entered into, in the full belief that the House of Commons would not retrace its steps in a tax repealing Bill; and that after the Bill had been read a second time, after full and ample discussion had taken place, and a division had followed, there was a complete conviction throughout the country that the measure would be carried into law. But if we now hang it up, if we hold it in suspense until the hon. Member for Stamford has settled the principles of his direct taxation, and has made himself thoroughly acquainted with a variety of minute details in the Estimates which at present he does not understand, I say we shall not be acting according to precedent, we shall not be acting with justice to the great industry and the great capital which are employed in the paper-making trade of the country, and we shall be striking at the root of that confidence which has hitherto always been reposed in the first decided step of the House of Commons upon questions affecting taxation. Now, Sir, we have heard a great deal of anxiety expressed about the public revenue. Nothing but a desire to take care that we do not part with too much of our income has actuated the hon. Member for Stamford in proposing his Motion to the House. But I want to know whether that desire is shared in by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Droitwich, because he voted the other night for the Bill for repealing or at least materially reducing the duty on fire insurances? Where was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire on that occasion? He may indeed have paired, but certainly if there was that excessive anxiety about our parting with income and creating a deficiency, for some future year, I think it certainly was remarkable that he should not have been in his place to protest against a course which would be so dangerous to the revenue of 1861. But let me recal to the recollection of the House the position in which we stand in regard to this Bill. Upon the second reading, the whole question was raised in connection with the income tax, upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire, (Sir W. Miles) declaring that, as the repeal of the paper duty would necessitate an addition of 1*d.* in the pound to the income tax, it was inexpedient to proceed with it at that time. The hon. Member for Stamford voted for that Resolution; he voted against the repeal of the paper duty, because it would necessitate an addition to the income tax. But the House overruled that proposition by a decisive majority, and the penny was added to the income tax—and now you turn round, and you say, contrary to the spirit of that Resolution, that, having got the income tax, you will not give us the repeal of the paper duty. I say it is a very strange and inconsistent course of proceeding to connect the penny addition to the income tax with the paper duty, and then, when the House has decided to have the additional penny and not the paper duty, to turn round and say, "We will have the 10*d.* income tax and the paper duty into the bargain." The speech of the hon. Member for Stamford is an attack upon the whole principle of the Budget of the Government. It in fact takes the finances of the country out of the hands of the Government, and lays down a totally new scheme, utterly at variance with the principles which the Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted to the House. After the speeches which were made when the Budget was submitted to the House, there can be no doubt that one of the leading features of the Budget was that there should be in the present year a certain amount of remission of indirect taxation, for the benefit of the trade and industry of the country, and that the expenditure of the country should be provided by the requisite augmentation of the income tax and the imposition of other duties for the purpose. That, in fact, was the principle of the Budget, and if you now say you will strike out so great and material a feature of the whole financial scheme as the Member for Stamford proposes, I am of opinion that you are attacking the very principle of the financial measures of the Government. But I want to ask the hon. Member for Stamford if he succeeds in maintaining the paper duty, what he will do with the law on the subject? Are the opinions of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to go for nothing? Is their deliberate report to be ignored—the report made to this House that this tax is no longer tenable, in justice to the parties affected, without legislation? The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, of their own free will, presented a report, in which they stated that it was necessary to change the mode of levying this tax, if it was to be maintained as a source of revenue. I ask hon. Gentlemen then if they are prepared to legislate upon the subject of the paper duty, and to make its application one that can be carried out with justice to the different interests affected? I cannot imagine that they can be averse to take that course, but I do most emphatically protest against a course of uncertainty, and of doubt. If you mean to maintain this duty upon paper, say so boldly, and apply it to those cases to which it ought to be applied, and which are now exempt; carry out your tax equally and justly to every branch of those industries which ought to bear it, being in competition with each other; but do not by your halting course leave all those anomalies and injustice without remedy, and expose the trade and industry of the country to a system of vexation and injustice, which, I venture to say, in the whole history of our Parliamentary proceedings, is entirely without precedent. I, for one, deny altogether that the question of the repeal of the paper duty stands upon mere financial grounds. It has never been advocated by those who have agitated for its repeal, simply as a question of a pecuniary burden. The repeal of the paper duty has been advocated upon high moral grounds, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has himself told us most emphatically, that his reason for wishing for the repeal of the paper duty was not to get rid of this pecuniary burthen when opportunity offered; but that he advocated its repeal for moral, literary, and educational considerations. Now, those are high grounds, and I say the financial view of this question is insignificant, as compared with the moral and educational view that may be entertained in reference to its bearing upon the diffusion of knowledge in this country. I hope, Sir, this House will not be induced to retrace its steps upon this important question. I believe sincerely that no measure is more thoroughly consistent with the policy of the age in which we live, than a measure for untaxing the press and the cheap literature of this country. You are voting large sums annually for the education of the people of this country. You are beset with all kinds of difficulties of a religious character in the endeavour to diffuse knowledge amongst the people. I say, then, do what in you lies, at least, to allow the people to educate themselves by taking from the books that must be the instruments for conveying knowledge—take from them the exciseman's hands and these fiscal burthens, which, most undoubtedly, do operate most materially to deteriorate the quality of your cheap literature, and to prevent the diffusion of knowledge amongst the great body of the people. You have in your Reform debates complained of the ignorance of the masses of the people, and their unfitness to exercise the franchise from their inability to form a right judgment in regard to political matters. I say you can take no course more logical or more direct towards spreading information among the people, than by repealing a tax of this description, which most undoubtedly presses most heavily upon that very literature which is to circulate amongst the masses of the people, and which is to diffuse the knowledge that you desire should be spread through the country. Sir, I will not discuss the merits of this great question; but I protest against its being placed simply upon financial grounds. But, putting it upon financial grounds, I say that the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) has made out no case why we should retrace our steps or why we should upset the financial measures of the Government. He calls upon us to admit that when the measures of the Government were introduced we committed a great and grievous error. ["Hear!"] Yes, but we cannot admit that. Neither, after the divisions that have recently taken place, do I believe the House of Commons will admit it. Nothing has transpired since those measures were brought forward to induce us to adopt a total change in our policy. I entreat hon. Gentlemen, then, on all sides to support this Bill. For myself I take an interest in it far beyond any ordinary party question, and although I should regret to see any one of the excellent financial measures of the Government interfered with, I should doubly deplore the rejection of this particular Bill, because I believe it contains within itself the germs of great moral benefit to the great mass of the community.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Mr. Milner Gibson

MR. BALL said, that having last year deemed the question of the abolition of the paper duty a proper one to be taken into consideration by the House, he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would that night have advanced some reasons why he (Mr. Ball) should continue to hold views which, he owned, the information he had since been able to obtain had tended very much to shake. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that to keep the question longer in abeyance would lead to discontent and put the paper trade in jeopardy. He (Mr. Ball) had made extensive inquiries of persons whose authority was entitled to the highest trust; and he affirmed that he had not met with a single individual interested in the paper trade who had not declared that if the proposal of the Government were agreed to it would entail almost certain ruin upon all who were engaged in the trade. It was most unfortunate, perhaps, but upon every part of the subject that the right hon. Gentleman had opened to-night he seemed to be totally in error, and his statements to be contrary to the facts. The right hon. Gentleman stated that there were ten millions of capital employed in the trade.

MR. MILNER GIBSON explained, that he merely spoke upon speculation.

MR. BALL: Then the right hon. Gentleman, considering the position which he occupied, ought not to have indulged in such speculations. He ought to have been careful how he put forth assertions which he could not sustain, presuming them to be disputed in that House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had stated that it was probable ten millions of capital was engaged in the manufacture of paper in this country, and the subsidiary trades with which it was connected.

MR. BALL: The right hon. Gentleman would excuse him for contradicting him; but it was not probable that £10,000,000 were so employed, seeing that the returns for the whole quantity of paper made gave about £6,000,000 a year. But be that as it might, it was only fair to argue that in proportion to the extent of the interest with which the House was called upon to deal did it behove them seriously to consider the results which might flow from the mode in which they were asked to legislate. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the revenue derived from paper last year was about £1,400,000, but last year's revenue surpassed the ordinary amount contributed from that source. It would be fairer to take it at £1,200,000. Was it right, however, to interfere even with that sum when the deficiency could not be supplied without the imposition of an extra penny as income tax? He contended that it was most unjust, and that the tax of a penny would take more out of the poor clerk's pocket than the value of all the paper he consumed in the course of a year. But there was another objection to the repeal of the paper duty. He had been told by persons conversant with the subject, that that repeal would tend to do material injury not only to the manufacturers themselves, but to those whom they employed. The right hon. Gentleman had not, however, informed the House to what extent he thought the operation of the Bill would be to diminish the number of those who earned their livelihood in that way. He might add that the materials from which paper was made were from 40 to 50 per cent cheaper on the Continent than in England; and it was only the extra 1*d.* per pound, between the 1½*d.* excise duty on English and the 2½*d.* customs duty on foreign paper that had hitherto enabled the English maker to compete with the foreigner. He asked, then, would it not have been wiser for the Government, when negotiating the Treaty with France, to have said—"We are giving you a great boon; you must grant us an equivalent. What is free trade for England should be free trade for France; and in framing a treaty which is designed to blend together in closer harmony and friendship these two great nations, we must have that treaty based upon principles of equity and justice; and you must allow the free exportation of rags." Moreover, the Government had not fairly considered what they owed to the poorer classes of the country. Surely it was their duty, in the first place, to have considered how our own poor were to be employed and maintained, and contentment promoted amongst them. It was all very well to say that by advancing a portion of the people to the possession of the legislative influence they would be gratified and pleased; but as soon as their bread was taken from their mouths they would inevitably show that no mere right to vote for the election of Members of this House would, in their view, be equivalent to that of which they and their families were deprived.

[Second Night.]

MR. PULLER said, the questions of the Excise duty and the Customs' duty on paper were quite distinct. Two years ago the House condemned the paper duty as a permanent source of revenue, and as the House during the present Session undertook to review the finances of the country, it was bound to abolish the Excise duty; and if the abolition of the duty caused a deficiency in the national income, that deficiency ought to be made up, either by a loan or by such a proposition as that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that a penny should be added to the income tax. The real question raised by the hon. Baronet was merely whether since the second reading of the Bill any new circumstances had arisen which ought to induce them to reconsider their decision and retain the duty? That entirely depended upon whether they had confidence in the estimate which Her Majesty's Government had formed of the expenditure of the current year. Those who believed that the sums which Her Majesty's Government had asked for would be sufficient to meet the exigencies of the public service had no alternative but to vote for the third reading. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Ball) had raised another and an altogether different question—a question well worthy of attention, but not one that they could then properly discuss, namely, the effect which the abolition of the Customs' duty would have upon the British manufacturers of paper and those whom they employed? The hon. Gentleman would see that no possible injury could accrue to the British manufacturer from the remission of the Excise duty, the mischief could obviously only arise from the abolition of the protective duty of a penny a pound now levied upon foreign paper. But the House had already affirmed the commercial treaty with France, by which this country bound itself not to place on any French article on which an Excise duty was charged a Customs duty higher than that excise. It followed, therefore, that if the paper duty of $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per lb. was maintained, they would be obliged to reduce the Customs duty from $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ to $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per lb. He trusted that the House would agree to abolish the Excise duty altogether, and then, as the article of paper would drop from the Treaty, the House would be free hereafter to impose a protective duty of a penny, which he hoped would never be given up, unless, indeed, the Government were able to obtain from France a perfectly free trade in rags.

Mr. Ball

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that the question for the House was, whether that was the proper time for the remission of the paper duty. A great deal was said about the Resolution by which the House of Commons had pledged themselves to abolish the paper duty as a source of revenue; but the Resolution did not pledge them to take it off until the Treasury was in a position to spare it. He confessed he was surprised at the course the Government had taken on that occasion, when he found what were the opinions expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite in the discussion on the hon. Member for Ashton's (Mr. M. Gibson's) Resolution in 1858. In that debate the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) said—

"He believed the object of his right hon. Friend in bringing forward this Resolution was merely to put on the records of the House the opinions of hon. Members on both sides, so that, whenever the condition of the Treasury should be such as to permit the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consent to the abolition of this tax, the right hon. Gentleman would select it as the very first for remission, and so get rid of it."

What said the right hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) on the same occasion? This,

"He objected to the Motion as first proposed by the hon. Gentleman. He agreed with him that the maintenance of the Excise on paper as a permanent source of revenue would be impolitic, but could not agree with him that such financial arrangements ought to be made as to enable Parliament to dispense with the tax."

The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, who certainly had given the hon. Gentleman no encouragement, said—

"That, when they knew that they had a surplus revenue and the means of diminishing the taxation of the country, then was the proper time to consider what, under existing circumstances, were the taxes which had the first claim to reduction."

These declarations formed one of the grounds of the surprise of the country at the determination of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to seize the present occasion to repeal this tax. He would only quote one more authority, the noble Lord the Member for the City of London—he said distinctly—

"The House would recollect that last year the then Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the income tax should be kept up at 7d. in the pound, and that instead of 1s. 3d. the duty on tea would be 1s. 6d., and that there should be a proportionate increase in the duty on sugar. This year they had allowed the income tax to fall from 7d. to 5d. in the pound, but they had kept up the duty on tea at 1s. 6d., and also retained the proportionate increase in the duty on sugar. It was therefore almost a matter of good faith when next there was a reduction in taxation, that the duties on tea and sugar should be reduced, which were in fact war duties, and there could be no greater claim for reduction of taxation than in those articles of consumption which entered so largely into the comforts of the people."

Was this, then, the proper time for taking off the paper duty, when there was not only a deficit, but when that deficit was being increased by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and when, too, he was reimposing the duties on tea and sugar, and was not only maintaining, but increasing the income tax? The fact was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to rejoice if the Bill were rejected, as its rejection would leave him in possession of funds which he could not afford to lose; and as the income tax had been imposed, should the paper duty be retained, he could only congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having that amount to meet any difficulties that might arise. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton expressed his surprise that they should object to the Bill on the third reading. Surely he had been long enough in the House to know that they had a right to dispute a measure at every stage, on the first and second reading, on going into Committee, and on the third reading. Since the period when the Budget and the Commercial Treaty were brought forward, the feeling of the country had materially changed. The people had seen that there was not the desire supposed to exist, on the part of a neighbouring country, to meet the free-trade proposals of the Government. Under these circumstances, it might be fairly argued that the House ought not to press the passing of the Bill. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had been taunted, he thought unfairly, in relation to the question of fire insurance, for having stated last year as a Minister of the Crown the course which he felt it his duty to adopt with regard to it. He himself was in favour of a reduction of that duty, but he had not voted on the question either last year or during the present Session, as he did not wish his motives to be misinterpreted. He was extremely glad the hon. Member for Stamford had brought forward the question, and he hoped the House would declare its opinion that it was unwise to sacrifice revenue amounting to £1,300,000 when a great deficiency existed in the present year, and it had been shown that the deficit for next could not be less than £12,000,000.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he differed in opinion from the hon. Member who had last addressed the House, and who, he thought, had somewhat wandered from the issue before the House—namely, that without further financial explanations from the Government, it would be imprudent on the part of the House to assent to the third reading of the Bill. The principle of the Bill had been decided on on the second reading, and consequently they were not then in a position to dispute the propriety of repealing a tax that the House had already declared ought not to form a permanent source of revenue. The point raised by the hon. Baronet, the Member for Stamford, and upon which he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would afford some information was, that inasmuch as the House would probably be called on to adopt larger Estimates than were at first contemplated, and as the last of these Estimates had not yet been presented, it was desirable, before so large an amount of revenue was parted with, that the House should be in a position to arrive at a just conclusion. In this view he entirely concurred; and though it might be said that the increased amount of the Estimates would not absorb the entire of the available surplus, there were other questions looming in the future, as to which they ought to have some information. It was stated, for instance, that the Government intended to propose certain plans of fortification: and it would be well that the House should be in possession of the fact, before coming to any definite Resolution, involving such an extensive sacrifice of revenue as they were now asked to make. He differed from those who thought that an income tax ought not now to be imposed, with a view of removing other kinds of taxation, for the principle had been already adopted. The sole question was, whether sufficient provision had been made for the additional expenses to be incurred. He did not find fault with the Government for not having produced these additional estimates; for, in the position in which they found themselves at the opening of the Session, they had no choice as to the manner in which they should introduce the financial details; and he believed it was customary for Chancellors of the Exchequer to bring in towards the close of the Session a supplementary estimate, embracing all additional and miscellaneous charges. He differed from the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Puller), who thought that the Excise and Customs' duties were not intimately connected; on the contrary, they were so intimately related, that he could not conceive how any hon. Member could vote with respect to the one, without anticipating that he would be called on to vote in similar sense on the other. And, therefore, he thought himself justified in assuming that the decision that night would virtually decide the question on Monday, as all who now supported the Government would vote against him on the future occasion. He was not surprised that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. M. Gibson) should take credit to himself for having brought the question to an issue; for it was he who, by an argument of great ability, induced the House, two years ago, to agree to the Resolution which had placed the paper duty in its present anomalous position. But that position had existed ever since; and he did not see that any great injury would result from the postponement of its final decision till next year; the House, in so doing, would be acting in strict accordance with the principle which had guided them since that Resolution was passed. The capital of £10,000,000, alleged to be vested in the manufacture of paper, would remain in exactly the same position it had occupied during that interval. He could see a clear distinction between the reduction of Customs' duties, and the present case. In the former, the House proceeded by way of Resolution, and pledged itself to take off or reduce certain charges; but with respect to duty imposed in accordance with an Act of Parliament, its repeal was not accomplished until all the successive stages had been gone through; and nobody had a right to complain, if in any of these the Bill for effecting that object was defeated. He by no means contemplated the permanent retention of the paper duty, against which many reasons could be assigned, especially its harsh operation in the case of literary men, and of certain commercial interests; but he believed the injury which it entailed was very much exaggerated. There was no tax which was absolutely free from objection; and in every instance it was a question of comparison as to the least objectionable mode by which the Exchequer could be supplied. In support of the paper duty, it might be urged that it was of long standing, having existed ever since the time of Queen Anne, and that interests had grown up under it and become accustomed to it; while duties more recently imposed had interfered with existing interests, and ran more directly counter to the ideas and habits of the people. Unless, therefore, some fuller explanation were afforded than had yet been given, and unless fears, which were not unreasonably entertained, were more satisfactorily allayed than had hitherto been the case, it would be an act of imprudence in the House to part at such a moment with so large a portion of the revenue.

[Second Night.]

Mr ELLICE (Coventry): Sir, I wish to explain to the House in a few words why most reluctantly I shall feel obliged to vote against the third reading of this Bill. I do not come to that determination on any of the narrow grounds I have heard stated since I came into the House, but upon the general view I take of the resources and revenue of the country, which I think are placed in considerable jeopardy by my right hon. Friend's Budget for this year. In the few remarks I made at the beginning of these discussions I described the Budget as being in my opinion an ambitious Budget, and the experience I have acquired of it since only confirms that opinion. I have sat in this House the greater part of half a century, during which time I have paid some attention to the financial condition of the country, and this is the first instance within my recollection when a Chancellor of the Exchequer has come down asking us to repeal certain taxes connected with the permanent revenue of the country, at the same time admitting that he leaves a deficiency, to be supplied by new taxes in the ensuing year, of somewhere about £10,000,000 or

Lord Harry Vane

£12,000,000. I do not know that any Gentleman in this House can furnish a similar precedent. It is a course full of danger, and it is full of inconvenience; for at the beginning of the next Session we shall be launched into exactly the same discussions which now prevent us from proceeding with the ordinary business of the nation. If it should turn out that some of the great measures of this Session do not succeed or are not carried we must recommence our discussions upon them in the beginning of another Session, and at the same time we shall have to provide the means, which will be then very much more disputed than now, of supplying the deficiency of £10,000,000 or £12,000,000. Again, we have no security that the sums asked from us on account of the Estimates constitute the whole expenditure which we shall be called upon to provide for the service of the year. I have the greatest misgivings with respect to the Vote for the China expedition. As to that item, we must be guided not only by the actual Estimates before us, but by what our own judgment suggests as to the probable expenditure we may be called on to face. With respect to the tax which we are now discussing, I have not a word to say in its defence. It is about as odious a tax as one can well imagine. It is not only a tax which interferes, as all Excise taxes do, with an important branch of manufacture—being almost the only tax of that description now left in our fiscal system—but it also impedes the circulation of information and of knowledge. Upon all these grounds no man is more disposed to repeal this tax, whenever we can do so without robbing the Exchequer. But when we are called on to repeal it at the risk of leaving a large deficit, or when we are called on to impose other taxes equally odious to the people, I think we should wait until some more favourable time presents itself. It is upon these, and upon no mere narrow grounds, that I object to the repeal of this tax. Another reason why we should suspend our judgment is this:—My right hon. Friend proposes other taxes which have not yet passed the House. Some of them are objected to by various classes of persons who will be affected by them. For instance, the mercantile classes object to the petty taxes which are to be imposed upon trade. It is true we remit duties on consumption, but we impose petty, vexatious, shackles on trade, such as 2d. or 3d. on removing packages, which are not imposed on the commerce of Hamburg, Belgium, Holland, America, or of any other country in the world. It is the first time in the history of the country that such vexatious taxes were imposed. I feel strongly the objections to such imposts, and it is therefore not quite clear to my mind that others may not object too, and that my right hon. Friend may not experience some difficulty in carrying them. At all events, I think it will be better to wait until they are carried before we proceed to remit other duties. Though greatly indisposed therefore to do anything in the least opposed to the measures of the Government, I feel obliged in my conscience to vote against the third reading of this Bill.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that if he had voted upon the second reading of the Bill, he should have voted in its favour, because he had at that time believed that it would afford a considerable relief to the paper manufacturers, and that it would lead to an important reduction in the price of paper. But everything that had since passed, both abroad and at home, upon that subject, convinced him that that expectation was but a delusion. He believed that the measure would not be productive of the advantages he had at one time anticipated, and he should, therefore, vote against the third reading. He felt convinced, too, that the Estimate of the Government on account of the Chinese war would be found utterly insufficient, and with that conviction he could not, without some overpowering reason, such as did not, he believed, exist in that case, consent to the extinction of a large amount of revenue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I must frankly admit that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) does found his opposition to the third reading of this Bill upon no narrow grounds. I might, indeed, question the correctness of some portion of those grounds as matters of fact. He complains of the Government because they are proposing the imposition of a number of new taxes upon trade which have not yet received the sanction of this House, which may therefore be uncertain as to their fate, and with respect to which it is desirable that we should know whether they are to be adopted before we surrender revenue. My right hon. Friend says he has attended the debates of this House for nearly half a century, and it is, perhaps, no wonder, therefore, that he has become so weary of hearing them ; that the taxes of which he speaks have been debated by the House, and, with an insignificant exception, have received its deliberate approval without his knowledge. Therefore, as regards that part of my right hon. Friend's statement, if it has materially affected his judgment on the immediate question before us, I can only regret that a voice so authoritative should have been guided or misguided, as the case may be, by considerations so entirely erroneous. As to my right hon. Friend's larger allegations and criticisms on the general policy of the Government scheme of finance, I must point out to him that he has spoken somewhat late. His statement, which resumes and sums up, in fact, the most prominent objections urged against the financial plans of the Government as a whole, would have been extremely important if it had proceeded from his mouth, with his authority, some two or three months ago, and would then have, at least, been in place and in time. At present, I hardly know what purpose it can answer beyond that of eliciting warm expressions of approval from that portion of the House which finds a large amount of sympathy in a quarter where sympathy with them was not previously known to exist. But I must submit to my right hon. Friend that it is too late to discuss these matters now. ["No, no."] With great respect I must decline to follow my right hon. Friend into the mere enunciation of counter-statements which it would be perfectly easy for us to make, or into that very minute examination, and, as I think, that not very difficult refutation, of his opinions, which would, in point of fact, involve the repetition of our principal debates for the last three months. I beg to state to the House what I conceive not to be the question now at issue. We are not debating the general principles of the financial plans of the Government, and I venture to tell my right hon. Friend that if he really has entertained these sinister and dismal apprehensions, it might have been better either to have uttered them in their full force at the time when they might have operated on the decision of Parliament, or possibly to have kept them to himself. The time, Sir, has passed by when the decision of Parliament can be governed by these prophecies, because in the main, as I shall endeavour to show to the House, the principal questions raised by them are already decided. I do not ask your assent

[Second Night.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

to that proposition just now, but I will attempt presently to show that it is a sound and correct proposition. We are not discussing to-night the question whether it would have been wiser on the part of the Government to have refrained from proposing a repeal of the paper duty, which was to be made up by an additional penny of income-tax, because that additional penny has already become law, and has, at the moment I am speaking, been levied from many of Her Majesty's subjects, and a large party in this House opposed to the policy of the Government has, by its deliberate vote, in its own self-chosen language, sent forth to the country that the proposition of a tenth of the income-tax and the repeal of the paper duty were correlatives the one to the other, and inseparably united. That has been declared by the Motion of the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles), and supported generally by the party opposite. Neither are we discussing the question whether the Government would have done better to have proposed the reduction of the duties on tea and sugar rather than of that on paper, because we have seen that while it has been argued that at any rate it would have been a preferable change, yet there has been no serious intention of recommending a change of that sort, or it would have been submitted to the House in the shape of a formal Motion. Neither are we discussing the question whether a protective duty of a penny per lb. is to be maintained upon foreign paper in consideration of the legislation of foreign countries. I think, Sir, I may venture to assure my noble Friend who lately addressed the House (Lord Harry Vane), that, as far as argument at least, the two questions of the duty to be imposed upon the importation of paper from abroad and the question of the retention of the Excise duty on paper at home are entirely distinct. He may say if he pleases, and he has a right to do so, that the same inclination which led a majority of the House to vote for the one may lead them to vote for the other ; but, in truth, the two things are quite distinct. Neither at this stage do I propose to re-argue the general question of the repeal of the duty on paper. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry has not gone further than to say that a more odious tax than that for the retention of which he argued could not be conceived. And this most odious tax he desires to retain after the House has given to the Exchequer the equivalent which was stipulated for when the repeal of the duty was proposed. I do not re-argue the general grounds against the tax. I merely recite them. Among them, were, of course, the general objections to Excise duties upon what is called a legitimate and unexceptionable manufacture. Prominently among them are the uncertainty and inequality of the present law, which have led the responsible Department to report that "It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that we are levying a duty upon A while we allow B to send out goods precisely similar in nature without any interference from the revenue officers."

So that according to the opinions of those who are most competent to speak upon the subject it is not possible to go on longer as we are, and if the duty is not repealed there remains for Parliament the doubly odious task of new vexatious and restrictive legislation. Another and a less weighty ground is the Resolution of this House, and I hope that hon. Gentlemen who voted for that Resolution, meaning, apparently, nothing by it, will derive from that vote a salutary lesson for the future, when they see what effect such a vote produces in weakening the hands of those whose duty it is to maintain and enforce the law. My right hon. Friend has said that this duty is a tax on literature and education, and, as such it has long stood in evil odour in this House. And observe, the effect of it is to confine within narrow limits the whole manufacture from fibrous substances, which it is reasonable to expect, if the shackles of the law are removed, may become the basis of a trade vastly multiplied, and which will contribute to the general prosperity of the country in a degree far beyond the measure of tribute which it now supplies to the revenue. My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote) stated the case not unfairly. I understood him to take as his ground, not the general proposition that the financial policy of the Government ought ab initio to have been rejected, but that since the House had adopted the principle of the repeal of the paper duty such changes had taken place in the prospects of our expenditure as imposes upon us the duty and obligation of withholding the relief we had promised in respect of this particular item of finance. The state of our expenditure and the probable demands upon the public purse were declared by the Government at the commencement of the Session, and it requires no declaration from the Government to show that it contained some element of uncertainty, because we had undertaken to send, in conformity with what was our duty and honour a costly expedition to one of the remotest countries of the globe, with respect to which the cost must necessarily depend much upon circumstances attending the despatch of that expedition and the course of political affairs which might follow its departure and arrival. I never disguised this, nor do I now, that there is a degree of uncertainty affecting the expenditure of the present financial year, and probably that of future years. That is not a matter that is new to the House, but one which it had in view when it assented to our financial propositions and gave them its sanction and approval. And although the precise amount of that expenditure has received some degree of modification—the precise amount we are not able to say—yet there has been no such change as would justify us in altering the financial propositions which we submitted to the House. It is still a case of uncertainty, I admit, but still it is substantially the same case of uncertainty upon which the House gave its vote in the months of February and March. Now I come to the specific case upon which my hon. Friend rests. He said there was a change in the estimates for the collection of the revenue, and he intimated that there would be a similar change in the estimates for the miscellaneous services, although those changes would not involve any increase of charge. I think my hon. Friend will see, although he may be perfectly right in principle, when he says a material change in the probable charge of the country will justify a corresponding change in your intentions with regard to the provisions for it, that there is no such material change at this moment, as will justify his Motion. He says that several military Votes have been altered. It is true, and when we come to discuss those estimates a good reason for the alteration will, I am sure, be given, and the hon. Baronet knows well that a state of accounts involving such large sums between the Governments of India and of England is necessarily a disturbing cause, which from time to time tends to vary Estimates and to modify charges on either side. The Estimates as presented by my right hon. Friend he is prepared to stand by; and the House will, I think, admit that he is not in the habit of presenting Estimates got up to meet the incidence of an immediate charge and then relying upon supplementary estimates to carry him through the year. Of course I did not understand that any offensive charge was made against us; and all I mean to say is—that the Estimates now presented in respect to the Votes to which the hon. Baronet alluded—namely, the clothing, provisions, and stores—will be defended by my right hon. Friend, and they must be understood to represent the mature convictions and the latest information of the department over which he presides. My hon. Friend adverted to the Vote for fortifications, and asked for details. Undoubtedly, nothing can be more reasonable than that the House should be informed as to the details of that Vote; but the House and the Government are essentially in the same predicament, inasmuch as while it is known to them both that a special body has been appointed for the purpose of considering the important questions connected with the defences of the country, the Report of that body, embodying the recommendations which it may think fit to make to the Government, is not yet in the hands of the Cabinet for its consideration. What course, then, has been taken by the Government under the circumstances? Why, this; they have submitted to the House necessarily a sum without details, which remains in a great degree unfixed, but, at any rate, a sum which is much more than the Vote of last year, or, indeed, of any preceding year, for the purpose of fortifications. But that matter stands precisely now as it did at the time when the House arrived at the decision which it is now asked to retract. I come now to the third head—that of the Miscellaneous Estimates, which my hon. Friend anticipated would be increased to £7,772,000; but that is sheer anticipation. I think I may venture to assure him that that is an inaccurate estimate, and that the charge for the Miscellaneous Estimates will approximate nearly to the figure at which I originally stated it. I will not say there will not be a variation of some £20,000 or £30,000, because my hon. Friend knows that in the course of public business there are always some items of these Estimates unsettled at this period of the year, but substantially that charge will correspond with my former Estimate. Then there remains the charge for the collection of the revenue; and, with respect to that, there is something in what has been stated by my hon. Friend, because, owing to the early period at which the Estimates were proposed, they were stated at a lower figure than that at which it was afterwards thought prudent to fix them. But it is impossible for me to state even now in what degree that change in the figure is likely to represent a real increase of expenditure, because, as my hon. Friend knows, important alterations are contemplated in reference to the revenue establishments and the collection of the taxes, and at present it would be impossible for me to say in what degree any changes that may be made in that sense may affect the Estimate; but even if the whole of the difference my hon. Friend anticipates were to be represented by a real expenditure—that difference being above £200,000—although it may constitute a change in the circumstances since the Budget was proposed, yet constitutes no change of a nature or magnitude that would justify us in stopping the course of a measure which involves a revenue of five or six times that amount. So far, therefore, as regards change in circumstances since the period when the financial statement was submitted to the House, there is nothing that would justify the Government in making new financial proposals to Parliament. But even that is not the whole of the question before us; and I entreat the House, before coming to the vote of to-night, to consider what its meaning and bearing really are. The third reading of a Bill is now contested, and you are, in circuitous and vague terms, but still with no doubt as to the practical object, invited to reject that Bill on the adjourned debate on this its very last stage, the object of that Bill being to repeal a duty which involves a large amount of revenue, and a trade producing many millions worth of goods every year. I intreat the House to consider what is really involved in that proposal. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) says he has sat in this House for nearly half a century, and I ask him if he has ever known such a vote given as that in which he is going to join to-night. If any other hon. Gentleman has known it, let us have the precedent. Has my right hon. Friend, I repeat, ever known a case in which the repeal of a tax affecting trade, deliberately proposed by an executive Government as part, and a fundamental part, of its financial propositions for the year, long debated in the House of Commons, variously discussed on both sides, and deliberately affirmed by a large majority—I say has he ever known a case in the half century of his experience in which, at the last moment, on the Motion for the third reading of a Bill, the House of Commons has interfered and arrested the boon on its way to the people? What does this involve? I am appealing to hon. Gentlemen conversant with trade and taxation, and I ask them what is the effect that is uniformly produced on the House and the country when the repeal of a tax upon trade is announced by the authority of the Queen's Government, and is accepted by the higher authority of this House? I state without the slightest fear of contradiction, that such an arrangement, when so announced, is almost uniformly taken for granted as a thing accomplished. ["No, no!"] These are surely matters for a free expression of opinion, and I state it as my opinion that even upon the announcement by the Queen's Government of the repeal of a tax on trade, that repeal is usually taken for granted. But what I insist upon is this—and here I challenge contradiction in any form—that, without exception, when such a remission of taxation has been proposed by the authority of the Government and accepted by a deliberate vote of the House of Commons it is from that time regarded by every person concerned as if it were already the law of the land. Is there an exception to that? Can my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) furnish me with an exception? Let us recollect what this matter really is. The business of the Queen's Government is to make demands on the House of Commons for the sums necessary to carry forward the public service, and to suggest the means by which those charges are to be met. But this power of altering the taxes of the country is one of the greatest, most important, and most vital parts of the whole functions of the House of Commons; and what I now wish to bring to the particular notice of the House is that there is no instance of the correction of a deliberate vote of this kind. Directly the remission of a tax is announced by the Government and accepted by the House of Commons every description of trading arrangements begin to be made by those who are affected by the tax. Those who intend, when you remove a tax of excise, to create new establishments—and, in this case, to erect new mills—begin to make their arrangements—those who intend to import from abroad begin to make their arrangements to import from abroad—those who intend to make arrangements to dispose of a valuable stock, commence their arrangements for disposing of that valuable stock; the whole operations of that trade are, in point of fact, dependent on the vote of the House of Commons; and when the House has deliberately given that vote I say it is always and without exception regarded as the definitive and authoritative expression of its opinion. I think my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) must be led to consider whether, even for the purpose of retaining the paper duty, it would be worth while to give such a shock to public confidence as the new course of practice now recommended could not fail to give. During the half century of my right hon. Friend's experience you have at intervals repealed from £40,000,000 to £50,000,000 of taxes, and in every one of these instances the first affirmation of the House has been accepted by the country, and are we now going to break up the traditions of the House, and destroy that confidence which the country has ever felt in its declarations relative to taxation? The hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Mr. Fuller) says we have not lost our right to vote against the Second Reading of a Financial Bill because the principle of it has been affirmed in a preliminary Committee, nor to object to the Third Reading because it has passed through Committee. Certainly not. No person asserts that either the individual Members of Parliament in this House have lost their right to do what they please in the matter. I am not questioning the right of the House of Commons, but addressing arguments to its sense of fairness, and to that disposition which the House almost uniformly shows to paying regard to its own traditions, and to fulfil those expectations with regard to financial changes which the previous proceedings of Parliament has raised in the country. I know not in what way an executive Government would be able to meet the allegations of parties who, building upon an unbroken course of practice, had made arrangements which were subsequently interfered with. I must also say that I do not think that, even in a financial point of view, you can effectually reanimate the paper duty. You have gone too far. Your own deliberate and unanimous Resolution, sanctioned by the Members of the Government of that day, in

[Second Night.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

[Second Night.]

whose recollection it seems now to dwell somewhat lightly—the consequent announcements of your own confidential servants, whose business it is to collect the revenue—the proceedings you have this year taken, and the voice of your own majority would have this effect, that even if you persuaded the House to reverse its vote—which I think you cannot do—you would only bring back the trade to a paralyzed existence. You would check the manufacture, you would proscribe all enterprise, and you would only half obtain the fiscal objects which you contemplate, while no small loss and suffering would be the consequence of your having disappointed the just expectations that you had raised. But these considerations are apart from the important merits of the general question that has almost posthumously been raised by my right hon. Friend, and from the merits of the other important question whether the Government judged wisely or not wisely in proposing the repeal of the paper duty. What I submit is that it is above all things necessary in matters relating to taxation that the people of this country should know when the voice of Parliament has been uttered. The practice of forty years has exhibited a system of uniform conduct in this respect, under which you have given a promise to the country that I do think it would be neither wise nor just to recall; and I do not hesitate to express my individual opinion, that if we were about to be, I will not say involved in war, but to be placed in circumstances that would demand of us additional charges, it would be better that the Government, having arrived at this point, should propose some other appliances, and ask the House to find the means in some other way, rather than counsel the House to do that which would be regarded as nothing more nor less than the breach of a legislative promise. I feel confident that the majority of the House retains the opinion which it expressed on the Second Reading of the Bill. I also feel confident that even some of those who doubted the merits of the measure when it was introduced will not doubt now, when the question is whether the House will or will not fulfil a solemn pledge that it has given to the country.

MR. T. BARING:—I trust the House will allow me to state that I for one do not concur in the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the operation of this measure on the trade in paper or subscribe to the principle he has laid down that every removal or every reduction of a duty proposed by the Government is to be considered almost by consent as imperative. In 1852 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire proposed, on the part of the first Government of the Earl of Derby, a reduction of the duty on tea, but the House rejected that Budget entirely. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that because the Government proposes a reduction of duty, such is the prestige and importance attached to the proposal that all transactions of trade in the particular commodity affected by it are brought to an end, and that a rejection of the proposal by this House cannot be carried into effect without inflicting serious and fatal injury on that trade? I ask the right hon. Gentleman is he sure that in consequence of his proposal for the removal of the Excise duty on paper there has been such an extension of projects for the manufacture of that commodity as he seems to suppose? Does he mean to say that the paper manufacturers are in favour of his measure if that measure be coupled with a reduction of the duty on foreign paper, without any compensating reduction of duty on the import of the raw material? So far as I can gather the opinion of the paper manufacturers, they would rather have the duty on paper remain if its repeal is to be accompanied by a reduction of the duty on foreign paper without any corresponding reduction on the import of rags. The right hon. Gentleman says it will be a breach of faith not to carry out this proposal. But I think it is but too probable that if it be carried out English capital will be carried away to be embarked in paper manufacture abroad, when proof will be given of the right hon. Gentleman's mistake in thinking that the rejection of this Bill on the third reading would inflict injury on the trade. The right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that when a Resolution is carried in this House with reference to an import duty on a foreign product commerce relies on that Resolution being formally passed, because it affects the duty on the import of the commodity; but when a Resolution of the House affects the manufacturing industry of this country it is a very different thing. I agree with the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), that it is better to remove Excise duties if we can, but that of all Excise duties that on paper is the least injurious to the production of manufactures, the least hurtful, the least preventive to inventions and the introduction of new materials. But we are not now considering whether Excise duties are or are not hurtful, nor whether the removal of the paper duty might or might not benefit the manufacturers and extend the trade of the country. We are not now even considering whether it is better to repeal this duty or those that press more heavily on the labouring classes; but we are considering whether, looking to the future, and, looking to the uncertainties of expense, and to what may happen next year with, perhaps, another Parliament—at any rate, with a great deficiency, we should now remove a source of revenue which now exists without great pressure on the productive powers of this country and without great injury to the manufacturing classes or detriment to the consuming classes, and which may be wanted, and, I believe, is now wanted, but which, at all events, this House would be unwise to part with. For a Government to refuse this proposition on the part of an Opposition was most extraordinary. We have heard in old times of "Her Majesty's Opposition," but this appears to be "the Government Opposition," which grants the Government £1,200,000, and places right hon. Gentlemen opposite in the happy situation of perhaps avoiding a deficiency, or at least secures to this country its power to meet future contingencies, and to maintain public faith.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. DISRAELI : Sir, I should be quite content that this Debate should close with the able speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), had it not been for references repeatedly made to me, not only to-night, but on a former occasion by the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the conduct I pursued in reference to this tax two years ago; and I do not think it becoming to myself or to the House to remain silent, when the right hon. Gentleman has spoken under an entire misapprehension of what took place on that occasion. With respect to the question generally, as moved by way of Amendment, it appears to me that a very simple issue is raised; and when we strip it of all the envelopment which has been thrown around it by the rhetorical dexterity of the right hon. Gentleman, we have before us only one point to consider, and of all points in the world one the most entitled to the grave and earnest consideration of the House of Commons. Sir, the Government, from one peculiar circumstance on which we need not now dwell, had this year to make their financial statement at an unusually early period, when we were not and when we could not be in possession of the results of the financial year; and the propositions of the Government were of a very extensive and singularly complicated character. Well, the consequences of these circumstances was a result, which the right hon. Gentleman has admitted, that there were necessarily in the statements made what the right hon. Gentleman has happily and fairly described as elements of uncertainty; and it is because we are now in the middle of the Parliamentary Session, and because those elements of uncertainty have to a certain degree been developed, and because there is a prospect of a still further development of them, ending in an issue not in harmony with the calculations and estimates of the right hon. Gentleman, that my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford takes this opportunity, when the House is called upon to sanction a further remission of revenue, to advise you to re-consider your position and see whether you are justified in taking the step which the Government counsels you to pursue. I listened with great attention to the right hon. Gentleman to see how he would answer the objections urged both with moderation and modesty by my hon. Friend. In the first place my hon. Friend says that we are not yet in possession of all the Estimates of the Government, but that, nevertheless, we have already had one estimate which exceeds the calculation made at the beginning of the year by a sum considerably above £200,000; and as the Government calculated only on a surplus for the whole year of £400,000; therefore, more than half this surplus has already disappeared. I have not heard any denial of the accuracy of that statement. My hon. Friend as well as the right hon. Member for Coventry, with all the authority the latter Gentleman so justly possesses in this House, called our attention to the Vote of credit for China. Was the answer of the right hon. Gentleman on that point satisfactory? So far as I could follow the ambiguous though adroit phraseology of the right hon. Gentleman, I understand that he is in possession of evidence at this moment to the effect that the estimate this year has been exceeded. Then what has become of that surplus revenue calculated on at the beginning of the year? The right hon. Member for Coventry, following up with more detail the intimation made by my hon. Friend, appears to have excited great indignation on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because that right hon. Member succeeded in showing that some of the taxes which the Chancellor of the Exchequer counted on, and which were framed, if not with the intention, at all events with the effect, of greatly vexing and embarrassing the trade of the country, would probably fail in producing the anticipated amount of revenue, and might not even receive the sanction of the House. What was the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? The House cannot have forgotten the dignified reproof the Chancellor of the Exchequer administered to the right hon. Member for Coventry. Undismayed by the experience of half a century, which we all acknowledge and which he shows in our Debates when ever he rises, the Chancellor of the Exchequer positively gave him a lecture, for not being aware that all these measures had already received the sanction of the House. Is that so? I have watched the progress of these measures, not with the authority of a Gentleman who has sat here for fifty years, but with a sense of the responsibility attaching to my position in this House, and I have observed that the charges on the various operations in warehousing, such as "tapping, reguaging, bottling," &c., which were announced in the Budget, and which stood on the Motion paper of the House for a considerable time, have disappeared from that paper. I have made, not a public inquiry, but an inquiry, I believe, at an authentic quarter in this House, and I shall be greatly misled, if those measures will ever reappear. They are dropped. There was an estimate, when the financial statement was made, that these particular measures would produce £130,000. To that add the sum of £230,000 in excess, occasioned by the collection of the revenue, and the unknown but certain excess on the China Vote, and we shall soon be arriving at the amount of this very tax, the remission of which is under our consideration. For I must remind the House that, though this tax produces a revenue of more than £1,200,000 a year, and is increasing in amount, yet, so far as the financial year is concerned, the amount which it will give to the Chancellor of the Exchequer will only be

[Second Night.

Mr. Disraeli

£1,000,000; and the items to which I have already alluded approach to an amount something exceeding two-thirds of that sum. But a very important element is still to be noticed, and that is the subject of fortifications. My hon. Friend, the Member for Stamford, very properly called the attention of the House to that matter, which is no longer a rumour, but an understanding sanctioned by an announcement from Ministers to the effect that the question of the fortification of this country on a great and costly scale, has been under the consideration of a Committee; and the Report of that Committee has, I understand, been made to the Government. At any rate, there is a general impression that the Report, when made, will be acted upon. No denial has been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that head. The right hon. Gentleman evaded the question, by merely saying that the Report is not yet submitted to the Cabinet; but he offered no defence against the grave and sensible objection made on the possible resulting expense. He said there was an item for fortification in the Army Estimates of £640,000, without the usual specification in detail; and then he conveyed to the House the impression—indeed, he more than conveyed an impression—I might say he made the statement, that if the great expenditure on account of fortification to the amount of £10,000,000 were decided on, it would be minus, at all events, the sum already included in the Army Estimates. But the House will, I am sure, recollect—the words are yet ringing in our ears—that the Secretary for War answered my specific inquiry in the most frank and unambiguous manner, that that latter Vote was in no way connected with any future plan for the general fortification of the country, but only for that portion still in hand. Therefore, on those points connected with the finances of the country, the right hon. Gentleman has totally evaded the objections that have been urged, or has practically admitted their justice. One word upon this particular tax under discussion. The President of the Board of Trade has appealed to me to support this Bill, upon the grounds which I expressed some years ago, and more than once expressed in favour of the Repeal of the Paper Duty. He says that the financial views of my hon. Friend, the Member for Stamford, are not to be entertained; that my views are of a higher character, and that I take the moral, literary, and educational view of this matter. To consider the matter in this view, is, in his opinion, to take the high view of it; to consider it in a financial point of view, and with reference to the national revenue, is a low view. Now, I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, because moral, literary, and educational progress, is entirely dependent upon the state of the country; and if the finances of a country are in disorder, if its general prosperity ceases, then, depend upon it, that intellectual progress, to which he refers, must cease also; and the efforts which multitudes make to educate themselves, must vanish as a dream. And when the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, who ought to understand what important considerations are involved in the state of the finances of a country, decries that view of policy as low, which only aspires to keep the revenues of a country in a healthy and satisfactory condition, I say that a sound state of the public revenue and expenditure is the only foundation upon which you can build up those plans for the amelioration of the people, to which I should be most happy if it were in my power to contribute. The President of the Board of Trade, says my hon. Friend, is unreasonable, because we have got the income tax; and now my hon. Friend wants to have the paper duty, too. The right hon. Gentleman says we are bound by the tenth penny of the income tax to remit the paper duty. But does the right hon. Gentleman mean to maintain that we ought to remit the paper duty, whether we can afford it or not? Because that is the question. "But then," says the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "remember the Resolution you sanctioned two years ago with reference to this tax. Your mouth is closed by that Resolution." Now, Sir, if that Resolution were more precise and explicit than it is, I should still consider my liability to support it at the present moment with reference only to the present financial condition of the country. But what was this Resolution so frequently referred to and misrepresented by the right hon. Gentleman? I am not surprised if hon. Gentlemen do not remember it, especially considering the fallacious manner in which it has been adverted to. The stream of public affairs is too rapid to permit these matters to be remembered, and only those who are responsible for them can recall particular acts and the motives by which they are actuated. That

Motion which declared that the paper duty ought not to be a permanent branch of revenue really meant nothing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk said at the time. What were the circumstances under which that Resolution was brought forward? It was brought forward after the financial statement of the year had been made. In that financial statement I proposed, on behalf of my Colleagues, a policy which the House entirely and unanimously approved and sanctioned, and no one more cordially than the present Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that it was the bounden duty of this House, although at great sacrifices, to fulfil the compact that had been made in 1853 by the right hon. Gentleman himself, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the entire abolition, if possible, in the year 1860 of the income tax. I expressed on the part of my Colleagues, with the entire concurrence of both sides of the House, our desire to remit the war duties on tea and sugar. We gave reasons, however, which were unanimously approved of by the House why we could not do so, and we showed that the first thing a Finance Minister had to do was so to guide the revenue and expenditure as to get rid of the income tax in 1860, and thus to complete and consummate the financial policy of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. If that was the policy of the then Government, approved of by their political opponents, how could it be supposed that when two or three weeks afterwards we came to consider the paper duty, that policy could be supposed to be upset by a Resolution of that kind? Such a Resolution only meant that when the war duties on tea and sugar were removed and the other obligations of Parliament were fulfilled, then, if the opportunity were afforded and the state of the revenue permitted, this Excise duty should be remitted. I admit that I should have been most happy to remit it when the state of the revenue permitted. I had always been in favour of repealing Excise duties, on the ground that they interfered with the national industry, and I should have been delighted to repeal this particular Excise duty, the remission of which was recommended to me by considerations of moral influence that I highly esteemed. That is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman. What, then, is the state of affairs now? Has the income tax terminated in this year, 1860? Have the war duties on tea and sugar been abolished? The right hon. Gentleman is now responsible for the finances of this country. He has doubled the income tax; he has retained the war duties on tea and sugar; and then he turns round upon me, and says I called for the abolition of the duty on paper! Why, anything more illogical or inconsequent, any plea more futile or fallacious, was never put forward. But I am told that we are not justified in pursuing the course proposed by my hon. Friend. Of late years I have doubted whether we have not been dealing with the forms of this House too lightly, and whether we paid them that veneration and attention which our predecessors thought it wise to give. But I did not expect to hear a Minister of the Crown rise and make a speech which, if it had any meaning, would imply that the forms of the House are entirely abolished on all questions of finance, and on all proposals to levy taxes—the subjects which most interest the country, and which are the main and principal reason for our sitting here as their representatives. Why, Sir, suppose a war should occur during some fantastical financial proposition, in which a tax of this kind is included? Well, there is a war. There is a Chinese war, the cost of which is estimated at £500,000, but which may be nearer £5,000,000. Here is a war. And then the right hon. Gentleman, with all the mysterious dogmatism he knows so well how to assume when it suits him—contradicting himself as he constantly does with rapid incoherence, but covering his contradictions with that robe of glittering phraseology which prevents one from immediately detecting the weakness of his argument—laid down the principle that when once this House has consented to the remission of a tax it is impossible to offer any further resistance to its repeal. The House seemed astonished, and the right hon. Gentleman, becoming more audacious, advanced another principle, that when a Minister once proposed that a tax should be repealed the House had no right to interfere. I gave, unfortunately, an indiscreet cheer, which reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had better reconnoitre his position. Having, therefore, treated the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry to another admonition, the right hon. Gentleman turned round and said that there was no instance in which the House of Commons, having once voted the repeal of a tax, had afterwards refused to carry out its vote. I do not know what the half-century of experience and observation and wisdom which has been referred to to-night in so admonitory a tone can supply to the right hon. Member for Coventry. My experience is much more limited; but I remember some remarkable instances in which this House having come to a determination upon most important taxes—taxes of far more importance than the paper duty—reconsidered and changed its opinion. The House came once in my time to the determination to repeal the malt-tax. The malt trade is one of some importance, and I suppose that decision of the House put all the maltsters of England in a flutter; but the malt-tax was not repealed, which shows that there is nothing so essentially anomalous or unconstitutional as the Chancellor of the Exchequer says in this House reconsidering a Resolution to which it may have previously come. I remember, too, the House once coming to the determination to repeal the sugar duties. The sugar trade is one in which there is immense speculation, and, I dare say, a great effect was produced in Mincing Lane when that vote was arrived at; but did the House pursue the policy which it had sanctioned with its approval? On the contrary, circumstances occurred which made the House deem it prudent to reconsider its decision, and the sugar duties were not abolished. What more do we propose to-night? We think the House on the subject of the paper duty has arrived at an imprudent, premature, and precipitate decision. In the former cases referred to we were not so much surprised as we have been in this instance. They were isolated questions placed fairly before the House, and the House had every opportunity of arriving in either instance at a sound decision, without being perplexed by extraneous circumstances. What has been the condition of the House in the present case? It had an immense scheme with respect to the commerce and the finances of the country placed before it the moment it assembled. It had not a decent opportunity to consider that scheme. If any hon. Gentleman asked for those fair opportunities which the bare forms of the House and Parliamentary precedents secure to us, the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose like a dictator and a despot in this House, and under a species of terrorism the House arrived at a precipitate decision, which has been ruinous to our trade and has made us ridiculous in the eyes of Europe. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, not satisfied with that, came forward and demanded of the House to rescind all the financial policy which for years he had been professing and upholding, and which so nearly concerned the interests of the whole people. He asked the House in the year when he had pledged himself, so far as a statesman can pledge himself, to abolish the income tax, to double that impost; and when his propositions were not received with all the enthusiasm which he seemed to count upon—for inconsistency is always sanguine—he vindicated his policy, as he has vindicated it to-night, by a statement which upon reflection he must feel has no foundation. He told us that he had been disappointed in the policy which he had established in 1855; that the Russian war had occurred and had baffled all his plans. He quite forgot that in 1857, when he was not in office, and when the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the present Home Secretary, wanted to induce the House to consent to retain the war income tax, on the ground of the great expense of the Russian war, which had added to the national debt an annual charge of £1,200,000, he rose and scoffed at the right hon. Gentleman, and treated him with intense and unutterable derision. And upon what ground? Upon the ground of his ridiculous assertion that the Russian war had made any considerable addition to the annual charge of the country or had diminished its permanent revenue. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an indignant tone whether he could pretend for a moment that the charge occasioned by the Russian war ought to induce the House to abandon those solemn pledges which it made to the nation in 1853—pledges which induced the people of Ireland to consent to the income tax being extended to that country; pledges which induced the adoption of the succession tax, by which alone the Government had been able to settle some of the most difficult and delicate questions ever submitted to Parliament. Such was his language in 1857. What is the moral? What confidence can we have in following the counsels of the right hon. Gentleman? I showed you on a previous occasion, when you were in the delirium of the French Treaty, which every man on both sides looks back to now with shame, how the right hon. Gentleman had failed in every one of the great propositions of his famous Budget of 1853. Having traded upon that false celebrity for seven years, you now meet him again in 1860. Three months of the Session have not yet passed, and you already deplore the course which, following his counsels, you have pursued. Now, while there is still an opportunity of at least mitigating our previous folly by some prudential movement, will you—can you reconcile it to yourselves to sacrifice, in the present financial condition of the country, a large branch of revenue which the trade interested—and that is an important consideration—does not want you to part with, and which the evidence before you proves is not a declining but an increasing revenue? Above all, I ask, will you do this at a moment when Europe is in a condition which must make the boldest man quake and the wisest man tremble?

Mr. Disraeli

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I request the indulgence of the House for a moment while I make an explanation upon two points on which the right hon. Gentleman has entirely misrepresented me. One of them touches my personal honour, and the other is of vital importance in the present discussion. The right hon. Gentleman says that in 1857 I urged that the financial consequences of the Russian war had not made it impossible to fulfil the plans of 1853, and that in 1860 I stated that they had. I wish to meet that statement of the right hon. Gentleman with the most direct contradiction which the forms of the House will allow. My words are upon record, and they were distinctly and emphatically the reverse of that which the right hon. Gentleman has stated to the House. The other point is one upon which I am content to rest the issue of this debate. The right hon. Gentleman says I alleged there was no instance in which the House, having voted the remission of a tax, had thought proper afterwards to change its mind. To that statement likewise I am obliged to give a direct contradiction. What I said was, not that there was no instance in which the House, having given a vote for the repeal of a tax, had afterwards altered its mind and reversed the vote, but that there was no instance in which the House, having voted the repeal of a tax upon the proposition of the Executive Government, had afterwards reversed that vote, which I stated to be equivalent to a pledge to the country.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I cannot allow to pass, as if I acquiesced in it, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that in moving the Estimates of my Department I had frankly stated that the lump sum for fortifications included nothing more than would be moved under ordinary circumstances. What I said, in answer to a question of the hon. Member for Norfolk whether any new works were contemplated, was, that no new work or no work not sanctioned by Parliament should be commenced under the Vote given on account. As I could not tell either what works the Commission would recommend or what the Government might decide upon, still less what this House would sanction, I took the Vote as a sum in a lump, instead of in detail, the details being then unknown. In the Estimates I purposely inserted a large sum without detail, in order that, whatever might be the decision of the Government or of this House upon the question, I might have the means of providing what, in the responsibility of my office, I might deem necessary for the defences of the country.

Question put:—The House divided:—The Tellers reported the numbers, Ayes 219; Noes 209.

Notice taken that Mr. INGRAM, one of the Members for Boston, had been in the Division Lobby with the Noes, and having passed the Division Clerks had avoided being counted by the Tellers:—Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER directed the Honourable Member for Boston to come to the Table; and Mr. INGRAM, being come to the Table, stated that he had gone into the Lobby with the Noes by mistake.

Mr. SPEAKER accordingly directed his Vote to be added to the Noes, and declared the numbers to be, Ayes 219; Noes 210: Majority 9.

List of the AYES.

Acton, Sir J. D.	Blake, J.
Adam, W. P.	Blencowe, J. G.
Agar-Ellis, hon. L. G. F.	Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.
Alcock, T.	Bouverie, hon. P. P.
Andover, Visct.	Briscoe, J. I.
Angerstein, W.	Browne, Lord J. T.
Antrobus, E.	Buchanan, W.
Atherton, Sir W.	Buller, J. W.
Ayrton, A. S.	Buller, Sir A. W.
Bagwell, J.	Buxton, C.
Eaines, E.	Byng, hon. G.
Baring, T. G.	Caird, J.
Baxter, W. E.	Calcutt, F.
Bazley, T.	Calthorpe, hn. F. H. W. G.
Beale, S.	Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
Beamish, F. B.	Carnegie, hon. C.
Berkeley, Col. F. W. F.	Castlerosse, Visct.
Bethell, Sir R.	Cavendish, hon. W.
Black, A.	Childers, H. C. E.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

Clay, J.
Clifford, Col.
Clinton, Lord R.
Clive, G.
Cogan, W. H. F.
Collier, R. P.
Coningham, W.
Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.
Craufurd, E. H. J.
Crook, J.
Cross, R. A.
Crossley, F.
Dalglish, R.
Davey, R.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.
Deasy, rt. hon. R.
Denman, hon. G.
Dent, J. D.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Douglas, Sir C.
Duff, M. E. G.
Duff, Major L. D. G.
Duke, Sir J.
Dunne, M.
Ennis, J.
Esmonde, J.
Evans, T. W.
Ewart, W.
Ewart, J. C.
Ewing, H. E. C.
Fenwick, H.
Ferguson, Col.
Fermoy, Lord
Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.
Foley, J. H.
Foley, H. W.
Forster, C.
Fortescue, hon. F. D.
Fortescue, C. S.
Freeland, H. W.
Garnett, W. J.
Gavin, Major
Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.
Gifford, Earl of Gilpin, C.
Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
Glyn, G. G.
Goldsmid, Sir F. H.
Gordon, C. W.
Gower, hon. F. L.
Graham, rt. hon. Sir J.
Greenall, G.
Greene, J.
Greenwood, J.
Gregson, S.
Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.
Gurney, S.
Hadfield, G.
Hankey, T.
Harcourt, G. G.
Hardcastle, J. A.
Hartington, Marquess of Hayter, rt. hn. Sir W. G.
Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Henley, Lord
Herbert, rt. hon. S.
Hervey, Lord A.
Hodgson, K. D.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Ingham, R.
Jervoise, Sir J. C.
Johnstone, Sir J.
Kershaw, J.

King, hon. P. J. L.
Kingleake, J. A.
Kingscote, Col.
Laing, S.
Langton, W. H. G.
Lawson, W.
Leatham, E. A.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
Lewis, rt. hon. Sir G. C.
Lindsay, Wm. S.
Locke, Joseph
Locke, John
Lockhart, A. E.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Lysley, W. J.
M'Cann, J.
M'Cormick, W.
Mackinnon, W. A.
M'Mahon, P.
Maguire, J. F.
Mainwaring, T.
Marjoribanks, D. C.
Marshall, W.
Martin, P. W.
Martin, J.
Massey, W. N.
Merry, J.
Miller, W.
Mitchell, T. A.
Moncrieff, rt. hon. J.
Monson, hon. W. J.
Morris, D.
Noble, J. W.
North, F.
O'Brien, P.
O'Connell, Capt. D.
O'Connor Don, The Ogilvy, Sir J.
Padmore, R.
Paget, C.
Paget, Lord A.
Paget, Lord C.
Palmerston, Viscount
Paxton, Sir J.
Pease, H.
Peel, rt. hon. F.
Pilkington, J.
Pollard-Urquhart, W.
Ponsonby, hon. A.
Pryse, E. L.
Pritchard, J.
Proby, Lord
Puller, O. W. G.
Raynham, Visct.
Redmond, J. E.
Ricardo, O.
Richardson, J.
Ridley, G.
Robartes, T. J. A.
Robertson, D.
Rothschild, Baron L. de Rothschild, Baron M. de Roupell, W.
Russell, Lord J.
Russell, H.
Russell, A.
Russell, F. W.
Russell, Sir W.
St. Aubyn, J.
Salomons, Mr. Ald.
Salt, Titus
Scholefield, W.
Scott, Sir W.

Seymour, Sir M.
Seymour, H. D.
Seymour, W. D.
Shelley, Sir J. V.
Sheridan, R. B.
Sheridan, H. B.
Smith, J. B.
Smith, Augustus
Smollett, P. B.
Stacpoole, W.
Stafford, Marquess of Staniland, M.
Stansfeld, J.
Stuart, Col.
Sykes, Col. W. H.
Thompson, H. S.
Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Turner, J. A.
Verney, Sir H.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.

Waldron, L.
Walter, J.
Warner, E.
Watkins, Col. L.
Wemyss, J. H. E.
Westhead, J. P. B.
Whalley, G. H.
Whitbread, S.
Wickham, H. W.
Williams, W.
Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
Woods, H.
Worsley, Lord
Wrightson, W. B.
Wyvill, M.

TELLERS.

Brand, hon. H. B. W.
Dunbar, Sir W.

List of the NOES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.
Adeane, H. J.
Annesley, hon. Capt. H.
Archdall, Capt. M.
Astell, J. H.
Baillie, H. J.
Ball, E.
Baring, A. H.
Baring, H. B.
Baring, T.
Beach, W. W. B.
Bective, Earl of Beecroft, G. S.
Bentinck, G. W. P.
Bentinck, G. C.
Benyon, R.
Beresford, rt. hon. W.
Bernard, T. T.
Blackburn, P.
Bond, J. W. M'G.
Booth, Sir R. G.
Bovill, W.
Bramston, T. W.
Bridges, Sir B. W.
Brocklehurst, J.
Brooks, R.
Bruen, H.
Bulkeley, Sir R.
Burghley, Lord
Cairns, Sir H. M'C.
Cartwright, Col.
Cecil, Lord R.
Cobbett, J. M.
Cochrane, A. D. R. W. B.
Codrington, Sir W.
Coke, hon. Col.
Colebrooke, Sir T. F.
Collins, T.
Conolly, T.
Corry, rt. hon. H. L.
Cubitt, G.
Dalkeith, Earl of Damer, S. D.
Deedes, W.
Dickson, Col.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
Du Cane, C.
Duncombe, hon. A.
Duncombe, hon. W. E.
Dunne, Col.
Du Pre, C. G.
East, Sir J. B.
Edwards, Major
Egerton, Sir P. G.
Egerton, hon. A. F.
Egerton, E. C.
Egerton, hon. W.
Elcho, Lord
Ellice, rt. hon. E.
Ellice, E. (St. Andrews)
Elphinstone, Sir J. D.
Emlyn, Viscount
Estcourt, rt. hon. T.
H. S.
Farquhar, Sir M.
Farrer, J.
Fellowes, E.
Fergusson, Sir J.
FitzGerald, W. R. S.
Foljambe, F. J. S.
Forde, Col.
Forester, rt. hon. Col.
Forster, Sir G.
Gallwey, Sir W. P.
Galway, Viscount
Gard, R. S.
George, J.
Gilpin, Col.
Gladstone, Capt.
Goddard, A. L.
Greaves, E.
Gregory, W. H.
Grey de Wilton, Visct.
Griffith, C. D.
Grogan, Sir E.
Gurdon, B.
Haliburton, T. C.
Hamilton, Lord C.
Hanbury, hon. Capt.
Hardy, G.
Hartopp, E. B.
Hassard, M.
Heathcote, hon. G. H.
Hennessy, J. P.
Herbert, rt. hon. H. H.
Herbert, Col. P.
Heygate, Sir F. W.
Holford, R. S.
Hood, Sir A. A.
Hope, G. W.

Hopwood, J. T.
Horsfall, T. B.
Horsman, rt. hon. E.
Hotham, Lord
Howes, E.
Hubbard, J. G.
Hume, W. W. F.
Hunt, G. W.
Ingestre, Visct.
Ingram, H.
Jermyn, Earl
Johnstone, hon. H. B.
Johnstone, J. J. H.
Kekewich, S. T.
Kelly, Sir F.
Kendall, N.
Kennard, R. W.
Kerrison, Sir E. C.
King, J. K.
Knatchbull, W. F.
Knightley, R.
Knox, Col.
Lacon, Sir E.
Lefroy, A.
Legh, Major C.
Liddell, hon. H. G.
Lindsay, hon. Col.
Long, R. P.
Lopes, Sir M.
Lovaine, Lord
Lyall, G.
Lygon, hon. F.
Malins, R.
Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
March, Earl of Maxwell, hon. Col.
Miller, T. J.
Milnes, R. M.
Mitford, W. T.
Montagu, Lord R.
Mordaunt, Sir C.
Morgan, O.
Morgan, hon. Major
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Mundy, W.
Naas, Lord
Napier, Sir C.
Newport, Viscount
Noel, hon. G. J.
North, Col.
Northcote, Sir S. H.
Packer, G. H.
Pakenham, Col.
Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.
Palk, L.
Palmer, R. W.
Papillon, P. O.
Parker, Major W.

Paull, H.
Peacocke, G. M. W.
Peel, rt. hon. Gen.
Pennant, hon. Col.
Philipps, J. H.
Portman, hon. W. H. B.
Powys, P. L.
Quinn, P.
Ramsden, Sir J. W.
Repton, G. W. J.
Rogers, J. J.
Salt, Thomas
Selater-Booth, G.
Selwyn, C. J.
Seymer, H. K.
Sibthorp, Major
Smith, Montague
Smith, S. G.
Smyth, Col.
Somerset, Col.
Spooner, R.
Stanhope, J. B.
Steuart, A.
Stuart, Major W.
Sturt, H. G.
Sturt, N.
Stracey, Sir H.
Sullivan, M.
Talbot, hon. W. C.
Thynne, Lord E.
Thynne, Lord H.
Tollemache, J.
Torrens, R.
Trefusis, hon. C. H. R.
Trollope, rt. hon. Sir J.
Upton, hon. Gen.
Valletort, Viscount
Vance, J.
Vandeleur, Col.
Vane, Lord H.
Vansittart, W.
Walcott, Admiral
Walker, J. R.
Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Watlington, J. W. P.
Way, A. E.
Whiteside, rt. hon. J.
Whitmore, H.
Williams, Col.
Woodd, B. T.
Wyndham, Sir H.
Wynn, Col.
Yorke, Hon. E. T.

TELLERS.

Taylor, Col.
Jolliffe, Sir W.

Main Question put, and agreed to.
Bill read 3^o and passed.

House adjourned at a quarter-before
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, May 9, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Piers and Har-bours; Marriages (Extra-Parochial Places).

MOY RIVER NAVIGATION BILL.

REPORT.

Ordered, That the Committee on Group L of Private Bills have leave to make a Special Report, so far as relates to the Moy River Navigation Bill.

Special Report brought up, and read, as follows:—

That, in the case of the Moy River Navigation Bill, it is the opinion of this Committee that there are strong grounds for believing that James Welsh, in giving his evidence before the Committee was guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

Ordered, That there be laid before this House, Extracts of the Minutes of the Evidence taken before the Committee on the Moy River Navigation Bill, upon which the said Special Report is founded.

Extracts presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

PIERS AND HARBOURS BILL.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate Question [6th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he had, at the request of the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Paull), consented to put his name on the back of the Bill, under a misapprehension as to its effect. He had imagined that it would carry out the recommendations of the Commission on Harbours of Refuge, of which he had been a Member. But when he saw the clauses, he found them altogether different from what he had expected; and he therefore not only required the withdrawal of his name, but he likewise felt himself compelled to oppose the measure. The Bill proposed that parties who desired to improve their harbours or erect new works should, without coming to Parliament, apply to the Admiralty, who should have power to grant either an extension of existing or the erection of new works. But there had been on both sides of the House complaints that the Admiralty was already saddled with too much work, even in times of peace: and we knew to our cost that they were utterly unable to get through their work in time of war. The Admiralty had already to manage £13,000,000 of money annually—work enough, surely, for one body, without extra labour being thrust on them. The Bill proposed that the Admiralty should appoint an inspector to go down and examine the works of any harbour requiring extension or formation; and who was he to be? A gentleman receiving not more than three guineas a day when employed, and nothing at all when unoccupied. He would scarcely, at the most, make more than £300 a year by his employment, and it would be most improper to entrust the great powers contained in the Bill to a man so inadequately compensated. There was power to take private property, to levy rates, and furthermore, to touch upon those vital questions of the foreshores and the closing up of existing harbours, which were of the utmost commercial importance, and all those powers were to be entrusted to a gentleman receiving only £300 a year. It had been said that the Enclosure Commissioners had similar powers, but those Commissioners were quite a different body. They had no power to take private land. Their business was to deal with waste lands when called upon by not less than two-thirds of the parties having rights in those lands. He considered the Bill interfered with the privilege every man was entitled to—namely, that of having questions of this kind publicly and openly discussed where private property was affected. He hoped his hon. Friend would consent to withdraw the Bill, and postpone the further consideration of the subject until it had been seen what steps the Government would take in pursuance of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Harbours of Refuge Commissioners. Should his hon. Friend not consent to do so, he (Mr. Lindsay) should feel bound to press the Amendment. He would, then, move that the Bill be read that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. BUCHANAN said, he wished to second the Amendment. The interpretation clause at the end of the Bill was so comprehensive that it could be made to include almost everything. The rights proposed to be adjudicated upon by the Admiralty had hitherto been regarded as of a most delicate kind, and it would be a great innovation upon established law and custom to confer such authority upon that Board. It was quite clear that the proposed powers could never be exercised by the Admiralty with satisfaction to the public, especially as such great interests were to be handed over to a gentleman with a salary of only £300 a year or thereabouts. He objected especially to Clause 6, which went to over-ride local Acts of Parliament. Another most objectionable clause was that which enabled the Admiralty Commission to go about the country and inquire into private works, to demand the inspection and delivery of documents, and to exercise a number of other powers which would be very improperly placed in the hands of any individual.

MR. PAULL said, that he could not but express his surprise at the course that had been taken by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), who had not quite correctly stated what had passed between them on a former occasion. The hon. Gentleman had stated that after the report of the Harbour of Refuge Commissioners had been presented, he (Mr. Paull) asked his permission to put the hon. Member's name on the back of a Bill to carry out the recommendation of that report; but that was an error, for he had introduced an almost identical Bill in 1858. Upon that occasion the Bill was read a second time by a majority of no less than 103, thus affirming the principle, and in point of fact the report of the harbour of refuge Commissioners had been in a great measure based upon the Bill. There was therefore no reason why the details should not be considered by a Committee of that House or by a Select Committee. The hon. Member objected to the machinery proposed by the Bill, but to render such a measure of any public advantage, it must provide a tribunal which could give speedy decisions at little expense. The hon. Member had advised him to refrain from introducing the Bill until the intentions of the Government were known, but he thought that this Bill would rather clear the way for the Government if it really meant to deal with the subject. Upon a previous occasion he had been told that he was proposing an unconstitutional novelty, and that he was acting solely with a view to the interests of his constituents, but he denied both those statements. It was true that the people of St. Ives, like other persons, desired a better and cheaper mode of effecting harbour improvements than existed at present. Some years ago it was desired to pull down an old pier and to erect a new one at a cost of £20,000.

The Bill introduced into Parliament for that purpose was practically unopposed. Everybody agreed that the works were necessary and would benefit the neighbourhood; and yet the Bill cost £1,300, simply because it was necessary to go through the ceremony of obtaining a private Act. Such a system inflicted a positive hardship upon those who wished to effect public improvements. In other instances the expenses had been even greater, for he found that the total expenditure in seven cases of applications to Parliament in 1845 for the construction of piers and harbours was no less than £30,000. And between 1801 and 1852 no less than 600 Bills had passed through Parliament. It was an understood thing that no Bill, however short it might be and however unopposed, could pass through Parliament for a less expense than between £500 and £600. In the somewhat analogous case of a person wishing to enclose land the expenses had been reduced to a minimum, under the operation of the Enclosure Commissioners' Act, the cost of each case not exceeding £16 or £17. There was no doubt that inquiries respecting piers and harbours must be upon a scale of greater magnitude, but certainly there was not such a difference as to warrant the enormous disproportion of cost. With respect to charges that the Bill was unconstitutional and a novelty, he replied that the tendency of modern legislation had been to enable promoters of useful undertakings to carry out their projects without the necessity of obtaining private Acts of Parliament. Then again he was told that he proposed to invest the inspectors with powers which were now possessed alone by that House. That was a misapprehension. At present the Admiralty had power to send down inspectors to make inquiries, but that was only done after a Bill had been introduced into Parliament and a great deal of expense had been incurred. Another objection was raised that the remuneration proposed to be given to the inspectors was insufficient, but if that were so, there could be no difficulty in increasing the amount, and competent men could always be obtained to perform the duties. The Bill would not interfere with the rights of any persons to be heard in matters of this nature, for the inspector, upon proceeding to any place for purposes connected with the construction of piers or harbours, would make public announcement of his intention to hold a public court, where all persons could appear and state any objections they entertained without the assistance of learned gentlemen or the expense of their fees. If the Admiralty decided against the scheme there would still be an appeal to that House. He was convinced that this Bill would, if it were passed, be of great advantage to many small ports which at present were unable to provide the requisite accommodation for their trade and their vessels. But he was threatened with the jealousy of great corporations, the trustees of certain harbours and navigations; but he did not seek to interfere with their rights, and if the Bill, as it stood, did not satisfy them that their rights would be untouched by it, he would willingly assent to any Amendment that might be proposed for the purpose. He, however, heard that the management of these corporations had not always given satisfaction. It was true, no doubt, that the Clyde Commissioners had done much for the port of Glasgow, but it had been a great misfortune for the ratepayers of Glasgow that the management of the navigation had been placed in the hands of a close corporation. Still, the Bill did not seek to interfere with existing rights, similar measures having been introduced on two former occasions, the principles of which he believed the House had adopted. On the first occasion the right hon. Baronet then at the head of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) had expressed himself in favour of such a measure, and he (Mr. Paull) had this year thought it right to submit his plans to the heads of the Admiralty. The noble Lord who represented the Admiralty in that House said he would not oppose it; the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), however, said there were many difficulties that might arise in the working of such a measure, and he should like to see the Bill referred to a Select Committee. That suggestion he took to be not only kind, but wise, and it would probably be the means of affording much information. It was said that the Admiralty was overworked, and he thought the inquiry before the Select Committee on the Bill would show in what way the Admiralty was overworked, and might perhaps suggest a remedy. The hon. Member for Sunderland was disposed to rely on the Report of the Harbour of Refuge Commission being adopted, but in the present state of the finances of the country he thought there was no hope of the recommendations of that Commission being carried into effect. That Report had already been before them for eighteen months without any step being taken in accordance with it. He believed that nothing ever would be done upon it, and that it would soon be consigned to that waste-paper basket in which so many similar documents were buried. He thought, then, he might safely ask that the present Bill might be read a second time. If it should be then thought desirable to send the Bill to a Select Committee, he should offer no objections to that course being taken.

[Second Night.

Mr. Paull

MR. FENWICK said, his objection to the Bill was, that it proposed to give to the Admiralty powers which, up to that time, had been considered to be only in the jurisdiction of that House. By the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Consolidation a man's freehold might be taken away from him against his will by another going secretly and making out his case before the Board of Admiralty. The next point regarded the levying of tolls, which the House had always hitherto kept in its own hands, but which was thenceforward practically to be transferred to the Board of Admiralty. The expense of private Bills was the pretext assigned for these innovations, but it was only when a Bill was opposed that expense was incurred, and even if it were not, he protested against expense being considered an object when freehold rights were concerned. The Inclosure Commission was not an analogous case, for they had no power to take away individual rights in the manner contemplated by the Bill. He hoped the House would reject the Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the principle of the Bill had been sanctioned by a very considerable majority in a former Parliament, and he was disposed to view with favour the object which the Bill proposed to effect. He attached very great importance and the country also, to the improvement of the harbours round the coast, with a view to the safety of life and property; and he looked with great anxiety to the decision of the Government on the subject. He held it to be the duty of the Government to give effect to the Report of the Royal Commission, but after the manner in which they had been throwing away the resources of the country by their financial arrangements for the current year, he was apprehensive that, on financial grounds, they would hesitate in carrying out the improvements recommended by that Commission. He hoped he might be mistaken; he was looking with anxiety to their decision, and pending that decision he would support the second reading of a Bill, the main principle of which was to enable the authorities, in any locality where harbour improvement was necessary, to carry out that improvement without being involved in the cost of a preliminary examination before a Parliamentary Committee. He agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Fenwick), however, that the adoption of a measure of this kind ought not to be made the instrument of any invasion of the rights of private parties; but he (Sir J. Pakington) saw no reason why that question could not be satisfactorily dealt with in Committee. Without binding himself to the details of the Bill, he trusted the House would recognize the principle of giving facilities for improving our harbours, and give to the Bill a second reading.

MR. M'MAHON said, he wished to remind the House that municipalities could make any improvement in their town, so far as the land was concerned; they could light, or drain, or ornament the town without coming to that House, but they could not touch the piers or harbours without a private Bill. He hoped the House would pass this Bill, which would complete the class of Bills that enabled towns to take such steps necessary for their own improvement without coming to that House for permission.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Paull) in persevering with this Bill, had shown a consistency of purpose which certainly was creditable to him. When the hon. Member moved the second reading the other day, he (the noble Lord) stated on the part of the Government that he should offer no opposition to the second reading, but should then move that it be referred to a Select Committee. Doubtless, a sound measure which would tend to lessen the great preliminary expenses in the construction and improvement of piers and harbours would be most desirable. But he was afraid, when the Admiralty officials came to be examined before the Select Committee, that they would object altogether to the vast jurisdiction which the Bill sought to impose on them. Already that department, besides the enormous amount of business devolving upon it connected with the building and manning of ships, had to discharge a great number of extraneous duties having nothing whatever to do with naval affairs; and it would not be matter of surprise that the Admiralty should offer strong objection to a measure which would increase that extraneous labour. Supposing this Bill became law, the result would be that whereas now every project for harbour improvement went before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in each case, the ultimate decision in all those cases would thenceforward rest practically with the Admiralty alone. Besides, the Bill would tend greatly to enlarge the present harbour department of the Admiralty, which would be attended with considerable expense; and he did not think the Board of Admiralty, already overburdened with work, would devote sufficient time to a careful inquiry into all the matters contemplated by the measure. He advised the hon. Gentleman to postpone this Bill, inasmuch as a measure was now under careful consideration by the Government with respect to harbours of refuge, in which, he had no doubt, facilities for the erection of piers and for harbour improvement in other respects would find due place.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 80: Majority 19.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Wednesday next.

BLEACHING AND DYEING WORKS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON stated that he did not intend to press at present the Motion he had put on the paper for an instruction to the Committee on this Bill, to extend the application of the Bill to print works and finishing works. He took that course, not because he did not believe such an extension would be advantageous, but lest the Amendment might interfere with the progress of a Bill, in which he took a warm interest.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BAZLEY said, he rose to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He was favourable to legislation on this subject, but he was anxious that labour should not be oppressed on the one hand nor capital sacrificed on the other. The dyers and bleachers of Lancashire and other parts of the country felt that serious imputations had been cast upon them, and asked for inquiry. He could with truth say that a more respectable class of men did not exist than the master dyers and bleachers, though he was bound to admit that there might be exceptions in respect of the manner in which the workpeople were treated. As a body they were anxious to promote the interests of their workpeople, and did much to improve their position in regard to health, education, and morals. He believed that as the law stood the rights of labour were fully maintained. In factories, work extended from 6 in the morning till 6 at night for five days in the week, allowing sufficient time for breakfast and dinner, while on Saturday cotton-spinning and weaving ceased at 2 o'clock, making a total of 60 hours' for the week. During one week in the year the manufacturers were obliged to give special holidays, when for 7 days the labourers ceased to work altogether. A different Bill applied to print-works, the demand for the productions of which was precarious, and therefore the people were permitted to work within the hours of 6 in the morning and 10 in the evening, though the average hours of work did not much exceed 12 per day. No dissatisfaction existed at the present moment among the operatives in the manufacturing districts. On the contrary, the greatest contentment prevailed. He believed he might say that the most friendly relations existed between the employers and the employed in the dyeing and bleaching works generally though, no doubt, excesses had been committed by individual masters. At the same time he should like to see a relaxation of the hours of labour among this class of operatives, and more opportunities given them for recreation and mental improvement. The factory system of education might be said to be the only national system of education that this country possessed, and he should like to see introduced into any Bill passed with reference to dyeing and bleaching works an educational clause similar to that which was in operation in the factories. He believed the master bleachers and dyers would assent to any reasonable measure, but they objected to being coerced by law into the adoption of a system that would be prejudicial to their own interests and to those of their working people. The hours of labour could not be regulated in dyeing and bleaching works as they were in cotton factories. There were many necessary interruptions to labour in bleaching works, arising from causes over which the masters had no control. There came upon them sudden demands for the bleaching or dyeing of heavy lots of goods, and they were exposed to demands for goods arising in the general market,—thus leading to alternate periods of great activity and interruption in the works. The calico-printers were regulated by Act of Parliament; but calico-printers were also bleachers and dyers. The hon. Member for Bolton proposed that bleachers and dyers should be permitted to work only 60 hours in the week, and yet the printers were permitted to work 80 hours in the week. He was at a loss to understand why a different course was to be pursued with regard to bleachers and dyers as compared with printers, who, to a certain extent, were bleachers and dyers also. He hoped the House would not plunge hastily into legislation on this question, but that they would wait for such further information as might be derived from the inquiries of a Committee. After the inquiries of a Select Committee, it would be easy to frame a Bill which would be acceptable to all parties. It was impossible wholly to dispense with night-work in bleach grounds. He knew that the operatives there employed were an athletic race; the men were strong and active, and the women fair and healthy. Still, he was not an advocate for long hours. After the charges that had been made against the master bleachers and dyers, they had a right to the inquiry he asked for, the result of which he had no doubt would be satisfactory to both employers and employed. In many bleach-works the operatives were only partially employed in summer, and they were sent into the hayfield. The employers only asked for the fair consideration of the House, nor did he ask that the Bill should be rejected. All he desired was that it should be made a just and satisfactory measure.

Mr. Basley

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee." — instead thereof.

LORD ASHLEY said, he objected to the appointment of a Select Committee. There was sufficient evidence already before the House to enable them to arrive at a sound conclusion on the subject. The promoters of the Bill threw no discredit on the masters of bleaching works. They were free to admit that they were upright, respectable men; it was the system they complained of, not the men. If in any one bleaching work such things took place as had been brought under the notice of the House, that would be sufficient to justify legislation on the subject. His hon. Friend spoke of the uncertainty of orders as a reason why the bleachers and dyers should not be bound down by regulations as to their working hours; but the same arguments were used when the Factory Bill was before the House. The most fatal consequences to trade were then predicted, but everybody knew how those predictions had been falsified. If the opponents of the Bill were ready to reduce the hours of labour, why should they object to legislation on the subject? The Scotch bleachers were ready and anxious to shorten the hours of labour; but they could not do so unless others in the trade did the same. He saw no necessity for further inquiry. They had already the Reports of two Committees, and he doubted whether any more information would be obtained from a third. It could only have the effect of putting off legislation on the subject. Looking to the complications that might arise in Europe, it was not impossible that we might soon require all the bones and sinews that this country could supply. But in the districts to which this Bill would apply we were slowly but surely deteriorating the physical character of our English women and men. During the Crimean war we had recourse to foreign legions because men were not forthcoming in this country. A recruiting sergeant, in one of these districts had reported that many of the men were inferior in physical power, and it appeared that out of 613 men who enlisted, only 238 were approved. He hoped the present Bill would be allowed to pass; but, if not, the object which it aimed at would be pressed year after year till they succeeded in removing this foul blot from the character of this country.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would be no party to any attempt to postpone the Bill till another Session. There had already been considerable inquiry into the subject, and he was prepared to legislate upon it at that moment; but he could not see the necessity of applying the same kind of legislation to two very different employments. He did not see why the law regulating factories, where the workpeople were exposed to all the evils of a tainted atmosphere, should be made applicable to persons the greater part of whom were employed in the open air. He acquiesced in the propriety of guarding the labour of the country against abuses; but, at the same time, he was anxious not to do injury to commercial interests. The Bill as it stood would, he thought, unnecessarily and injuriously interfere with an important branch of the manufacturing industry of the country. The House should remember that the trade of the bleacher was by no means one of an unhealthy character. Bleaching, dyeing, and printing were usually carried on in one and the same establishment; and he felt convinced that the best course the House could adopt in reference to bleaching was to extend to it the provisions of the Print Works Act. He believed that an efficient protection would by that means be afforded to young persons engaged in bleaching works. He was aware that there were considerable evasions of the Print Works Act; but he would stringently enforce that measure and all others framed for the protection of the working classes. He was willing to accede to the proposition of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) if he would give the House an assurance that the inquiry of the Committee should be of a limited character, and should be completed in time to legislate during the present Session. If it were merely to be a renewal of the inquiry gone into on the previous Session he would not be a party to it, and for the simple reason that he would not consent to postpone legislation on this subject when he was himself prepared to legislate on it at this moment. He felt it his duty, however, to say that the manner in which the agitation had been got up did not altogether meet his approval. It happened that those who prepared petitions were not over nice in stating the objects for which they were required. In the present case means had been resorted to which should be anxiously watched by that House. There was a petition presented against Mr. Hardcastle, in the neighbourhood of Bolton. That gentleman had presented a petition in reply, in which he stated he had analyzed the signatures of those who had been represented as his workpeople, and he found that among one hundred signatures many of them were not his workpeople, and some of the signatures were signed twice over. Mr. Hardcastle had been represented as having worked 17 hours consecutively; but, according to a monthly average for the year 1859, the hours of labour were $8\frac{1}{2}$, 11, sometimes 9, but never in any month exceeding $12\frac{1}{2}$. He thought that such petitions ought to be subjected to the most careful inquiry before being made the basis of statements and the ground-work of legislation.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that when the Bill of 1855 was before the House it was proposed to put the bleachers under the Print Works Act. It was said, however, that they ought to be under a Bill framed upon the Factory Act. Now it was proposed to legislate for the bleachers by putting them under the Factory Act, Parliament was told that they ought to be put under the Print Works Act. The object of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley), if the House might judge from his speech, clearly was, not to discuss the clauses of the Bill, but to reopen the whole controversy. What was the reason alleged for referring the Bill to a Select Committee? That some of the master bleachers felt themselves aggrieved by the statements made about them, and they therefore craved an investigation. If the House assented to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman on the grounds stated by him they would reopen the whole question, and plunge the unfortunate Select Committee in a dreary task like that which he and other Members were engaged in for a whole year, which resulted in the two great blue-books he held in his hand. If the Committee were granted hon. Members must make up their minds to shelve the Bill for the present Session. The principle of the Bill, however, had been affirmed by an overwhelming majority, and it was not fair either to get rid of it or postpone it under the guise of referring, not the measure itself, but the whole of the statements made in reference to the Bill to a Select Committee. Let the House, if it thought fit, appoint a Select Committee with the special view of rehabilitating the character of any of the master bleachers who complained of misstatements; but let the Bill go through Committee without any unnecessary delay. He felt convinced that the House would only lower itself in the eyes and affections of the working classes if they entertained the proposal of the hon. Member for Manchester. That hon. Gentleman, in the fact of the House exploring the House of Manchester had t very slow in reg the hon. Member that to legislate c be to legislate has ber ever ask th all? The matter thorough, minute tion; it was now he trusted that t Committee and p

SIR JAMES G assure the House more involved in He had, however, the House. On hearing a speech f Gentleman the M voted with the m second reading of ing given that vot him to take a co the effect of shelv sion a measure the he had frankly s he had a confessio had shown to hi of the predictions the Factory Bill h the result, and tl measure had cont and well-being o while it had not masters. That v which he had ar ever, maintained were many materi tions between ble other manufacture considered. In 184 sion of the short-t works and bleach The Legislature tl time provision to cognized the dist works and the grea ton, wool, &c. H had not thought f time provision to works. The Hous care that in dealin interests, while on not disregard the v the employed, they hand forget the rg interests of trade. tinction which mus

Colonel Wilson Patten

tween bleaching and dyeing as carried on in different parts of the country. Provisions that were applicable to bleaching and dyeing in England were not applicable to Ireland, and only partially applicable to Scotland. In one part of Scotland, for example, bleaching and dyeing was strictly analogous to the same process in Ireland; where it was carried on in the open air and by the natural process of water only; whereas in England and in some parts of Scotland it was carried on by chemical process and in rooms of a high temperature. All these facts were intimately connected with the health and comfort of the workmen and the interests of the capitalists and required careful discrimination and attention. On the whole, he was of opinion that it would be wise to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; not, however, for the purpose of shelving it or renewing the whole inquiry, as the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) predicted. With regard to the inquiry that had already taken place by a Select Committee, he must remind the House that the result of that laborious inquiry, and the contents of the blue-books which the noble Lord held up to alarm the House, was a recommendation by the Select Committee that the House should not legislate at all. With respect to the report of Mr. Tremenheere and the adverse statements on both sides, he felt bound to say that in all the questions much agitated in the country there was great exaggeration on both sides — exaggeration of the evils to which the workmen were exposed, and also of the dangers which the employers apprehended. The result of long experience had led to legislation on this subject, based gradually upon compromise. It had led to an extension of the Short Time Act to print works, and now the time had arrived for extending it to bleaching and dyeing works. Still, for the reasons he had given, that extension ought to be made with great caution and some forbearance. He was opposed to a general inquiry, which had been exhausted, both by the former Select Committee and the Commission. Nor could he agree with the hon. Gentleman who had moved for this inquiry, in the propriety of including, as a subject of reference to the Committee, the grievances of certain gentlemen who were the employers of hands in bleaching and dyeing works and who complained of certain allegations made against them. Those were matters which ought not to be investigated by the Committee to which this Bill might be referred. He would observe, in passing, that he had no faith in general statements with respect to the average number of hours during which workpeople were employed. The statement made by his hon. Friend (Colonel Wilson Patten) that the average number of hours in a certain establishment did not exceed 12 hours and a-half a day for a year, was no satisfactory answer to any allegation that the workpeople, for example, were employed for 48 or 60 hours consecutively. [Colonel PATTEN: I quoted a monthly and not a yearly average.] It was quite possible that with a monthly average of 12½ hours the hands might have been employed 48 or 60 hours consecutively, so that the average was to be regarded with great suspicion. He was anxious that the House should legislate on this subject during the present Session. Still, great caution was necessary in dealing with the details of this measure, which would be best exercised by a well-selected Committee of that House. He thought that the instruction to a Select Committee ought to be drawn with care, and that they should be directed only to receive evidence to such an extent as would enable them to investigate the necessity of a modification of the existing law, and the grounds which might exist in particular cases for special exemption. The enactments of the present Bill ought to approach as near as possible to those of the Factory Act and the Print Works Act in England and Scotland, where the process was carried on in heated rooms; but in Ireland, where the work was carried on in the open air, it was a great question whether there should not be an entire exemption from the Bleaching and Dyeing Act. Wishing, therefore, that the matter should be carefully examined, and disclaiming any desire to shelve the question, being anxious, indeed, to see a law passed during the present Session, he should yet vote for the Select Committee upon the understanding to which he had referred. The noble Lord the Member for Cricklade (Lord Ashley) had talked rather disparagingly of the deterioration of the fair sex in connection with the necessity for this Bill. The noble Lord, being a young man, was a better judge on that subject than himself; but, old as he was, he was not conscious of any deterioration in that sex. With regard to the courage, the endurance, and the high mettle of the male population, it was not necessary to go so far back as the Crimean war, for they had witnessed a recent proof in the pugilistic ring that these qualities existed in as great perfection as ever among our fellow-countrymen.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that there ought to be no reference to a Select Committee which did not recognize the principle of legislation already affirmed by the House as equally sound in its application to this particular branch of industry. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Graham) that no Committee ought to be appointed to go into an examination of exaggerated statements either on one side or the other. That would be a perfect waste of time. It would also be a waste of time to go into the general question of short time, and the Committee would have to take care that the inquiry was not raised into what lawyers called a dilatory plea. With that understanding he thought it would be safe to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The clauses were by no means simple, and it was not quite easy to see how some of them would operate. There was no question whatever that the case of bleaching and dye-works carried on in the open air, in which the hours of labour were to a great degree restricted by natural causes, and that of works carried on in a highly heated and close atmosphere was essentially different. But plenty of evidence could be taken if necessary to enable the Committee to frame clauses to meet the different cases. He, like the right hon. Gentleman, had no faith in averages. If the hon. Gentleman (Colonel W. Patten) had given the House the longest number of hours during which the hands had worked on any day in the month, and also the shortest number, the House might form some opinion, but without this an average of the daily number of hours was not worth the paper it was written upon. The Bill might be referred to the Select Committee, and then, if they found they wanted to take evidence on any special point, they might come to the House, and ask for the power to examine witnesses. With a well defined restriction of this kind he had no objection to a Select Committee, but if a Committee were left with a wide instruction any legislation on this subject would be shelved for the present Session.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE was averse to going into any general inquiry on this question, inquiry having been already carried to a great extent. Having voted for the second reading of the Bill, he was unwilling to take any steps which would stop legislation, but he thought the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last was a reasonable one, and he recommended its acceptance to the promoters of the Bill.

Sir James Graham

MR. TURNER said, he would confess that he had done his best to prevent legislation on this question. It was with that object that he divided the House on the second reading of the Bill, but he was sorry to say that the highly wrought appeal to the feelings made by the hon. Members for Sheffield and Oldham produced such an impression on the House that reason was put out of view and legislation determined upon. He had no intention of re-opening that question. He was ready to submit to the decision of the House, and to accept it as settled that there was to be legislation in regard to this matter, although he must say his opinion on that point remained unchanged. It had been said that there was no necessity for a Committee, as this subject had been already fully investigated. But it should be remembered that the former Committee, which was as fairly constituted as any that ever was appointed by the House, and conducted the inquiry in a most thorough and elaborate manner, reported against legislation, and contented themselves with a recommendation to the bleaching trade to lessen the hours of labour and improve the comfort of their hands as far as possible. He maintained that, beyond all doubt, the bleachers had carried out the recommendation of the Committee. He had no wish to throw any obstacles in the way of a full investigation of the whole question by a Select Committee, the result of which, he was confident, would be to clear the bleachers from the aspersions which were cast upon them by hon. Members in the discussion on the second reading of the Bill. The Amendment of his hon. Friend, however, proposed only to remit the Bill to a Select Committee, and they would therefore go into Committee to determine what clauses could be satisfactorily admitted. He observed that various trades—the linen trade of Ireland, and he supposed, also, of Scotland, the Turkey red dyers, and so on—demanded exemption from the operation of the Bill. On the other hand it was proposed to include within its scope the printers, calenderers, &c.; and, indeed, if they imposed these restrictions on the bleachers and dyers, why should they not extend them to all sorts of warehouses and manufactories? Legislation of this nature once entered upon it was difficult to see where it would stop.

MR. PACKE said, he would remind the hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the House that although no recommendation to legislate was made by the Committee, a proposition to that effect was only rejected by a majority of two. He certainly thought they were in the possession of sufficient evidence in the blue-books to proceed to immediate legislation. Very great cruelties and hardships were committed in such works as those alluded to, and the unfortunate workpeople must either put up with them or starve. It had always hitherto been found that the substitution of short for long hours had been attended with great advantage to the workmen, and had been no loss to the masters.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that after the observations of the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten), it appeared to him necessary to say a few words to remind the House of the actual position of the question. It was proposed to apply the Factory Acts to the bleachers and dyers, but it must be admitted that the operations performed by those trades were very different from those which were performed by the persons who came under the operation of the Factory Acts. Therefore, to apply to them wholesale and without modification, the provisions of the Factory Acts would be to inflict injury upon the masters, without benefiting the working classes. He must say that, having read carefully the evidence given before the Committee, he had come distinctly to the conclusion that legislation was requisite. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said he had come to that conclusion also, but he must forgive him for saying that his speech was altogether opposed to that admission. It was clear that in the hon. Gentleman's mind he was really opposed to legislation, although conquered by the majority of the House he and his Friends had succumbed. They now expressed their willingness that legislation should take place, but insisted that the legislation proposed was not altogether fitted for the case. He had no doubt there was some truth in that. He could well understand that the bleachers and dyers required provisions very different from those of the factories, and that, therefore, there ought to be a modification of some of those provisions. Having come to the conclusion that legislation was requisite, and being determined, as far as he was able, it should take place this year, he wanted to know whether to remit the Bill to a Select Committee would completely prevent its passing during the Session? In his opinion, if there was a well-selected Committee, consisting of men all of whom were resolved that legislation should take place at once, and empowered only to discuss this Bill and not to take evidence, their business would be so short that they would have an ample opportunity in a very few days of framing a Bill which would obviate the difficulties pointed out by the bleachers and dyers. Under such circumstances, he thought the Bill might safely be remitted to a Committee, but it must be clearly and distinctly understood that the House was determined to legislate upon the subject this year. And now, he wished to tell the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner), who charged him with aspersing the bleachers and dyers, that he never aspersed anybody. The evidence which he read might cast certain imputations upon gentlemen engaged in those trades; he would not say it did not; but that evidence was printed by this House and circulated throughout the country. All he did was to lay before the House evidence which had been given to the Select Committee and to the Commission appointed by the Crown. If the hon. Gentleman thought that was aspersing his friends, all he could say was that he hoped many people, hereafter, would be aspersed in the same manner. That evidence had not been contradicted. He felt deeply the miseries which had been inflicted upon many of his poor fellow-countrymen. As he said, his blood curdled when he read the statement, and he believed that the House strongly sympathized with him when he communicated it to them. That they did so was shown by the large majority which had struck down for ever the fallacy that no legislation was required. Irresponsible power was always abused. When the bleachers and dyers possessed irresponsible power they abused it, and it was the duty of the House to come forward and protect the poor and the young, those who were unable to protect themselves. If they could effect that object by means of this Bill, then it was their duty to pass it. He believed that to remit the Bill to a Select Committee, to consider how the interests of capital and labour might be conciliated, would not postpone the measure for the Session, but only for a few days; and therefore he recommended the House to agree to that course.

Mr. COBBETT said, he wished to vindicate himself from the charge of having been careless or inaccurate in the statements which he made to the House in regard to this subject on a former occasion. The facts which he then submitted to the House were furnished by a person who held the situation of overlooker, or something of that sort, in a bleaching work. He had known of the man before; he believed he was one of the witnesses examined before the Committee of the House, and he saw no reason to doubt his statements. They showed that in spite of the recommendation of the Committee the hours of labour in bleaching factories had not been lessened. The hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire had not alleged that that statement was inaccurate. The hon. and gallant Member said that he (Mr. Cobbett) had presented various petitions from bleachers and dyers—among others from some of those employed in the establishment of Mr. Hardcastle—containing statements which could not be substantiated. He did not recollect having presented the petition especially referred to; but it was obviously impossible for any Member to make inquiry, before presenting a petition, into the character of the person who sent it to him and the truth of its allegations. He took care always to see that any petitions he presented were drawn up in the proper form, and contained nothing disrespectful to the House; but it so happened that in regard to one or two of the petitions referred to the statements therein set forth appeared to him so startling and incredible that he withheld them until he had made inquiry, and found that they did not overstate the case. He himself visited several of the bleaching works, and examined the various departments as far as he was permitted to do so by the proprietors. He went into the stoves, and endured as long as he could, and that was but a very short time, an atmosphere heated to 130 degrees. He convinced himself by personal observation that what the petitioners stated was true. What more could he do? He denied that he had cast any aspersions on the bleachers and dyers. He merely stated the hours of labour in various works. If that were a calumny, then had he indeed calumniated them. To show that at the present moment the same oppression carried on with he would beg letter which hevious day from Fletcher, 48, The writer stati in that district hours of labour stance to the e wood, Salford, worked from 6 six or seven Heywood was cates of legisla works, and had that the hours would never be brought under course, if one others must do be made not t time; but, as bleachers and were always vi sent to the An proposed. He subject, and c which existed be voting again sent to send t for one hour. which had been the discussion, than a dead lett observed, and l stances the prin night in defiance of the Act. H "finishers" w ought to be in hon. Member fo the correspond referred, had gi hours of labour house of Mess Manchester. I the 9th of April "finishers" we from 6 o'clock o'clock at night morning till 2 any interval fo were entitled t the bleachers a he was in favou and could not Measure for a n

Mr. Roebuck

MAJOR EDW. Members must

if they agreed to a Select Committee, the Bill would be shelved, at all events, for the present Session. They could not have forgotten the difficulties which attended the passing of the Ten Hours Bill, and the number of years which were spent in discussing its merits. Again and again it was postponed to satisfy the demands of its opponents for further investigation. Inquiries were repeatedly instituted, but they brought the House no nearer to a conclusion; and so the contest was prolonged, until the Earl of Shaftesbury, then Lord Ashley, brought the question before the House and carried the measure. Living in one of the most populous districts of England, he could bear testimony to the advantages of the Factory Act. It was one of the greatest blessings ever conferred on the factory workers, who were deeply grateful to Parliament for having passed it. If that Act had operated so beneficially in regard to the woollen and cotton manufactories, why should it not be extended to the bleaching and dyeing trades? He was confident it would prove as great a boon to the one as to the other; and he hoped the House would grant it. He would vote against the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the narrative which the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord J. Manners) gave in relation to the proceedings on this question was not quite as complete as it was accurate. It laid before the House the truth, but not the whole truth. The noble Lord stated that the question was first referred to Mr. Tremenhoe, who reported that the bleaching and dyeing trades ought to come under the provisions of the Factory Acts. That the subject was then amply investigated by a Committee of the House, who sat for two years, and afterwards the Bill was brought in, the second reading of which was carried by an overwhelming majority. But the noble Lord omitted to state the material point, which was, that the Committee of the House recommended that no legislation should take place with regard to the trades in question; and therefore the recent decision of the House, of which he wished to speak with entire respect, was in conflict with the opinion of the Committee. He thought, therefore, the House would see that the vote they ought to come to was not quite so clear and obvious as the noble Lord wished them to believe. The present state of the law was this:—Certain trades were subject to the Factory Acts, while the printers of cotton and other goods were subject to the Print Works Act. The bleaching and dyeing trades were affected by neither of these Acts; and the object of the Bill before the House was to bring them under the operation of the Factory Act. It did not, however, profess to deal with the trades which were subject to the Print Works Act. There were, it appeared, certain houses which combined dyeing and bleaching with printing; and the question arose whether, if this Bill were to pass, they would be subject to the Factory Act, or to the Print Works Act, or partly to one and partly to the other. A deputation which he had the honour of receiving had referred very strongly to this difficulty, and the House, in case it undertook to deal with the question, would be under the necessity of introducing some clauses bearing on this point. He concurred with hon. Members who had spoken, in the belief that, after the deliberate vote given on the second reading of the Bill, it was not desirable that evidence should be gone into by a Committee, as this must have the effect of rendering legislation impossible during the present Session. The Question, therefore, narrowed itself into the consideration whether the clauses of the Bill were more likely to be settled in a satisfactory manner by a Committee of fifteen Gentlemen sitting upstairs, or by a Committee of the whole House. His own opinion would be in favour of a Committee of the whole House, but on this point he was prepared to consult the wishes of the promoters of the Bill. The sitting of a Select Committee could not occupy more than a few days, and, as it was not probable that another Wednesday would be obtained for this Bill during the next four or five weeks, while the House would hardly be disposed to proceed with its clauses between the hours of 12 and 2 A.M., no loss of time was to be anticipated in case they decided on referring to a Select Committee.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he was in possession of evidence to show that the bleachers and dyers would not be satisfied with being placed under the provisions of the Print Works Act, and he had received numerous communications from operative printers desiring that the benefits of this Bill might be extended to them. He strongly opposed the Amendment, for it was quite possible that if the Motion for referring the Bill were agreed to, a Select Committee might be nominated, which would be inimical to the measure, and which, as a last resource, would adopt the Print Works Act in preference to the Bill of the hon. Member for Bolton. It was a significant fact that the hon. Member for Manchester had warmly adopted the suggestion of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, while avowing at the same time that he had always been, and still was, opposed to all legislation on the subject. It was stated by Mr. Tremenheere in his report that, even where the buildings were dry and the localities favourable, the rate of work—eleven or twelve hours a day—in these establishments was more than young girls could properly stand. He was in possession of a letter from an overseer who had thrown up a lucrative situation in a print work in order that his daughters might have the advantage of employment in factories where the hours were regulated by law, and where they would not be exposed to the demoralizing influences of protracted labour. He trusted the House would remember the spirit in which the second reading was carried a few weeks ago; for, if they now refused to proceed with the Bill in the usual manner, thousands of persons who were looking to it for protection would believe that their councils were marked by a vacillating policy.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he thought the time had come when the House ought to legislate on the subject, and he hoped the recommendation of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) would be followed.

MR. CROOK remarked, that he saw no reason why the House should deviate from the usual course on the present occasion. With reference to the case of Mr. Hardcastle, which had been referred to in the course of the discussion, he found that the week before last a young man had been summoned for leaving his work without giving notice. It was there deposed before a magistrate that the practice had been to come to work about 6 A. M., and, with the interval of a quarter of an hour for breakfast, to work till 12 o'clock; half an hour was then allowed for dinner, and another quarter of an hour for tea; in all an hour in the day for meals; and the evidence established that the people worked frequently on for sixteen hours in the day. Since then half an hour had been allowed for breakfast, an hour for dinner, and half an hour for tea; but the duration of the work was still extremely severe. He felt certain the House would not refuse justice to the workpeople who sought it at their hands.

Sir James Fergusson

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, some confusion had arisen owing to the quantity of advice which the House had received, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had contributed to enlighten them. But there were two questions which stood out distinctly, and those were—had the House sufficient facts to legislate upon, and, if so, what was to be the character of that legislation? For his own part, he did not believe that further investigation would be attended with beneficial effect; having read, he was sorry to say, the entire of the three blue-books on the subject, he thought there never was a case in which, allowing for a little exaggeration on either side, it would be easier to arrive at the truth. But, as regarded the nature of the Legislation to be adopted, it must be remembered that there were particular circumstances connected with the process of bleaching to which the provisions of the Factory Acts would be wholly inapplicable. Inasmuch as the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the present Bill had shown no desire to adapt the provisions of that Act to the peculiarities of the bleaching trade, the only alternative was to discuss the matter where it could be more fully entered into than by the whole House—namely, before a Select Committee. He was not blind to the importance of legislating during the present Session, so that processes which were to be exempted, and those whose claims to exemption were not to be allowed, might equally know their fate; but, as the hon. Gentleman could not expect to take up the discussion much earlier than three weeks hence, when these details would all have to be considered, it was a fair question whether the progress of the measure, instead of being retarded, might not be facilitated, by being referred to a Select Committee, which might in the interim report on all points of detail. As to the terms of reference, these would, of course, embrace the consideration of the different clauses, and it should be understood that unless particular questions arose as to which evidence was felt to be desirable, application for power to take such evidence would not be made to the House.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 184; Noes 147: Majority 37.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he proposed to add certain words to the clause which would have the effect of exempting from the operation of the Bill the processes connected with bleaching in the open-air. In their case identity in name had been mistaken for identity of trade, for the "bleaching" carried on in England and Scotland was entirely distinct from that which took place in Ireland. To justify the extension of the law to works of the character to which he referred it must either be shown that the trade itself was unhealthy, or that the number of hours during which the employment was continued required the interference of the Legislature. With regard to the first branch, they had the evidence of Mr. Tremenheere that the occupation was very healthy, being principally out of doors, and consisting in hanging up yarns and stretching them on poles, while the various bleaching and steeping processes indoors were carried on in well covered and airy buildings. There was no evidence to show that the employers had ever overworked their hands, or had carried on their operations in such a manner as to be injurious to them. With regard to the operatives themselves, there was no desire on their part to have this Bill extended to them; this was allowed by all the witnesses examined before the Committee. The consequences of extending the measure to open-air bleaching would be most injurious to the trade. And if a measure were passed to unjustly cripple the power and discretion of the owners of bleaching works, the result would be that they would confine the employment in their works to adult labour. It was said that part of the operations were carried on under cover, but although that was the fact, yet as the work done in doors depended upon that done out of doors, and could not go on faster than the latter, consequently no overwork could practically take place. He admitted that in the stoves the heat was so considerable—perhaps 80 or 90—that they were not places where excessive labour ought to be carried on; but the fact was, that excessive work was not done there. Very rarely, indeed, was there any excess of the twelve hours of labour, with the allowance of two for meals. What he asked the Committee, therefore, was, not to show a favouritism to certain places, but to distinguish between processes which were entirely different.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, May 10, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Paper Duty Repeal.
2^a Public Improvements; Petitions of Right;
Exchequer Bills (£13,230,000); Customs Bill.

INDIAN FINANCE.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he presumed the Government would have no objection to produce to the House the Minute which had been published by the Governor of Madras, respecting the finance of India. He understood that the Government had promised to produce them in a few days to the other House of Parliament, and he trusted they would also be placed on the table of their Lordships' House with as little delay as possible.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the Minute of Sir Charles Trevelyan would in a few days be presented to both Houses of Parliament.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he would again complain of the non-production, by the Indian Department, of certain Returns required by Act of Parliament to be laid before the House; and said that if similar neglect were in future exhibited, he should more seriously call their Lordships' attention to the subject.

STATUTE CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Offences against the Person Bill read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, this was one of seven Bills for the consolidation of the Statute Criminal Law, which stood for Committee that evening. The subject had been before Parliament for many years, and he took no credit to himself in respect to the production of these measures, except that of continuing the labours of his predecessors. As their Lordships would remember, many years ago Commissioners were appointed to consider the subject of the codification of the law. Those Commissioners pursued their inquiries with great labour and diligence; they presented eight or ten Reports, which were subsequently reduced to the shape of Bills; but ultimately the codification of the whole of the law was found to be impossible, and it was, therefore, resolved to attempt only the consolidation of the Criminal Statutes, together with the assimilation of the criminal laws of England and Ireland. Such was the origin of the present Bill, and the set of Bills of which it formed one, which he hoped would receive the favourable consideration of their Lordships. It was only by placing a certain degree of confidence in those who had been employed to prepare the Bills, that the work of consolidation could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The Commissioners had done their best to fulfil the mission intrusted to them: the Bills had been referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships, which had been attended by lay, as well as by law Lords, and had been reduced to such a shape as that their Lordships might advantageously agree to them. He trusted their Lordships would not lose the present opportunity of effecting at least a partial consolidation of the criminal statutes.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was satisfied that the limited amount of codification now proposed would be of infinite benefit; but hoped that ultimately the common law would also be reduced to a system.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH complained that the drivers of private carriages were not so amenable to punishment as they should be for any injuries which might be caused by furious driving or carelessness; and that the punishment awarded to offenders against the person was not so heavy as the nature of the offences demanded. In cases where such persons had caused the death of another by careless or furious driving, the offenders had been sentenced to two months' imprisonment only; though it would be hard to distinguish between their offence and that of some classes of murderers. By law the driver of a hackney carriage, who caused the death of another by driving over him, was liable to be indicted for a felony. He wished to see the drivers of private vehicles placed upon the same footing as those of licensed carriages.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the provisions of the Bill were taken from an existing Act, which was among those which were to be consolidated, and which was confined to the drivers of public carriages. The difference in the punishment awarded to them over the drivers of private carriages was, that hard labour was added to imprisonment, in the case of the former class. The reason of this distinction, he supposed to be, that drivers of public vehicles had charge of the persons whom they carried for hire; whereas drivers of private carriages had no such interest, and there being no special interest in the case, were left to the operation of the common law. With regard to crossings, a person using them was bound to do so with ordinary care; and if any driver did not display a proper amount of caution in passing them, he would be liable to criminal indictment.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the clause was a mere consolidation of the laws applying to public carriages, and had no reference to private carriages. In consolidating the law, the only defects which could be corrected were palpable mistakes, the Amendment of which would give rise to no difference of opinion. He desired to take that opportunity of acknowledging the very great assistance the Select Committee had derived from Mr. Greaves, an eminent member of the Bar, whose knowledge of all the branches of the law bearing upon their labours was most astonishing.

LORD ST. LEONARDS referred to the insuperable obstacles which had hitherto beset all attempts at the codification of the criminal law. The difficulty encountered in defining the word "murder" of itself ultimately led to the abandonment of one of those attempts. The various Bills which had been introduced for this object had cost the country not less than £100,000, and he doubted whether the expense would be compensated by the result.

LORD WENSLEYDALE addressed a few observations to the House which were inaudible.

LORD PORTMAN pressed the necessity of making some alteration in the law relating to aggravated assaults on women, since the parties by whom they were committed did not care at all for mere imprisonment. He suggested the propriety of enabling the magistrates to add hard labour to imprisonment in cases of aggravated assaults.

The Lord Chancellor

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not approve of the magistrates, in cases of summary conviction, being empowered to inflict the punishment of hard labour.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH hoped that a provision would be introduced to the effect that the same penalty should follow where mortal injury was inflicted by a private as by a hackney carriage.

The House went into Committee on the Larceny Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM thought the only practical course for their Lordships to take, if they ever wished to pass these Bills, was to place all but unlimited confidence in those who had gone through them upstairs.

House in Committee.

Amendments made.

The Report thereof to be received to-morrow.

The other six Bills having for their object the consolidation of the statute criminal law—namely:—

- (2.) Larceny, &c., Bill.
- (3.) Forgery Bill.
- (4.) Malicious Injuries to Property Bill.
- (5.) Coinage Offences Bill.
- (6.) Accessories and Abettors Bill.
- (7.) Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill also passed through Committee.

CUSTOMS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE moved that the Bill be now read 2^a. The noble Earl explained that the operation of the Bill, which had passed the House of Commons after much discussion, would be to simplify the tariff and to relieve the consumer by the reduction and abolition of duty to a considerable amount. He should, under ordinary circumstances, deem it to be his duty to enter into a detailed explanation of the provisions of the measure, and into an enumeration of the various articles with which it proposed to deal; but as most of the points to which he should have to call their attention were connected with the general question of the French Treaty, upon which a general discussion had already taken place in that House, and their Lordships were therefore already acquainted with the arguments and with the general scope of the Bill, he should refrain from occupying their attention at any length with respect to it, and content himself with expressing his readiness to furnish the House with any information on the subject which might be required at his hands.

THE EARL OF DERBY: If, my Lords, we who sit on this side of the House offer no objection to the Motion which upon behalf of the Government the noble Earl has just made, and if we abstain from taking advantage of the opportunity which now presents itself to enter into a discussion of the Treaty with France, the tariff, and the general financial policy of the Government, it must not as a consequence be supposed that we acquiesce in, much less approve, the line of policy which in this respect Her Majesty's Ministers have pursued. At the time when we were first made aware of the proposals which by means of the Treaty were sought to be carried into effect we stated the objections to them which we entertained, and I need hardly say that those objections, instead of being removed, have been rendered still stronger in proportion as we have become better acquainted with the details of the instrument itself. The fact is, my Lords, that each day that passes renders firmer my conviction that the Government, in making use in the negotiation of this Treaty of inexperienced agents, in departing from the ordinary course of diplomatic arrangement and in entering into the consideration of an important subject with inadequate means and information, have brought the country into a position of very serious difficulty; have made a very disadvantageous Treaty, and have, so far as all the contingent advantages which it was supposed we were to derive from its operation are concerned, left us absolutely and entirely at the mercy of the French Government—who, from the accounts which we now receive, are not, so far as I can see, very desirous to exercise any great degree of moderation in acting up to the powers in the matter which have been placed in their hands. While, however, these are the sentiments upon the question to which I feel it to be my duty to give expression, I concur with those who think that it is desirable the occasions should be as rare as possible on which your Lordships should feel it to be incumbent upon you to reject propositions connected with the finances and commerce of the country which have obtained the sanction of the House of Commons, and which come up to us stamped with the imprimatur and responsibility of Her Majesty's advisers.

And if that be a course which it is expedient to refrain from adopting under ordinary circumstances, the reasons which operate against its being taken—when the question is not only one between your Lordships and the other House of Parliament, but one which involves the issue of our negotiations with a foreign Power and the adherence to a Treaty to which, however disadvantageous to us it may be, we are so far bound as to render it impossible for us to retrace our steps—acquire considerably increased force. I may add, that from a Bill of the nature of that which we are now considering, and which, as your Lordships are aware, comprises a great variety of articles, it would not be possible for us to eliminate any one of its provisions, and send the measure back so altered to the House of Commons, without an interference with the privileges of that branch of the Legislature. No alternative, therefore, remains to us, except that of either assenting to or absolutely rejecting the Bill as it stands, the result of adopting the latter course being that we should disturb the whole of the financial arrangements of the Government, and not only that, but materially interfere with those commercial arrangements which have been entered into by the commercial world upon the full reliance that that scheme would receive the assent of Parliament. I am, under those circumstances, of opinion that we should be acting unwisely in rejecting the Bill, and I, for one, should certainly shrink from taking upon myself the responsibility of asking your Lordships to pursue that course, notwithstanding the fact that I regard the whole of the arrangements which have been made by the Government, including the Treaty, as being of a most improvident and dangerous character; and the financial position of the country, as a consequence, not only in the present year, but perhaps still more as regards the next, as being one which is calculated to create the deepest anxiety in the mind of every man who gives the slightest consideration to the progress of public affairs and to our financial and international policy. There are undoubtedly proposals embodied in this Bill which, if carried into effect, will tend to aggravate the difficulty, inasmuch as it provides for the remission of duties which upon a more fitting occasion it might be just and expedient to abolish, but with which we cannot at present afford to dispense. We are nevertheless, as it were, compelled to give our assent to those

The Earl of Derby

proposals, and thus far to diminish the already too attenuated revenue of the country. There is, however, another subject—I refer to the abolition of the paper duty—with which the terms of the Treaty do not in the slightest degree interfere, with respect to which no commercial arrangements have as yet been entered into, and in dealing with which Her Majesty's Government call upon us to make a wholly useless and dangerous sacrifice of nearly £1,500,000 of public revenue. My noble Friend on the cross benches (Lord Montague) has given notice of his intention to oppose the second reading of the Bill in which this proposal is embodied; and I, for my part—feeling that its rejection, so far from embarrassing Her Majesty's Government, interfering with their other arrangements, prejudicing the course of business, or proving injurious to the financial position of the country, would rather tend considerably to the advantage of each—will do everything in my power to accomplish that rejection, and so preserve a large sum of money to the Exchequer and a large portion of the revenue to the State. I cannot help adding that I think that the noble Earl, following the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his calculations, has confounded two matters. He treats the reduction made in the tariff as being a relief to the consumer to a certain amount, and assumes that the loss to the revenue will be made up by the increased consumption that will be occasioned. But when the noble Earl assumes the extent of the relief to the consumer he is not entitled to take as relief the whole amount of the duty he is taking off; because he will find that in several articles in which the duty has been taken off the consumer is obtaining no relief at all; but that the prices are still kept up, and in some instances have increased on the prices at which they stood when the duty was levied. I do not admit the proposition that the relief to the consumer is equivalent to the amount of the reduction of the duty. I shall not, my Lords, on this occasion enter into any further discussion on the commercial and financial arrangements of the Government; but your Lordships will recollect that before Easter the noble Earl stated he thought it would be convenient that the financial arrangements of the Government should be brought under the consideration of their Lordships' House as a whole; and I cannot but think that the most fitting opportunity for taking the discussion will be on the occasion when my noble Friend proposes to us to deal with the measure which involves so large an amount of revenue as a million-and-a-half—I mean the Bill for the abolition of the paper duties.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

LUNATIC ASYLUM, COUNTY DONEGAL.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

LORD LIFFORD moved for Copy of the Order in Council naming the village of Letterkenny as the place where the proposed Lunatic Asylum for the County of Donegal was to be built, and of the Report of the Inspector on which that Order was founded. In doing so, he wished, he said, to call the attention of the House to the opinions upon the subject which were entertained by several gentlemen who had some knowledge of the locality in question. The Lord Lieutenant of the County had said that he saw with exceeding regret the course which the Government of Ireland proposed to adopt. The Marquess of Abercorn, the Earl of Leitrim, the Earl of Erne, and Lord Donegal, who were large proprietors in that part of the country, were all opposed to the scheme. Out of the magistrates of the county twenty-four had signed a letter, which he held in his hand, objecting to the proposed site, and only three were in favour of the Letterkenny Asylum. One of the wants which had for years been most bitterly felt in Ireland was that of a strong public opinion. He was happy to say that evil was being gradually remedied; but meanwhile the Government officials were not subject to the same responsibility as in this country. The noble Lord on the woolsack would probably recognize the saying,—“It is a far cry to Loch-ow.” The people of Ireland, therefore, looked on the Lord Lieutenant as their protector, and, feeling that by his high position and personal character he was removed both from the sympathies and necessities of his subordinates, they trusted that he would look into the details of the Government himself, and see that those beneath him did not attempt practices of which in England they would not dare to be guilty.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had no objection to the production of the papers, and when they were produced the House would be able to judge on what grounds this asylum was to be built on this spot. He regretted that his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant was not present to afford the information desired by the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he was not in the least surprised at the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland not being here, and, indeed, he thought he had acted very prudently in staying away. He for one could not join in the eulogiums which it was the fashion to pour forth upon the noble Earl—

EARL GRANVILLE, interrupting, said, that the reason why the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was not present simply was that he was not at the present time in London. If the noble Earl wished to make an attack upon his noble Friend or the Irish Government he would suggest that he should put a formal notice on the paper, and then his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant would be present to defend himself.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM resumed. He certainly objected to the manner in which the Government of Ireland was conducted, the principle which animated it being that of electioneering. He objected to the humbug of the Government bringing into the House of Commons a Bill to reform that House whilst the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was carrying corruption to its highest point. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland could not arrange even such a matter as a lunatic asylum, or the appointment of a High Sheriff, without having some electioneering interest in view. There was no single excuse for him. He had heard it argued a thousand times that in having such a high officer as a Lord Lieutenant in Ireland they were protected from having outrageous jobs carried out. For himself he held a diametrically opposite opinion. He thought that the Lord Lieutenant was the greatest mischief-maker in the whole country. By the system which at present existed in Ireland the gentry of that country had been set aside, and the whole business placed in the hands of stipendiaries from the Lord Lieutenant downwards. Hence these jobs. The present instance was a gross job. Within the last five years there had been expended, and very properly, £306,114 on lunatic asylums in different parts of Ireland; and of this £41,450 had been laid out at Omagh, within two miles of the place where it was proposed to erect this new building, whilst in Derry the sum spent was £1,425. Three years ago the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland took great interest in matters of this kind and did infinite good; and he believed that fifteen years ago there was a rule that no lunatic asylum should be built except in assize towns. He should like to know on what principle this rule had been departed from? It was of the utmost importance that there should be proper investigation as to persons confined in lunatic asylums, for otherwise they might be made the means of imprisoning persons who were perfectly sane. Erecting lunatic asylums in out-of-the-way places would facilitate such an improper practice. There could be no object in laying out several thousand pounds in building an asylum in this part of Donegal, when they might if necessary make some addition to the asylum already existing. He did not find that there had been any extraordinary excess lately, but rather a diminution in the number of lunatics in that part of Ireland. In Londonderry and Donegal there were only 214 lunatics, only six in the prisons, and very few in the poorhouses. This asylum was not wanted, and there could be no earthly object in laying out this money. Gentlemen connected with Ireland had had no explanation in reference to this matter, and he thought that it was not satisfactory that a matter of this kind should be brought forward by the Irish Government entirely on their own responsibility, and without consulting a single one of the individuals who would have to pay towards the money which was to be expended. They ought to have some explanation from the Government. Why was not the Lord Lieutenant there, or why was not means taken for obtaining from him the information necessary to answer this question? He thought it was very desirable that there should be somebody in that House to represent the Irish Government. In the House of Commons there were the law officers for Ireland, and why, in their Lordships' House, should there not be an Irish law lord? In the absence of such an arrangement, why should not the Lord Lieutenant be there in person to answer for his own jobs? Why did he not come down and make some of those pretty speeches which he was in the habit of making in other places; and in which he was constantly talking of the prosperity of Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant had lately, at a public meeting, answered a speech which he (the Earl of Leitrim) had made in that House—a circumstance which he did not think was proper or respectful to their Lordships. What he had said as to the corrupt manner of carrying on the Irish Government was the opinion of every person in that country. How were the lieutenancies of Londonderry and Roscommon given away lately, and for what purpose? The manner of carrying on the Irish Government brought it into thorough contempt; and, though it might be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to stand by the Lord Lieutenant, the feeling in Ireland was that they had sent the Earl of Carlisle to Ireland in order to disgust the Irish with the system of having a Lord Lieutenancy.

The Earl of Leitrim

THE EARL OF EGLINTON, in the absence of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and in total ignorance of all the circumstances connected with this matter, thought that it would be extremely hazardous in him to give an opinion as to this lunatic asylum being placed in this particular spot; neither in his absence would he dare to say one word in dispraise of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He as fully believed that that noble Lord was as free from all charges of corruption and jobbery as he (the Earl of Eglinton) felt himself to have been during his tenure of office. He knew the manner in which such questions as this came before the Lord Lieutenant, and it was this:—They were referred to a Committee of the Privy Council, and the Lord Lieutenant signed the decision of that Committee—he would not say in ignorance—but at all events in a manner which rendered him as innocent and free from all blame, as was any one of their Lordships. Though, however, he acquitted the Lord Lieutenant, he did not acquit the system, which, on the contrary, he thought was entirely erroneous. In all these cases of county questions the opinions of the magistrates, of the gentry and tenantry ought to be taken into consideration; and in this respect the system should be altered. When he was, to use the phrase of the noble Earl, the Chief Stipendiary of Ireland during the late Government, a Bill was brought forward by the Administration in the other House for the better government of lunatic asylums, and it got as far as a Select Committee in the other House, and would have become law had it not been for the dissolution. That Bill proposed to give the county magistrates almost the sole management of these asylums, subject merely to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant. He thought it desirable that some such Bill should still be passed. His noble Friend complained of the Lord Lieutenant not being present in that House to answer for the jobs he had committed; but he must call their Lordships' attention to the fact that if the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland were to be frequently present in that House it would not be possible for him to do his duty in the country he was sent to govern. It was the duty of Her Majesty's Government, however, to answer for him in his absence; and, when due notice had been given of the present Motion, he thought the noble Earl opposite might have informed himself so as to give more satisfactory information on the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that any suggestion for the improvement of the present system coming from the noble Earl would be received with that attention which it deserved. He was sorry, as to the particular case, that he was unable to give any additional information to that which would appear on the face of the correspondence.

THE EARL OF DESART addressed a few observations to the House which were inaudible.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, he thought it would be matter of great regret in Ireland if anything were said against the principle of maintaining the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and he thought that the appointment to that high office of a nobleman entirely unconnected with the country was the best arrangement that could possibly be made. The public in Ireland looked with the utmost confidence to the Lord Lieutenant's high-minded opinion, which was, in fact, their only resource when they felt aggrieved by the public functionaries. The whole country felt greatly indebted to the noble Earl (the Earl of Eglinton) for the laborious and painstaking manner in which he had administered the affairs of Ireland. He did not believe there was a single individual in that country who felt that any act performed by the noble Earl had been inconsistent with his high and important duties.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he did not intend to say one word against the office of the Lord Lieutenant; what he complained of was the manner in which the duties were performed by the present Viceroy. He entirely agreed with what had been said by his noble Friend who last addressed the House. Nothing could be more honourable and correct than the course of the noble Earl (the Earl of Eglinton) when he filled that office; but the contrast between him and Lord Carlisle was as great as that between light and darkness.

House adjourned at a Quarter past
Seven o'clock, till To-morrow,
Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, May 10, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Registration of Births, &c. (Ireland).
2° Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland); Prisons (Scotland); Labourers' Cottages (Scotland).

THE IRISH AND SCOTCH REFORM BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in consideration of the Committee on the Reform Bill for England and Wales having been deferred till June, and with the view to expedite the passing of that Measure, he would agree to postpone the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills to the next Session of Parliament?

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that before the noble Lord replied he would beg to ask another question of which notice had been given—namely, whether he will agree to postpone going into Committee on the Representation of the People Bill until after the Second Reading of the Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill; or whether, with a view to uniformity of legislation, he will introduce provisions applicable to Ireland into the Representation of the People Bill, so that Parliamentary Reform for both Countries may proceed pari passu?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, with respect to the question of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) he thought it would be a very inconvenient course to proceed with the Second Reading of the Irish and Scotch Bills until they had gone into Committee on the English Bill, because they would have to debate the question of the franchise, which had already been discussed, and which must be discussed again in Committee on that Bill. It appeared to him that the more convenient course to be taken would be to go into Committee on the English Bill, and then the result of that discussion might be taken into consideration on the Second Reading of the Irish Bill. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Cork county' (Mr. V. Scully) as to deferring the Irish Bill till next Session, he was unable to answer it before they went into Committee on the English Bill; but before they went into Committee on the English Bill his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) or himself would state what were the intentions of Government on the subject.

ROAD ACROSS HYDE PARK.

QUESTION.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether in the event of the Government entertaining the proposition of connecting the north and south sides of Hyde Park by a Road, he will lay Plans, Sections, and Estimates of such proposed Road upon the Table of the House prior to any Vote being taken to carry the same into effect?

MR. COWPER said, the making of a great public thoroughfare across Hyde Park would affect the comfort and recreation of so many persons that no decision could be come to without the fullest consideration. He should not think of proposing any Estimate to the House without giving the fullest information as to any plans that might be recommended.

THE POOR LAW BOARD.

QUESTION.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he would now beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether, as the powers of the Poor Law Board expire at the end of the present Session of Parliament, it is the intention of the Government to introduce in the present Session a Bill for the renewal of those powers; and, if so, when such Bill will be introduced?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS replied that it was the intention of the Government to propose a renewal of the Act by which the Poor Law Board was at present constituted and the Bill would be introduced as early as possible after the Whitsuntide recess. He apprehended that his hon. Friend had been induced to ask the question from a notion that was prevalent among some of his constituents, that the Poor Law Board intended to ask for extended powers to administer the Nuisances Removal Bill. He (Mr. Villiers) begged to assure the hon. Member that with that measure the Poor Law Board had no connection whatever.

Lord John Russell

MARINES IN CHINA.—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty the number of Marines and Sailors now on the China Stations?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he must repeat an answer which had been given to a similar question that was put earlier in the Session. It would not be convenient for the public service to make any statement of the number of Marines and sailors in China, but he had no objection to give privately the information to the hon. and gallant Member.

THE ABSTRACTED ARMY EXAMINATION PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR SIBTHORP said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any clue has been obtained relative to the late abstraction of Examination Papers; and, if so, whether the names of the parties concerned are to be made public, and what steps have been taken in the matter by the authorities?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied, that the police had been making an investigation, but had not as yet succeeded in discovering the offender, although they were not without hopes of doing so. If there should be any means of bringing the guilty parties to justice, they would not be neglected.

THE GARRISONS OF HONG KONG AND CANTON.—QUESTIONS.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War the number of Regiments or numerical strength of the Garrisons of Hong Kong and Canton, Europeans and Natives of India not included in the amount of forces stated by the Secretary of State as proceeding to or arrived in China?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied, that the garrisons of Hong Kong and Canton comprised three batteries of artillery consisting of 292 men, three companies of Royal Engineers containing 268 men, and a battalion of European troops 738 strong. There were also three battalions of Native troops containing 1639 men, who were to be relieved by an equivalent force; and orders had been given that the English soldiers who were sick should be sent home unless urgent affairs required that they should be still retained there.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Secretary of State for the War Department when the Army Estimates will be brought forward?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: The week after next, immediately before the holidays.

GENERAL PEEL: Will you give notice of the precise day?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Yes, I will.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.

QUESTION.

MR. PALK said, he wished to inquire of the Secretary of State for War, When the Report of the Commissioners on the Defences of the Country will be laid on the Table, and whether it will be laid on the Table before the right hon. Gentleman took the Vote for Fortifications?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I expect to lay that Report on the Table in the course of a few days, and I shall not take a Vote on the Fortifications without laying before the House an Estimate in detail. I do not expect we shall reach that Estimate the first night, but I will take care that ample notice shall be given by the Government of the time when it will be brought forward.

GENERAL GARIBALDI'S EXPEDITION.

QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS was understood to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any Despatches from the Piedmontese Government relative to any projected expedition of General Garibaldi to Sicily, and whether he will have any objection to lay them on the table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say that it would not be desirable to publish any Despatches which had come to the hands of the Government on the subject, considering the ill effects which had followed from the publication of Despatches relative to a previous projected expedition of General Garibaldi in Central Italy.

STATES OF THE CHURCH.—THE PAPAL GOVERNMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask, Whether the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary will have any objection to produce all the Despatches that have been received from Mr. Odo Russell, the Attaché at Rome, relative to the administration of public affairs in the States of the Church?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that he was not prepared to produce any Despatches beyond those which had already been published.

MR. HENNESSY intimated his intention of moving for the unpublished Despatches.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that he could not agree to produce them, inasmuch as their publication would be in violation of the pledge under which communications had been made by Cardinal Antonelli.

REFRESHMENT AND WINE LICENCES
BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is willing to move that the Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill be committed pro forma, for the purpose of introducing his Amendments therein and having the Bill reprinted?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry that he could not accede to that arrangement. Owing to the necessary pressure of public business the debate on the Bill had spread over a period of seven weeks. If it had been agreeable to hon. Gentlemen that the Bill, after having been read a second time, should have been committed, it would have been practicable, without any great inconvenience, to have adopted the course of incorporating the whole of the Amendments, and sending them forth for the consideration of all parties. At present the state of the case was, that the Amendments of which he had given notice, and which represented the Bill in its complete form, so far as the House was concerned in no respect touched the essential principle of the Bill, of which he had endeavoured to give the clearest explanation. In the state of public business it would not be convenient to allow of the further delay for the re-printing of the Bill. Of course, if there were found any great inconvenience in Committee, hon. Members would be entitled to make the demand; but he could not conceive how any such inconvenience could arise, because the Amendments were very simple in form.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I rise, Sir, to move the Resolution of which I have given notice in regard to the Wine Licences Bill. Of course I shall not move this evening the other Resolutions which are also to be proposed in Committee of Ways and Means, and which relate to other subjects. The Resolution to which I now refer separates itself into three parts. The first two stand exactly as they have stood before the country for many weeks. I am not aware that there is any ground for making any alteration in the licences so far as the rates of them are concerned. As respects the first portion of the Resolution, which relates simply to the licences to be taken out for keeping a refreshment house, I do not wish that this vote should pledge any hon. Member as to what kind of refreshment houses are to become liable to the payment of a licence, and under what conditions that payment is to be made. All those hon. Members who think that no refreshment houses ought to be taxed except those which sell wines may with propriety raise a debate upon that Resolution. But those who think, with the Committee of 1854, that it is desirable that refreshment houses of a certain description, in certain places, should be made liable to the obligation of taking out a licence, will only have to consider whether proper rates are proposed to be charged in this Resolution. And the question we shall have to dispose of with respect to the different places, or the precise description of houses, which require a licence, can be much more conveniently disposed of in Committee on the Bill. An hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) has given a notice which touches the whole principle of the Resolution. He objects to imposing the obligation of taking out a licence on any refreshment house. I am not prepared to recede from the proposal. I think the recommendation of the Committee of 1854 was a wise proposal; and that, as regards a certain description of houses, there is really as great a necessity for a licence, which is the ordinary symbol of police superintendence, as there is in any case which can be mentioned. I do not think the difference of strong liquor being avowed as the substance of the trade, or even as a portion of the trade, touches the question vitally. In point of fact, many of the houses where there is no licence to sell strong liquors are the very places where you most of all require the power of entering by the police, in order to ascertain whether strong liquors are not surreptitiously sold there. The hon. Member took two objections, which appeared to me to be contradictory. He first argued against the recommendation as involving the principle of a universal licence, upon all retail shops, and then contended that it was inconsistent because it only imposed a duty upon one class of retail shops. The two things cannot stand together. The Resolution before the House has nothing to do with universal licence. It touches simply the question of the peculiarities of a class of refreshment-houses which are places of public resort, and with respect to which there are peculiar risks, both as regards the preservation of the peace and good order of society, and the surreptitious consumption of strong liquors. With this explanation I beg to move:—

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, levied, and paid, unto and for the use of Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, for and upon the several Licences hereinafter mentioned, the respective Rates and Duties following—that is to say, for every Licence to keep a Refreshment House, if the house and premises in respect of which such Licence shall be granted shall be under the rent and value of £20 a year, 10s. 6d.”

MR. AYRTON said, if the consideration of the question was embarrassing before, it was rendered ten fold more embarrassed by the statement just made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had before endeavoured to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman a precise and clear expression of opinion as to the policy which regulated his conduct in proposing these new taxes. He had asked him whether he proposed them as a measure of finance, or as a measure of police, with a view to preserve order and morality in the country. If it were put forward as a measure of finance, they must then be prepared to examine it on financial grounds, as part of an important system by which the Government proposed to license the retail shopkeepers of every trade and profession throughout the country. There was much to be said for and against that view of the subject. When it was first brought forward, it was coupled with the general financial scheme of the country—it was, in fact, a part of the Budget; and Parliament was called to support it as a part of the financial scheme. But now it seemed that it was no part of finance; that it was proposed as a mere measure of police, to preserve the good order and morality of the country. He was certainly surprised to find that a measure of this kind should be brought forward, not by the Home Secretary, who was responsible for the peace and good order of the country, but by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a part of his new financial scheme. He would briefly state why he thought the proposition should not be agreed to. It was ostensibly founded on the recommendations of the Committee which sat to inquire into the condition of public-houses, and other places for the sale of beer; but he thought they had heard enough from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley), to show that the scheme was directly opposite to that which was recommended by the Committee which the Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted in support of his proposition. If it was to be considered as a mere question of police, he was compelled to ask the Committee upon what ground they could decide to levy a tax on a particular class of houses, in aid of the local police—for the police in this country were purely local—to be paid into the National Exchequer. If it were imposed in order that inspectors might be appointed, who, it was clear, must be appointed by the local authorities, the tax ought to be no more than was necessary for that purpose. If it were for the purpose of registration, to give the police facilities for entering the houses, then it ought just to cover the mere cost of registration. But these were no grounds for levying a tax to be paid into the general exchequer for the national expenditure of the country. The Committee were asked to vote an indefinite tax upon houses of some sort; but had received no explanation as to the kind of houses on which it was to be imposed. If there was any one man in the House who ought not to have made such a proposition, it was that right hon. Member, who, when asked to go into Committee upon a house tax, said that that question was embarrassed with so many difficulties, that he never would consent to consider the proposal, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give a precise explanation of all the incidences of the tax. So sensitive was the conscience of the right hon. Gentleman then, that he preferred to overturn a Government, rather than take a course of which his conscience disapproved; but now he invited the House to go into a discussion upon a tax, and he could not give the least explanation of the character of the houses upon which the tax was to be levied. He (Mr. Ayrton) would not say the right hon. Gentleman could not give any explanation, but he would not do so; and he would tell the House why. The right hon. Gentleman had twice attempted to give an explanation. In the first attempt he signally failed, and on the second occasion he not only failed, but his proposition was preposterously absurd. He (Mr. Ayrton) thought he was justified in using that phrase, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself was in the habit of using phrases quite as strong when he desired to express his opinions upon the views of other hon. Members. He would also ask the Committee to consider what was the original proposition which the right hon. Gentleman made, and then to view it in its amended form. It was first proposed to levy this tax on any house, room, shop, or building used for the purpose of selling therein victuals or refreshments to be consumed on the premises. The question had naturally been asked, what was excluded under this provision describing anything that a man could eat or drink. One Gentleman said that to buy and eat an orange in an unlicensed house would be against the law; at which the right hon. Gentleman shook his head, as if that were a thing out of the question. When he was inviting the support of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches to his proposal, he told them that in villages, and even small towns in the country, there were houses where articles that might be called refreshments were sold—such as ginger-beer and oranges—but that as these places were not the resort of persons for whom it was necessary to have the visitation of the police, they were not included in his proposition. The effect of his illustration was, that in houses in small towns oranges might be sold without a licence, but that the sale of oranges was not to be permitted in unlicensed houses in large towns. Indeed, the language of the proposal was so indefinite, that it might include a stick of barley sugar, or the best dinner that a Lord Mayor could provide. The proposal was considered so extravagant, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was urged to withdraw it, and how did he withdraw from this proposal? The amended provision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was—

“ Provided always that no licence to keep a refreshment house shall be required to be kept under this Act for the sale of goods or commodities in the front, or on the basement, or on the ground floor, although refreshment may be consumed in such shops; such refreshment, however, not being consumed in any other room, and not being wine, or any other excisable liquor."

The amended proposal, therefore, amounted to this, that a person would be permitted to take a cup of coffee in the kitchen or ground floor of a house, but not in the drawing-room. Upstairs it was to be subject to taxation in the shape of a licence; but downstairs there was to be no tax. In the shop it would be untaxed, but in the floor above the tax would have to be paid. Was ever such a proposal as this made for purposes of police; that two stories of a house should be free from the visitations of the police, but that the rest of the house should be placed under their control? On what ground did this distinction proceed? He could imagine a ground where the greatest privacy was desired; but he was afraid that if he were to suggest it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find himself compelled to repudiate it, because it could not for one moment be maintained that any one would take out a licence in order that those upper rooms should be open to the visitation of the police. It was said that there were certain houses in the town and country where people secretly sold illicit spirits, and that these cases would be met by this provision. But it would not answer that purpose, for they could not expect that such persons would take out a licence in order to inform the police of their intention to violate the law. The evidence given before the Select Committee sufficiently disposed of this theory. When a witness was asked how the police repressed the illicit sale of beer and spirits, he said there was no method of doing so, except by using the police as spies, and sending them in plain clothes. Being asked why the police did not do that, the answer was that an unfortunate transaction in which the police had acted as spies had excited such attention, that it was thought inexpedient to pursue the spy system in this country. The police were therefore unable to carry on the process of detection. Was this to be a Bill for encouraging that spy system from which even the police shrunk as being at variance with the opinions and feelings of the people of this country? The police had just as much power now to go into houses in disguise and make search as they would have under this Bill, and if parties were selling spirits without a licence they were already subject to penalties and forfeitures. Then, was it supposed that another class of houses, which were known as disorderly houses, would take out licences which would give the police an opportunity of entering every bedroom in those houses? If the occupation of such houses was unlawful, and if the bedrooms were to be used for purposes not to be mentioned, the occupiers would, of course, take care not to render themselves liable to be visited by the police by taking out a licence. What, then, did the Bill rest upon? They had a proposal to tax the sale of coffee, or something else, in an upstairs room. He submitted that until the House had before it a definite explanation of the precise character of the shops to be taxed, they could not proceed to vote for this tax. He wished to say one word upon the injustice of any system of taxation which took a margin of £20 rental as the limit of increase. He had said that if it be for police purposes, it was essential that it should be a single uniform tax; but to take a margin of £20 as the ground of increase, would be to commit an act of great injustice to the constituency which he represented, and to the Metropolis generally. Of the entire house tax of £690,000 a year levied in England, nearly one-half, or £330,000, was levied upon the Metropolis alone, while all Scotland only paid £45,000. Could that be said to be a just tax? This attempt to make a distinction between one town and another was founded upon a monstrous fallacy. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would visit some of the smaller streets in Westminster, he would see shops for the sale of cakes and oranges quite as small as those in country towns. What right, then, had the hon. Gentleman to make this distinction? He opposed the Resolution—first, because in the absence of any explanation, it was perfectly unintelligible; and secondly, because in the mode in which it was proposed it was most unjust, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have been the last person to propose such a Resolution, for when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in expectancy, he could not tolerate the mention of such a proposition as that which, as Chancellor of the Exchequer in possession, he then proposed for the adoption of the House.

Mr. Ayrton

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not follow the hon. Member through a speech that was more discursive than dispassionate, but would content himself with replying to that part of it which bore upon the question. The hon. Gentleman had embraced the house tax and a number of other points which would best be discussed when the clauses came before the House. In his opinion, the hon. Gentleman had misconstrued the provisions and grammatical effect of the Resolution, according to its sense and certainly according to its intention. There was no distinction in the Resolution between upstairs and downstairs, cellars and ground floors; and that argument might, therefore, stand over. There was one point which the hon. Gentleman missed, and which appeared to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to be relevant to the case, and it was this. He said it was unjust to draw a distinction between houses under and those above £20, and he complained of the severe incidence of the present house tax upon the Metropolis. The house tax might or might not be just to the Metropolis, and they ought not to do anything which would have the effect of aggravating it; but he could not admit to the hon. Gentleman that in that instance they were going to inflict any injustice by imposing, not a minute and complicated scale of charges, but a simple difference of doubling this charge, in itself a simple one, upon houses above £20. The hon. Gentleman said this was in no degree a fiscal question, and what he then set up for a supposition for himself, in the next moment he put into his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) mouth. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had never said this was not a fiscal question, but that it was mainly and chiefly to be decided upon other than fiscal grounds. He did not admit, therefore, that they were not to take into consideration the ability of parties to bear this charge, which looked to the extent of the premises as the index to the extent of the trade. As regards the question of the amount of occupation they might give to the police, it was presumable that very large establishments would give more occupation to the police than very small establishments with very limited business below £20 a year. There was another point which was not noticed by the hon. Gentleman, and it was this. As he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) understood the effect of the law, the imposition of this licence duty would, under the existing law, have the effect of making into shops, in the eye of the law, those coffee-houses which were not now shops. The effect of that would be that, although they will pay a licence duty—that is, a sum of 10s. 6d. on houses above £20—yet they would obtain relief, in some degree, from the house-tax, because, in becoming shops, they would be taxed at the lower rather than at the higher rate. He did not think it necessary to say more, because there were a variety of considerations which would be more conveniently discussed on the clauses.

MR. HARDY said, he did not intend to offer any opposition to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he had himself proposed one of a similar description in 1857. He wished, however, to guard himself against being committed on the question of the particular incidence of the tax, which they would have to consider hereafter. The view he took was that the tax should be imposed on places of public resort and entertainment, because they brought numbers of people together, and would be less likely to require the interference of the police if conducted under the responsibility of a licence. The evidence which was taken before the Committee of 1853-54 showed that the great evil arose from those houses which were kept open all night, and he recommended that those only should be taxed which were open after a certain hour at night, and before a certain hour in the morning. Such a provision would, he thought, cover all the worst class of eating-houses. Those which were open during the day and shut in the evening were harmless places of resort, and did not call for any inspection on the part of the police. But it was clearly proved before the Committee that when the public-houses and beershops were closed, the worst characters in a town resorted to the coffee-houses, temperance tets, shell-fish shops, and so on, which were kept open till four or five o'clock in the morning; and there could be little doubt that in those places beer and spirits were sold illicitly, because the police had no access to them. It appeared to him that those places only should be taxed which were kept open between ten o'clock at night and four o'clock in the morning.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would suggest that they should alter the sum of £20 to £25. It appeared rather hard that a man having a house rated at £19 a year should only pay 10s. 6d., while a man having a house rated at £1 more, should have to pay one guinea.

MR. PALK remarked, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had omitted to answer a very important question which had been raised by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets; that was, what constituted a refreshment-house? Would a shop in a country town, which sold biscuits, apples, and confectionery—for confectionery was particularly mentioned in the Bill—come under the designation of a house of refreshment? Nothing could be more vague than the terms in which it was at present described; and he was sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be the last person to allow the House to come to a decision on this subject without having a definition of a refreshment-house.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could assure the hon. Member he had not overlooked the question at all. He had stated generally, in his explanations to the House, and had likewise specified in the Bill, what was clearly understood to be the meaning of the term "refreshment-house." Various proposals had been made to modify or restrain that meaning, and the question was, when could they most conveniently consider these proposals? In his opinion, it was not convenient to do so at the present stage, when they could not introduce Amendments to limit the meaning of the term. The proper time for such a discussion would be when they were going through the clauses of the Bill, which defined and fixed the application of the principle. The only question now before the House was whether to any refreshment-house other than those which sold strong drink this obligation to take out a licence should apply. It appeared to him that the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Salomons) was inadmissible. If he was rightly advised of the indirect operation of the licences, the alteration proposed would have the effect of establishing very peculiar and anomalous relations with regard to the class of persons subject to the charge. For there would then be three classes. There would be a class of persons with houses up to £20 rental, paying 10s. 6d. for the licence, and not receiving any indirect relief through taking out a licence because they were not subject to house tax; and there would be a second class of persons with houses between £20 and £25, likewise paying only 10s. 6d. duty, but receiving indirect relief through having their houses rated as shops under the house tax. The third class would, of course, be those above £25. It was plain that su

Mr. Palk

ve dis
the
In pos
Cha
in wou
refre
the unde force ber woul
that c mittee
hours,
great being
One eff
be to word, a and cor
the pro
they pa
certainly
question,
same kn
ferent re
the Exch
LORD J
hon. Gent
chequer
not only
It was to
hon. Gentl supply the peal of cer
had induc wished, the right hon.
which he co
duties, if a would proba
THE CHA QUER said,
mained unse
affect the an cences. He of those who
the subject—
that it was re trustworthy e ground which cision to which
to the class of
and as to the Ireland and S materially affec

the measure. But as far as a conjecture, rather than an estimate, could be formed, the whole of the licences, both for wine and refreshment-houses, in England, Scotland, and Ireland would yield to the revenue between £60,000 and £70,000 a year. It was anticipated that the wine licences would supply by far the greatest sum.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to the proposal of the hon. Member for Leominster.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not in the least degree desire to put a negative on the proposal of the hon. Gentleman; but, as there were various particulars in which it was proposed to limit the application of the licence, he thought that they had better all be discussed at the time when they could insert in the Bill any Amendments they agreed upon.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he hoped the House would put a negative on the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that no man was to sell anything like victuals or refreshments without paying a 10s. 6d. duty, and that no man was to consume those victuals or refreshments, undefined as they were, without having a policeman to wait on him. The object of the Bill was to introduce the police into every man's house. It was a common boast that an Englishman's house was his castle; but it would cease to be his castle if he was not to be allowed to sell refreshments, or to receive any one within doors to consume them without the attendance and supervision of the police. There was some sense in placing restrictions on the sale of spirits or wine. If they wished to prevent drunkenness in those houses at night, let them be licensed and placed under the operation of a heavy duty. But they might depend on it that if this House was prepared to submit to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that all refreshment-houses were to pay a licence duty, and that every man who entered them was to be subject to the attendance of the police, at all events, the public would not submit to it. It was worthy of the Six Acts, and of Lord Castlereagh's days. It was said to be with the view of promoting the morality and improvement of the working classes that this system was to be introduced. One day they were told that the working classes were so much improved that the franchise might be lowered to £6, and the next that the working classes must neither eat nor drink without having the police to watch them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not regard it as a police question, and would not give up the fiscal portion of the proposition. But, if so, the right hon. Gentleman ought to tell them how much he expected this tax would produce. If the sum were large, it would show how obnoxious and oppressive was the burden; and if it were a good tax, it ought to be extended to Scotland. He hoped the Committee would accede to the proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. LIDDELL observed, that it might be necessary to give the police control over coffee-shops and temperance-houses which were the resorts of disorderly characters; but that it should be limited to those houses which were open at certain hours.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he conceived that they were proceeding in a very irregular manner, as they were called upon to agree that refreshment-houses should be licensed before they had really determined what refreshment-houses were. As to those refreshment-houses in which no tippling or the sale of spirits took place, he could not see why any licence should be put upon them. He, for one, wished to see the sale of light wines extended, but he agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury that it would be most objectionable to have the intrusion of policemen where a small trade in refreshments was carried on. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the question was as to the capability of the house, but looking to the Metropolis, the distinction would not hold water, because there a smaller house might be rated higher than a house elsewhere. The police could see everything which took place in a baker's shop from the outside, and, if they had a right of inspection, no baker would be able to let lodgings, because people would not live where they would be subject to such an annoyance.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought it was not a very convenient course of proceeding to discuss police regulations in a Committee of Ways and Means. The hon. Member for Finsbury was mistaken if he supposed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not given any information of the amount of revenue which would be raised by these licences. The right hon. Gentleman told them that if England, Ireland, and Scotland, were all included, the sum upon which he calculated from wine and refreshment licences, was £60,000 or £70,000 a year. As the principal part was expected to be produced by licences for the sale of wine, he was correct in describing the amount estimated from refreshment licences as infinitesimally small, and he thought the Committee should look with great jealousy and suspicion on these small means of meeting a great deficiency which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself created. There was every probability that by modifications in the Bill the small amount which the right hon. Gentleman anticipated would be still further diminished, and the result would be to inflict great inconvenience and annoyance on the very classes which it was the alleged intention of the Government to benefit, without obtaining any revenue worth considering. He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) with respect to the class of houses that ought to be taxed; and if the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would go to a division he should support him.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, it seemed to him to be a most extraordinary proposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ask them to vote for the Resolution, on the understanding that he would modify it in Committee. What was the proposition before the Committee? It was,

"That, towards the supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, levied, and paid to and for the use of Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, for and upon the several licences hereafter mentioned, the respective rates and duties the following licences—that is to say, for every refreshment-house."

Now, they were asked to vote for that without knowing what was really to be considered as a refreshment-house or the character of the house to be licensed. If there were a large number of refreshment-houses in London kept in a disorderly manner, why did not the Government bring in a Bill, as in the case of gaming-houses, giving the police a power of inspection? Suppose the right hon. Gentleman had had a Budget in hand at the time the gambling-houses were put down, would he have proposed to put a tax on them for the purpose of making them liable to police regulations instead of bringing in a straightforward Bill for the purpose? Take another class of houses—where promiscuous assignations were supposed to be made—would he have recourse to a system of licensing those mansions if he wanted to bring them under police regulations? The right hon. Gentleman's argument was simply this:—"I tax all refreshment-houses, good as well as bad, and I tax the bad in order to give the police power over them." The Resolution was drawn up in a most unqualified form, and he hoped the House would not trust to what might be done in Committee on the Bill, but insist on its being considerably modified before giving its assent to the present stage.

Lord John Manners

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and learned Member had totally misrepresented what had fallen from him. The Resolution did not make a declaration that every refreshment-house should be bound to take out a licence, but simply stated the price at which refreshment licences should be issued. It was quite a different thing to fix the price of a licence and to define the class of houses to which it was applicable. The only question was, did they think that there was some description of refreshment-houses to which the licence ought not to be applicable?

MR. AYRTON said, he had no objection to place under the supervision of the police, all houses which in any way promoted public immorality; but that was a question which ought to be considered by the Home Secretary, and brought under the consideration of the House distinctly as a question affecting public morals. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman was tacking an important question of morality to a Money Bill, and thereby excluding the House of Lords from all power of taking cognizance of it. At one moment the question was treated as one of police, at another entirely of finance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to define the class of houses which were to pay this tax exactly, and not in terms which would enable him to tax all refreshment-houses. He hoped the House would decide this question, not by mere voting power, but on considerations of justice. One-half of the whole shop tax of the country was at the present time paid by the Metropolis, a result which arose from the standard being fixed at £20. If this Bill passed, every lodging-house keeper in London who served his lodger with bread and butter and coffee for breakfast in his attic—and this was a very general practice in the Metropolis—would have to pay the tax. To go on voting taxes merely according to voting power, and not on the principle of justice, would be teaching the people a lesson—which if a Reform Bill were passed—though he was by no means anxious for such a Bill as that now before the House—and the power were placed in their hands, they might not be disinclined to act upon it.

Motion made, and Question put,

“That towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,

There shall be charged, levied, and paid, unto and for the use of Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, for and upon the several Licences hereinafter mentioned, the respective Rates and Duties following; that is to say:—

For every Licence to keep a Refreshment House,—	£	s.	d.
If the house and premises in respect of which such Licence shall be granted shall be under the rent and value of £20 a year	0	10	6”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 173, Noes 103: Majority 70.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the words—

“And if the same shall be of the rent or value of £20 a year or upwards 1 1 0”
—stand part of the proposed Resolution.

MR. AYRTON said, he should then submit to the Committee that if refreshment-houses were to be subjected to taxation, there ought to be one uniform tax upon all of them, and not the graduated tax proposed. Hitherto the taxes on particular trades were uniform, and had no reference to the value of the houses in which the trades were carried on. If that uniformity were to be set aside, then the proper way of imposing a trade tax would be to graduate it according to the income of the tradesman, and not the rent of the place in which he carried on his business. All teadealers, whatever the amount of their business or the rent of their shops, paid a uniform licence of half-a-guinea for the purpose of enabling the customs to secure the revenue. He would therefore move as an Amendment that the proposed tax should be reduced to 10s. 6d.

Amendment proposed to leave out £1 1s., and insert 10s. 6d.

MR. HARDY said, there seemed to him to be no reasonable argument for having two different scales. As the Bill stood it gave power to the police to inspect refreshment-houses, but, unless the keepers of such houses were licensed to sell wine they could not be punished as persons keeping houses of a disorderly character. His object would be to make them amenable to punishment in such cases, but when the object was effected he did not see the advantage of maintaining an increased rate as regarded the higher class of houses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there might be a uniformity of licence in the case of other trades, but it was not a good precedent from which to argue. There was no part of our system of taxation which it would be more desirable to revise than this system of licences. The little village teadealer felt it an extreme hardship that he should be called upon to pay as much as was paid by Fortnum and Mason for a licence. A complicated scale in this instance he did not recommend; but that there should be some distinction between the rate paid by large and small refreshment-houses was, he thought, a reasonable proposal. He was not inclined to depart from the terms of the Resolution.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was not strictly applicable to the case before the House. If the right hon. Gentleman thought that the whole system of licences needed revisal that was no reason for imposing the tax proposed by the clause. If the system of taxation on trades were shortly to be revised, it would be better to impose only one uniform tax on refreshment-houses, because the imposition of different taxes on different classes of refreshment-houses would make more difficult the adjustment of trade licences hereafter. He should support the proposal of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER declared that he did not hint, or promise, or say anything on the subject of revising the system. He merely had said that the system was bad which imposed an uniform rate on the exceedingly small dealer and on the man who did a very large business. He thought the making of some distinction was advisable.

ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, this tax would fall very heavily upon traders in the Metropolis. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give way, and that a uniform tax would be imposed.

Question put, “That £1 1s. stand part of the Question.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 88: Majority 71

Original Question put and agreed to.

Resolved, That the words—

“And for every Licence to be granted as hereinafter mentioned to any licensed keeper of a refreshment house to sell therein by retail Foreign and British Wine to be consumed in such house or on the premises thereto—

	£	s.	d.
If such house and premises shall be under the rent or value of £50 a year	3	3	0
And if the same shall be of the rent or value of £50 a year or upwards	5	5	0"

—stand part of the proposed Resolution.

Upon the next Section—

"And for every Licence to be taken out by any person for the selling by retail in any shop of Foreign Wine not to be consumed in the house or shop or on the premises where sold, if the house and premises shall be under the rent or value of £50 a year, £2 2s."

LORD JOHN MANNERS inquired whether colonial wines would come under the class of British or foreign wines.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, they would be classed as foreign wines.

On the Section that—

"If the same shall be of the rent or value of £50 a year or upwards, £3 3s."

MR. AYRTON wished to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant to keep up the difference between the licences granted to wholesale and retail traders. The licence at present, he believed, was £10 10s. for persons who dealt wholesale, and £2 2s. or £3 3s. for persons who dealt retail. Preserving that difference would not promote the consumption of unadulterated wine. The difference between the taxes ought to be abolished, and a uniform rate should be established. At present the law was evaded by selling sample bottles. Without they had a uniform licence of seven or eight guineas, the wines sold by the retailer not to be consumed upon the premises would be of that charming character which M. Chevalier described as partaking more of the water of the Seine than the juice of the grape, just as our London porter was said to have an affinity for the water of the Thames. He therefore proposed that the charge for the licence should be uniformly between five to ten guineas.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member had certainly raised a very fair question for discussion; but he did not see that any material convenience was likely to result from the change proposed. The wholesale dealer was a man who usually dealt in large quantities of wine, or wished to have the power of doing so, and he therefore paid ten guineas for his licence. But it would be scarcely fair to charge the retail dealer, whose shop was open for the sale of other articles, so large a sum, and he could not see that any practical inconvenience would arise from maintaining a distinction, and he thought he had given a sufficient definition to secure the line between the two classes. A five or seven guinea licence would press so heavily upon the retail dealer that he would be required to dispose of wine some hundreds of pounds in value before he could realise any profit. If on the other hand they were to reduce the ten guinea wine licence to five or six guineas he was afraid the next step they would be called upon to take would be to reduce the ten guinea spirit licence.

Alderman Salomons

MR. DARBY GRIFFITHS said, he was not disposed to take a puritanical view of the question, but he should like to know the description of shops likely to be engaged in the retail of wine. If wine was to be sold at every shop at which tea, sugar, and the like were now purchased, the result would be a great social change. He had hardly expected that it was intended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give facilities for the dissemination of wine in so profuse a manner. He was, therefore, in favour of the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) being adopted, for he thought without it the Bill would not contain a sufficient check to the evils to which it would give rise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, undoubtedly he had proceeded on the principle that there was no objection to the extension of the facilities for the sale of wine not to be consumed on the premises, but precautions would be taken to prevent the abuse of that power.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the words—

"And for every Licence to be taken out by any person for the selling by retail in any shop of Foreign Wine not to be consumed in the house or shop or on the premises where sold—

	£	s.	d.
If the house and premises shall be under the rent or value of £50 a year	2	2	0
And if the same shall be of the rent or value of 50 a year or upwards	3	3	0"

—stand part of the proposed Resolution.

Resolution to be reported forthwith.

House resumed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would then move that the Resolutions just passed should be reported forthwith, in order that they might be inserted in the Bill in Committee. They would then form part of the Bill, and the Committee would then have an opportunity of voting on the whole of the clauses of the Bill. He would then reprint the Bill, and it would go forth at once as a whole for further consideration. He would not make the Motion if it was against the general wish of the House.

Resolution reported,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,

There shall be charged, levied, and paid unto and for the use of Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, for and upon the several Licences hereinafter mentioned, the respective Rates and Duties following; that is to say:—

For every Licence to keep a Refreshment House—

£ s. d.

If the house and premises in respect of which such Licence shall be granted shall be under the rent and value of £20 a year 0 10 6

And if the same shall be of the rent or value of £20 a year or upwards 1 1 0

And for every Licence to be granted as hereinafter mentioned to any licensed keeper of a refreshment house to sell therein by retail Foreign and British Wine to be consumed in such house or on the premises belonging thereto—

£ s. d.

If such house and premises shall be under the rent and value of £50 a year 3 3 0

And if the same shall be of the rent or value of £50 a year or upwards 5 5 0

And for every Licence to be taken out by any person for the selling by retail in any shop of Foreign Wine not to be consumed in the house or shop or on the premises where sold—

£ s. d.

If the house and premises shall be under the rent or value of £50 a year 2 2 0

And if the same shall be of the rent or value of £50 a year or upwards 3 3 0"

Resolution agreed to.

Instruction to the Committee on Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill that they have power to make provision accordingly.

Committee of Ways and Means to sit again To-morrow.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. PALK said, he rose to move that the Bill be committed that day six months. If a reason were required for the proposal he was about to make, it would be found in the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in placing upon the notice paper Amendments that would to a great extent alter the principle of the Bill, and refusing to consent to recommit the Bill in order that it might be printed and the House enabled fully to understand the bearing of the clauses which he proposed. But there were other reasons that led him to take a course that would again raise a discussion on the principle of the Bill. The first reason was, that the main principle of the Bill was to extend the licensing system as far as circumstances would permit it to be extended, or as far as the demand for wines could be created. Now, he proposed to show that neither for the comforts nor the convenience of the people, nor even for the purpose of raising revenue, was such a course required or necessary. He would, on the contrary, show that unrestricted competition in the sale of alcoholic drinks tended to injure the health, the morals, and the happiness of the people. The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) had clearly proved that proposition in a speech delivered by him on the introduction of his Beer Bill in 1857. This was by no means a new idea of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It had been introduced as long ago as the reign of William and Mary, but the evil became so great that in the reign of George II. the Legislature, even in those days, which, compared with the present, were supposed to be degenerate days, was obliged to pass strong restrictive laws on the subject. A duty of £20 was imposed on retailing licences for the sale of spirits, and no licence was given to any person to keep an alehouse or retail brandy but at a general meeting of justices of the peace. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now sought, for the first time, to destroy the whole control of the magistrates; he attempted to cast a slur on that body, and proposed that the only person to have a voice in the matter should be the Supervisor of Excise. But, looking at the Bill as a fiscal measure, he asked whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown any good reasons for extending the trade in alcoholic drinks. By a return obtained in 1855 it appeared that there was a beerhouse for every thirty-eight males and females over twenty-one years of age, and one for eighty-seven males of all ages, so that the accommodation for the sale of spirituous liquors was now sufficient for the wants of the country. But even if it could be proved that there was any want of houses for the sale of such liquors, there existed ample machinery for increasing them to any extent that might be required. The system proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was tried in Liverpool, and the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to it in his speech the other evening. He said that when the magistrates of Liverpool hesitated in increasing the licences drunkenness increased, but that, on the other hand, when they extended the licences drunkenness decreased; and he instanced that as a contradiction of the prevailing opinion that a multiplication of the means of drinking increased drunkenness itself. But what had been the fact? The magistrates of Liverpool certainly exercised the powers they possessed and extended the licences, but they had to increase their police, and the evil of drunkenness rose to such an extent that through their representatives in Parliament they asked for and obtained the Committee that sat under the presidency of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. That Committee reported that there should be only one species of Excise licence granted. The Bill created a most extraordinary anomaly. The magistrates were to have a control over the character of the houses, but none over the number to be licensed. At present the magistrates had a control over the indefinite multiplication of licences; but the present Bill took away from them all such control. By a new clause put on the paper any house called a refreshment-house, on payment of the duty, unless notice in writing was given by the Lord Mayor, police magistrates, or the justice of the peace, that it was not a confectioner's shop or an eating-house, or that it was a disorderly house, no matter what the character of the applicant might be, was entitled to a wine licence. The applicant for a licence might be a man or woman of indifferent character, but unless upon these grounds, which gave no security for the respectability of the applicant, no one had the power to hinder the granting of a licence. That was a matter of serious importance in the view of public morality, because such a provision at once broke down every barrier against vice and immorality, which Parliament had been endeavouring to raise with much labour and great expense. He (Mr. Palk) could not perceive what was the real principle of the measure. Was it a free-trade or a protective measure? Indeed, he was wholly at a loss to discover whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a

Mr. Palk

Free-trader or a Protectionist. If he was a Free-trader, upon what principle did he impose restrictions upon the sale of wine; and if he was a Protectionist, upon what principle did he impose a duty upon articles of our own manufacture? The right hon. Gentleman had said, that in introducing this measure he was following the policy of Sir Robert Peel in carrying free trade into the sale of wine. But a gentleman of great authority, at a Manchester meeting, declared that no one had any right to talk about this proposal as a development of free trade, with which it had nothing to do. The whole question was one of public safety, which would justify any amount of interference, if it would justify interference at all. Another speaker, Mr. Barker, denied with equal force that free trade had anything to do with the present scheme of the Government. The Bill, in fact, combined all the objections that any one might entertain for free trade, with those which hon. Members had so constantly advanced against protection. He would venture to say that the right hon. Gentlemen was totally ignorant of those high and noble principles which induced Sir Robert Peel to make such sacrifices—to sacrifice, in short, the great party which he had led, and to forfeit, for a time, at least, the estimation of his friends. His principle was that of remitting all taxes upon food and raw material—to raise and elevate the artisan and the labourer by placing him in a better pecuniary position—to raise him by education, and to show him that there was but little difference between the working man and the gentleman, except in social position. The course the Chancellor of the Exchequer was pursuing was the exact converse of that of Sir Robert Peel. For pure fiscal purposes, and for the sake of a revenue he had parted from that he might make a treaty with France for which he had received no reciprocity, the right hon. Gentleman had created a deficit which with singular infelicity he sought to make up from the necessities of the poor and the improvident. By alluring people to drink wine to which they were unaccustomed, the right hon. Gentleman hoped to raise a paltry sum of £60,000, to gain which he proposed to pass a measure fraught with all the evils and misery that the House had been for years seeking to remove. During the last fifty years a large number of earnest and sincere men had been doing all they could to promote the education and moral improvement of the people. They were good, unobtrusive men, who did not content themselves with making grand speeches in the House of Commons, but who went about their work steadily and perseveringly. They were called by various names, though that by which they were most commonly known was the "teetotallers." He knew that that name generally excited a smile, but he did not understand why, for he had the pleasure of knowing many teetotallers, and he believed they practised the self-denial which they inculcated. They had, however, been very successful; they had extended their organization throughout the country, and one of their principal aids was the temperance coffee-house, which enabled a man to obtain his meals without the risk of being tempted to indulge in intoxicating liquors. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer stepped in and broke down the barrier which the friends of temperance had raised by insisting that every house of entertainment should be licensed. Under the proposed arrangement the modest, sober coffee-house would no longer be able to hold its ground against the attractive places of resort which would be established for the sale of intoxicating drink, and would be tempted to enter the same dangerous trade. There was a Divine appeal which said "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" but this was not the rule of guidance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Whether, as a question of free trade, fiscal arrangement, or social policy, the right hon. Gentleman had no right to force such a Bill on the attention of the House. As a fiscal measure it was wicked and unnecessary; and as a social measure it was opposed to the interests of public morality, and he should have considered himself wanting in his duty to himself and his constituents if he had refrained, even on that occasion, unusual though it were, from raising his voice against the measure.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,' instead thereof."

MR. PACKE said, he rose to second the Motion. Licences were generally imposed for the purpose of controlling immorality, but the proposed Bill simply imposed licences for revenue. He was opposed to the wine licences, but he entertained a far stronger objection to the licensing of refreshment-houses. The lodges in the public Parks, where oranges, ginger beer, and cakes were supplied, and every little shop where a child bought a cheesecake or a gingerbread nut, would be obliged to take out a licence. There was no more reason why a 10s. 6d. duty should be imposed on these refreshment-houses than on bakers' or butchers' or any other shops. The whole measure was a gross infringement of the liberty of the subject, and he hoped the House would pause before it countenanced so extraordinary a course of legislation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hardly supposed that it was desired to resume at any length the discussion which was brought to a close on Monday evening. His hon. Friend who spoke last did not appear to have said anything in the nature of an objection which went to the root of the Bill. In the first place, he begged leave to assure the hon. Gentleman that he had not construed accurately the clause as it stood. Its scope was far more limited than he appeared to suppose. There was no question of compelling every person to take out a licence who sold anything to be eaten or drunk. The Bill was subject to the most important limitations, which he should not go into then, because they had much better be discussed on the clauses. As regarded the speech of the Mover of the Amendment, he admitted that it dealt broadly with the whole subject. The hon. Gentleman, however, made an imputation upon him to the effect that he had exhibited great distrust of the magistracy, which was certainly not warranted. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had more truly said the other evening that the powers in the hands of the magistrates were enormous, and that it was necessary, as a matter of justice, to limit them. That was much nearer the truth, for the powers were much too large, and they were limited in the Bill. He had listened with great attention to the arguments of the hon. Member for South Devon, and he readily admitted that his conscientious opinions were entitled to every respect. But the great fallacy with regard to this Bill was that hon. Gentlemen declined to make those distinctions which lay deep in the nature of the case. They referred to the failure of the Beer Bill, though he must say that, even with regard to the Beer Bill its failure was one of a far more qualified kind, and related more to certain peculiar parishes and districts than hon. Gentlemen were willing to admit. But however that might be, the present Bill was altogether of a different nature. He propounded it as a deliberate attempt to improve the means of supplying refreshments to the public, and of enabling the people to find fermented liquors at the same places where eatables were to be had. After having fully argued the question on a former occasion, he did not think it would be respectful to the House if he went over them again, but he hoped in Committee the hon. Gentleman would reconsider the propositions he had made.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to:—Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Every Person keeping a Shop entitled to take out Licence to retail Wine not to be consumed therein).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved an Amendment for the purpose of restricting the sale of wine not to be consumed on the premises to wine in bottle only.

Amendment agreed to, as was an Amendment making the clause applicable to British as well as foreign wines.

MR. PALK said, this clause raised the question so much discussed, namely, that any person keeping a shop for the sale of goods or commodities might sell wine in bottle, and he wished to ask whether they would be under the control of the police.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that every person keeping a shop would be entitled to take out a licence for the sale of wine in bottle, and that they would not be under the control of the police.

MR. WOODE said, he would propose the insertion of the words, "other than foreign wines" after the word "commodities" to prevent the holders of ten guinea licences under the existing law from exchanging those licences for three guinea licences under the present Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, that generally the term wholesale dealer meant a person who sold to the retailer and did not sell direct to the consumer, but in the wine trade it had a statutory meaning—namely, a person who sold more than a certain quantity whether to a retailer or a consumer. A licence under this Bill would enable the dealer to sell any quantity, small or large, and render the present wholesale licence of £10 10s. unnecessary.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause had been considered by the legal advisers of the Government, and they thought the sale of "goods and commodities" was clearly defined, and that there was no fear of their enabling persons to substitute a retail licence for a wholesale licence. But he might further observe, that the second clause would prevent such substitution taking place. He understood that the wholesale dealer had a right to do everything which was proposed now to be given to the retail dealer.

MR. AYRTON said, a distinction must be drawn between the terms. He believed a wholesale dealer would not be entitled to sell less than two gallons, and if a man sold less than one dozen, then he would be a retailer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, they had constituted a licence which was to enable a person to sell wine by retail in general. Then as to what would be a selling of wine by retail was determined by the second clause.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, there were two classes of retailers of wine at present—the licenced victuallers and the persons who sold quantities of not less than two gallons. If the clause was passed as it stood, no man would pay ten guineas for a wholesale licence when he could obtain the same power by taking out a retail licence, which would enable him to sell any quantity.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he understood that any person who kept a shop for the sale of any goods or commodities might, if he chose, sell wine by retail not to be consumed on the premises; but that did not subject him to the control of the police. Now, he wished to know how they were going to prevent a person from selling wine retail to be consumed on the premises.

MR. W. EWART said, he apprehended the clause was sufficiently clear to prevent any evasion, as the parties would only be entitled to sell in bottles.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, there were certain persons to whom the granting of licences for the retail of wine was limited. The object of the Bill was simply to extend that privilege to persons keeping refreshment-houses. It was clear that a man who only took out a three-guinea licence could not effect the same sale as a man who took out a ten guinea licence.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask the meaning of the words "without producing or having any other licence or authority."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the words were not directed to any other purpose than signifying the intention of the law that there should be no control by the magistrates or any other authority. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Woodd), he proposed to adopt the words "other than foreign wines;" and to add "or who shall have taken out licences as dealers in wine," because he thought it reasonable to allow the holders of wholesale wine licences to take out retail licences also, if they pleased. He did not think that there was any danger of these shops becoming drinking places, and he was sure that it would not be wise to subject the mere passing of bottles through the shops to the surveillance of the police.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to ask whether there was anything to prevent the retail dealer, to whom they were about to give a £3 3s. licence, from selling out of his shop to anybody.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the object of the 2nd clause was to prevent that.

MR. PALK said, he put the case of a large tailor who kept a large number of hands—working probably on the premises—what was to prevent him from taking out a licence and retailing wine to his workmen?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was nothing to prevent such a man from retailing British wines at present in the way described, but he never heard of the practice.

Amendment agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would propose as an Amendment, after the word "retail," to add the words "and in reputed quart bottles only." He believed that those words would afford a check against the abuse of the power of selling wines in shops where it was not to be drunk.

MR. CROSS said, that the Act would be practically invalid unless wine was allowed to be sold in fictitious or reputed quart bottles.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the object of these words appeared to be to prevent the drinking of wine on the premises by selling it in quart bottles. He did not see the use of this restriction, and it would be very hard if a poor man in case of sickness wanting a glass of wine was not allowed to get it unless he took a quart. If he could do so he would put it in his pocket, and would not care to stop and consume it on the premises. It would be going quite far enough to provide that wine should be sold in bottle only.

MR. MALINS said, he saw no reason why persons might not buy less than a reputed quart bottle. He did not see that there ought to be any restriction upon a person buying a pint or even a half-pint bottle.

MR. AYRTON said, the restriction was intended to discourage intemperance; and, if it were not imposed, there would be nothing to prevent a person buying a small quantity of wine in a bottle, and going out upon the pavement and drinking it, or in other ways evading the statute.

LORD FERMOY said, he believed that the measure could not be better defined than as a reputed quart bottle, and hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adhere to that description.

MR. ALDENMAN SALOMONS said, the words "in reputed quart bottles" might imply that the sale must consist of two bottles, and he suggested that the words should be substituted "in not less than one reputed quart bottle."

MR. W. EWART said, it appeared to him that, as the object of the Bill was to diffuse throughout the country a taste for wine, there should be no unnecessary restrictions on the sale.

MR. MALINS thought that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's object was to prevent these wine-sellers from allowing wine to be consumed on the premises, his plan for effecting that object was absurd. The right hon. Gentleman might as well have proposed that the wine-seller should not keep a corkscrew, nor his customer bring one with him in his pocket. Why should these people not be allowed to sell wine in any manner that might be most convenient to them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was prepared to take the sense of the Committee against the insertion of these words, because he thought they contained a bad principle.

LORD FERMOY contended that it was necessary to draw a line of distinction somewhere to prevent these wine sellers from using their places of business as public-houses. A poor man could obtain his glass of wine at the public-house.

MR. HENLEY said, the experience of the working of the Beer Act ought not to be passed over in discussing this point.

By that Act a privilege was given to sell beer not to be consumed on the premises, and this was the sort of thing which used frequently to happen in houses of that description. A man would go in with a quart pot in his hand, and ask for "a quart of your best fourpenny." No sooner was it handed over than down it went like a flash of lightning, and then the man's confederate, who was waiting outside, would lay an information against the beerseller for selling beer to be consumed on the premises without a licence. The same thing would happen to the shopkeepers who might take to the retail sale of wine if the Legislature trapped them into selling it in open pints or glasses. A man would go in, ask for a small quantity, which is down his throat in a moment, and then the shopkeeper would be hauled up before the magistrates. It would be no use for him to plead that he could not help the man drinking the wine, the magistrates would say, "No doubt it is a hard case, but here is the law, and the law says your liquor is not to be consumed on the premises." A man could not play such tricks with a bottle—the neck of the bottle would stick in his throat; he could not dispose of the wine with the same rapidity as the beer in the quart pot. It was mainly in consequence of such practices as these, he believed, that the number of licences to retail beer not to be consumed on the premises had very much decreased of late years. Unless some proper safeguard were adopted, so many informations would be laid against the dealers in wine that they would soon give up selling it, as had already happened in regard to the sale of beer. He knew that owing to that very cause the beerhouses which formerly existed had almost all vanished from certain districts.

SIR MORTON PETO said, the returns showed that the number of licences for the sale of beer to be drunk on the premises was 39,945, but of licences to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises, the number was only 2,715. He concurred in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken as to the necessity of taking precautions against wine-sellers being victimised by the devices of informers.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, the substantial question was how to establish a line of demarcation between the sale of wine to be consumed on the premises and its sale for consumption off the premises. The sale in quart bottles was a well-known and sufficiently practical test in such matters.

Mr. Henley

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he thought that the sale in quart bottles would almost do away with the sale of wine by retail. He would suggest a medium course—the pint bottle.

COLONEL SYKES said, he objected to the use of the words "reputed quart bottle." They ought to adopt a legal measure, if any at all.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was unwilling to hinder the progress of the Bill, but he would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the word "pint" would be preferable.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had listened as dispassionately as he could to that great bottle controversy. An important legal safeguard was involved in this matter, and he had no doubt that the argument of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire was as sound as it was lively. All he desired was to give every practical accommodation to the public consistently with the prevention of fraud.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take his stand on the quart bottle. It was a good rule to stand upon what had been already adopted. If the wine-sellers were allowed to sell pints of wine, a man that wanted to tipple might carry pint flagons in his pocket, and, having purchased a pint of wine from one of these wine-sellers, he could go outside of the shop, drink it in the street, and return again immediately for another pint, and by the repetition of that process get drunk. But if the wine-seller were prohibited from selling less than a quart, that tipping could not be carried on so easily.

MR. W. EWART said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would stand by the pint bottle.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that if the pint bottle were admitted, all the inconveniences so graphically described by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) would be aggravated. He did not think the use of a pint bottle would prevent a man from drinking off wine like a flash of lightning. He would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should stand by the larger bottle.

MR. HENLEY said, no doubt he had seen the lazzaroni of Naples get the contents of a bottle of wine down their throats in a very continuous and rapid stream. He would recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman, however, to walk into the refreshment-room and try how long it would take to empty a pint bottle by putting the neck in his mouth. He (Mr. Henley) thought he would find the operation a slow one.

MR. WOODED inquired whether there was anything to prevent wine being bought, for the purpose of being drunk at home, in houses licensed to sell it for consumption on the premises.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not at all.

MR. WOODED: Then he would have the word quart retained.

MR. CLAY expressed an objection to any proposal which would offer additional inducements to curtail the size of pint and quart measures, which was diminishing daily. If "reputed" quantities were to be sanctioned at all, he thought the quart was the one which the House ought to adopt.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, it was a mistake to suppose that a reputed quart was not a defined and ascertained measure. It was already provided by an Act of 11 and 12 Vict. that a reputed quart should be one-sixth of a gallon. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would stand by the quart; if not, he (Mr. James) should make a "pint" of doing it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he could corroborate the statement as to the limited capacity of "reputed" measures. A reputed quart had been declared to be one-sixth of a gallon; but any hon. Member who might wish to try the experiment in the refreshment-room would find, he thought, that it would take three reputed pints to make one quart bottle.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 90: Majority 57.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER then proposed to insert the words "in reputed quart or pint bottles only."

SIR MORTON PETO suggested that the words "Imperial quart or pint" would be more suitable.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE thought no object would be gained by it. They had decided that wine sold by retail should be in bottles.

MR. WARNER thought the quantity should be defined.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were objections to inserting the legal measure, which might bring them into collision with the Customs regulations.

MR. M'CANN said the size of bottles was so rapidly diminishing that he was reminded of the Motion introduced into the Irish House of Commons by Sir F. Flood, to the effect that every quart bottle should hold a quart. [Mr. Bass: No, but hold a pint.] No, that might do for England; but they liked good measure in Ireland, and the Motion was that every quart bottle should hold a quart.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would make inquiries, and insert words to render the definition more clear, if it were found necessary. The prima facie inference was that a pint was not a quart.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (What shall be selling by Retail).

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to ask whether the wholesale dealer would have a right to sell a less quantity than two gallons?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the intention of the clause was to confine the retail dealer to the sale of one dozen of wine at a time to one customer.

MR. SPOONER said, he would then inquire if the wholesale dealer would have a right to sell a less quantity than at present?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not without a retail licence.

MR. AYRTON said, that a person who took out a wholesale licence could not sell less than two gallons, and the right hon. Gentleman now proposed every sale of foreign wine, in less quantity than two gallons, should be deemed a sale by retail. He did not say that he might not sell more than that. If the clause stood in its present shape there would be an end of all wholesale wine licences.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he saw no reason why a retail dealer might not, under the operation of the clause, sell a dozen dozens of wine in a single day, provided each dozen were sold at a different time, and thus at once interfere with the profit of the wholesale dealer and defraud the revenue.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, no doubt the law might be evaded. He thought the wine would come into the retailer's possession from the wholesale dealers, the same as the beer came to the beer-sellers from the large brewers. In that case no practical injury would be inflicted on the wholesale dealers.

MR. HENLEY said, at present, persons could not buy less than two gallons of spirits or wine without going to a publican. He thought that a person who took out a wine licence ought to be placed on the same footing as a publican.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the law might be evaded to a great extent by such dishonest acts as those referred to by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, by the cumbrous process of making out separate Bills; but he did not believe it would reach to the extent of injuring the wholesale dealer. Publicans were not limited by their licences as to the quantity they sold. It was not proposed to interfere with them by this clause.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he should like to know whether a party of a dozen gentlemen, or a larger number, dining together—such a case, for instance, as that of Her Majesty's Ministers taking their whitebait dinner at Greenwich—could, under the operation of the clause, be served with only a dozen bottles of wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that he did not conceive there would be any limitation in such a case.

MR. DUTTON suggested an alteration in the clause which would protect the wholesale dealer.

MR. M'CANN said, as he understood the clause, it meant that every man of the company who dined together could get a dozen.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Permitting drinking Wine in a neighbouring House, Shed, &c., with intent to evade the Provisions of the Act, to be deemed drinking on the Premises).

MR. WARNER said, he would propose to insert the words "or in the open air in the immediate neighbourhood of the shop or premises."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that such words were not necessary, for evasion was not likely, in this country, to take place in that form; and it might sometimes inflict on parties very great hardships.

MR. AYRTON suggested the substitution of the word premises for house, which would cover a cricket or bowling-green.

Sir William Miles

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he saw no objection to the substitution of the one word for the other.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Who shall be deemed to keep a Refreshment House).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to remove one or two misapprehensions as to the effect of this clause. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment, for the purpose of throwing the Bill over at this stage, appeared to consider that this clause obliged all persons selling refreshments to take out a licence. Now, he wished to observe that the clause was limited in two most important particulars. In the first place, the victuals or refreshment was to be consumed on the premises, and in the next place the sale of victuals or refreshment was to constitute the purpose for which the House was kept open, and was not to be accidental, secondary, or occasional. For instance, if a lodging-house keeper engaged to supply some of his lodgers with victuals, that would not bring him within the operation of the clause. Still, he thought it would never do to indicate by name certain places which would be excepted from the Act, such as temperance hotels, coffee-shops, shell-fish shops, and other places of public resort. This was recommended by the Committee, but he did not think their Report would be a safe guide in this particular.

MR. HARDY said, he would propose that all places kept open to the public for refreshments between the hours of ten o'clock at night and four o'clock in the morning should be deemed refreshment-houses. He would next propose that the licences should be compulsory on all persons who kept such houses; and then, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to carry out the clause as it stood, it would be necessary to strike out the words in the 26th line, and insert "refreshment-houses kept open between ten and four o'clock at night." That alteration would carry out the views of the Committee, and would, he thought, be most desirable. There was no evidence against eating-houses which were kept open only during the day; but the police declared that they could often not clear the streets at night because of refreshment-houses which were open when other places were shut up. He had heard that in some of those night refreshment-houses it was just as easy to get gin as coffee; but the liquor was brought in a coffee-cup, with a cream jug at hand, to prevent suspicion. At the proper time he should propose clauses inflicting penalties on those who kept their houses open between the hours named without taking out a licence, and empowering the police to inspect such refreshment-houses. He thought it would also be necessary to have a further clause to place refreshment-houses that were open at night upon the same footing as beer-shops, and that if the proprietors of those places knowingly permitted prostitutes, gamblers, or other bad characters to assemble, they should be liable to the same penalties as beer-shop-keepers were exposed to. In the case of a third offence, the licence should be suspended for a year. He submitted these suggestions in the cause of good order, and he hoped they would meet with the approval of the Committee.

MR. AYRTON remarked, that the words proposed by the hon. Gentleman would fulfil all the objects they had in view, and they would place a practical line of demarcation between those houses which were to be licensed and those that were not.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would accept the proposal of his hon. Friend. If he did so, it would save a great deal of discussion upon the subsequent clauses, for it was a very serious question to consider what houses were to be subjected to the visits of the police. The right hon. Gentleman had relied upon the words "kept for the purpose," but were not boarding-houses kept for the purpose of selling victuals? Were those respectable establishments to be subjected to visits from policemen with black beards, red beards, and beards of every colour, at any hour, turning all the inhabitants topsy-survy? He thought it would be better to make this a tentative measure, and if further restrictions should by experience be found to be necessary, it would be easy to introduce them, but it would be most improper to make the measure too oppressive in the first instance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would admit there was much force in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. There was much truth in the remark that it would be well to proceed tentatively in the first instance, and, if mischiefs should be shown to exist afterwards, it would be easy to remedy them at a future time. If he adopted the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, he apprehended the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles) could not proceed with his proposed limitation in country places, nor should he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proceed with his limitation as to open shops. He would wish to know, however, whether the hon. Member intended to include cigar-shops in the words "refreshment,, resort, or entertainment;" for those shops were open at night, and were not of the best class of houses. He did not refer to large divans, but to a multitude of small shops, which should be subjected to the same restrictions as other shops that were open at the same hours. Then there were the shops where penny ices and lemonade were sold, which were kept open at night, but which were of a harmless character; but, as the licence fee was so low, probably it was hardly worth while to make any exception. Upon another point he also wished to ascertain the feeling of the Committee. He thought the hours named—ten to four—were too limited, and should be from nine to four, or nine to five. His own opinion was, that the words were so large that cigar-shops would be included in them; but he would assent to the Amendment, provided the hours were to be from nine to five, instead of from ten to four.

MR. HARDY said, he was anxious that the words respecting the hours should be as extensive as possible, bearing in view the social welfare of the people. He was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for introducing his suggestion, but he thought the licence duty was so very small that, if there was any object in keeping a house open after nine o'clock at night, the licence fee would scarcely be felt. He did not therefore object to the extension of the language of the clause so as to include cigar shops. The great object he had in view was to prevent the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors.

SIR W. MILES said, that under the circumstances he should not think it necessary to bring forward his Amendment. In reference to the hours suggested for the shutting up of unlicensed refreshment-houses, he would remind the right hon. Gentlemen that the coffee-shops were generally frequented at night by men who resorted to them for the main object of reading the newspapers, and who seldom finished their perusal until ten o'clock at night.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought reading-rooms ought to be excepted where there were no liquors sold.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Confectioners and Eating-house Keepers entitled to take out Licences to sell Wine to be drunk on the Premises).

MR. AYRTON said, they had passed all the clauses in the Bill which related to the imposition of the tax and defined its object, and now they were going to deal with clauses relating to public morality. They had passed what was called a Money Bill, but they had appended to it a number of provisions which related to the general conduct of the community, and which would require the consideration not only of that but of the other House of Parliament. In the other House there were lords spiritual, who had the opportunity of communicating with all the clergy, and could obtain information which hon. Members generally had not the same facilities to procure. Many peers, too, took a deep interest in the question of temperance; but he apprehended they would be precluded from making any Amendments in the Bill if it was sent up to them in a shape by which two distinct subjects were mixed up together. He would therefore appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to adopt a similar course to that which he pursued in respect to the Stamp Duties Bill, from which he separated the portion repealing Sir J. Barnard's Act, and, omitting from the present Measure all the provisions relating to questions of police, to introduce those provisions in a separate Bill.

MR. CAYLEY said, he did not regard the present clause simply as a police clause. It was a clause which enabled parties to do something for the public convenience; but he could not understand why the proprietors of the refreshment places mentioned in the clause should be disabled from selling a glass of beer, if a customer preferred that beverage to wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the intention of the Bill was not to interfere in any way with beer-houses, properly so called; but the fact of a person holding a wine licence would not disqualify him from holding a beer licence, nor would the holding of a beer licence disqualify him from holding a wine licence. It would be absurd for the Legislature to say that the proprietor of an eating-house should have the option of giving his customers beer exclusively or wine exclusively, but should not be enabled

Sir William Miles

